At the time of the conversation, Junior told the feds, Ruggiero was on the outs with the Dapper Don, who was boss of the crime family by then and had placed Ruggiero "on the shelf," a designation that essentially stripped him of all his rights and responsibilities as a wiseguy.

In 1983,though, Ruggiero was a close cohort and fierce ally of the elder Gotti, and a man whom 19-year-old Junior often referred to as his "uncle." It was to Uncle Angelo's house that Junior went in the early hours of March 12, 1983, immediately after the fatal 2 a.m. stabbing of Danny Silva at the Silver Fox Bar in Ozone Park.

A day or two later, Junior told the feds, he drove Ruggiero to a meeting at the Sherwood Diner in Lawrence, L.I., where he saw Ruggiero give detective John Daly a $25,000 bribe as "insurance" that Junior, who had been at the bar but was not implicated in the slaying by any witnesses, would not become a focus of the murder probe, the sources said.

According to the sources, Junior said he watched from his car as Ruggiero gave Mr. Daly a brown paper bag that contained $25,000 during a brief meeting behind the diner. When the meeting broke up, Mr. Daly, who had interviewed Gotti about the brawl, acknowledged Gotti as he walked past the car and left the area.

Private Eye Says He Rejected Plea Deals (MH)

By Greg Risling

The Miami Herald, October 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Wednesday he rejected numerous attempts by federal prosecutors to negotiate a plea bargain in his Hollywood wiretap case because he didn't want to break the trust of celebrities, lawyers and other former clients.

"At least 10 times in this case I've been offered a plea bargain. It's not going to happen," Pellicano told The Associated Press in a phone interview from federal prison.

Pellicano said he intended to remain silent, even though he said Hollywood is infested with "great white sharks" who don't play by the rules and constantly lie to get what they want.

Pellicano, 62, has pleaded not guilty to racketeering and wiretapping charges and is scheduled for trial next year.

He is the accused ringleader of a wiretapping scheme used to get dirt to aid clients in legal disputes. Prosecutors said Pellicano enlisted the aid of law enforcement and phone company employees by bribing them to collect information.

Scant details of the operation have been released. But prosecutors contend Pellicano illegally wiretapped Sylvester Stallone and had police officers run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases.

Federal prosecutors said months ago that at least one more indictment was coming. But no new defendants have been named since "Die Hard" director John McTiernan was charged in early April. He has pleaded guilty to making false statements to an FBI agent and is awaiting sentencing.

Pellicano claimed the 112-count indictment brought against him and six other defendants was the work of an "overzealous" prosecutor.

"I don't think the government wants me badly, it's the prosecutor," Pellicano said. "Perhaps this prosecutor thought this would be a stepping stone to make him popular, get a feather in his cap."

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Dan Saunders, declined to comment.

Pellicano said encrypted audio files taken from his office during FBI raids won't lead to charges against any Hollywood power players.

The tapes "will do nobody any good to learn about my family life and my client life," he said.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with six pleading guilty to a variety of charges, including conspiracy and wire fraud. Charges are still pending against Pellicano and six others. One former SBC employee was acquitted by a jury last month.

DOJ_NMG_0086764

Federal authorities also have questioned prominent entertainment attorney Bert Fields and studio bosses Brad Grey of Paramount Pictures and Ron Meyer of Universal Studios about their connections to Pellicano. All three denied wrongdoing.

Pellicano built his career by working for a galaxy of Hollywood stars. He found the remains of Elizabeth Taylor's third husband after they were stolen from a cemetery in a case that brought him widespread acclaim. He also worked for Michael Jackson when the pop singer was first accused of molesting a boy in 1993.

The federal government once relied on his expertise as an audio forensics specialist in several major trials, including the 1963 killing of four black girls in the bombing of a Baptist church in Birmingham, Ala.

Pellicano called that case the "shining moment" in his career.

He said people often accept plea bargains to save themselves.

"I won't be a rat for anyone no matter what the consequence is to me," Pellicano said. "If I spend the rest of my life in prison, so be it."

Silicon Valley Bank Manager Sentenced For Embezzling $1.13M (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 26, 2006

SAN JOSE – A former manager of a Silicon Valley bank was sentenced Wednesday to nearly a year and a half in federal prison for embezzling $1.13 million from her employer over a decade.

U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel ordered Rose Magpantay Valdez, 44, to serve 33 months, followed by three years of supervised release, and also to pay back all of the money she stole.

Valdez pleaded guilty to embezzlement in July, after an investigation by the FBI.

The San Jose resident worked for the Silicon Valley Bank from 1984 until 2005, serving as a department manager in the Santa Clara branch from 1995 until 2005. Valdez told investigators she began stealing money in 1995, moving funds from one general ledger account to another.

In her plea, Valdez acknowledged filling out debit and credit slips with barely legible, fictitious names. She'd initial the slips and submit them to another authorized employee to approve and initial. When the employee would return the slips, Valdez would replace the deposit slips with her own slips in the same dollar amount into her personal SVB account.

Valdez continued depositing them in her personal SVB account for the next 10 years, with a brief hiatus in 1997, prosecutors said.

FORMER SJ BANK MANAGER SENTENCED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT (BCNW)

Bay City News Wire, October 26, 2006

SAN JOSE (BCN) -- A former longtime bank manager was sentenced in federal court in San Jose today to two years and nine months in prison and ordered to pay $1.1 million in restitution for embezzlement from her employer.

Rose Valdez, 44, of San Jose, worked for Silicon Valley Bank from 1984 to 2005. From 1995 to 2005, she was manager of the structured finance department at the bank's office on Tasman Drive in Santa Clara.

She pleaded guilty in July to one count of bank embezzlement.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said Valdez admitted in her guilty plea to stealing funds and placing them in her own account at the bank by taking advantage of a weakness in the security systems then in place.

As a manager, Valdez had the authority to move funds from one from general ledger account to another, with the approval of one of several other authorized bank employees.

Ryan said Valdez admitted to scribbling illegible names on credit and debit slips, getting other employees to initial the slips, and then substituting deposit slips for her own account for the phony slips.

The sentence was pronounced by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel, who also ordered Valdez to serve three years on supervised release after completing her prison term.

The investigation in the case was carried out by the FBI together with the bank's security personnel.

Man Gets 12 Years For Porn (LUFDN)

By Jessica Savage, The Lufkin Daily News

Lufkin Daily News, October 26, 2006

Former church employee had more than 2,100 images of children on his work computer

A former Lufkin church employee was sentenced to more than 12 years in federal prison Wednesday for viewing child pornography on the job, according to a federal court document.

Troy Matthew Phillips, 32, who had worked at First Assembly of God, 2021 S. John Redditt Drive, was handed a 151-month prison sentence by a U.S. District judge after he was convicted of possessing more than 2,100 images of child porn on a work computer, court documents stated.

"This hefty sentence speaks volumes as to the seriousness of this crime," U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig said in a press release announcing the sentence. "These crimes are not victimless. The exploitation of children makes it a tragic case for everyone involved."

In December 2005, a church employee noticed Phillips "acting very strange" at work while intently looking his computer screen, according to a court document. She suspected he was viewing porn on the screen, the document stated.

After senior church officials learned of the incident, they logged onto Phillips' password-protected computer after hours and found some images of nude children, including a photo of a nude child sitting in the lap of a nude male adult, the document stated.

Senior church officials confronted Phillips, who admitted he was addicted to porn, the document stated. A day later, his employment was terminated and church officials turned over the computer to FBI investigators.

Investigators found "numerous images" of children under age 12, including about 20 that were of infants or toddlers, the document stated. Approximately 80 images were considered sadistic in nature, the document stated.

There was also some evidence that Phillips had shared the porn on his computer with other people with use of the Internet, the document stated.

The Lufkin Daily News was unable to contact anyone at First Assembly of God late Wednesday for comment on Phillips' sentence.

As of 5 p.m. Wednesday, Phillips was being held in the Angelina County Jail awaiting transport to a federal prison.

Killer Of 5 Florida Students Is Executed (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

GAINESVILLE, Fla., Oct. 25 — The serial killer who gruesomely murdered five college students here in 1990 was put to death on Wednesday by lethal injection, and relatives of his victims said afterward that they could finally feel the beginnings of relief.

Danny H. Rolling, 52, was pronounced dead at 6:13 p.m. at Florida State Prison in Starke, about 30 miles northeast of Gainesville. Witnesses said he stared toward them and sang a hymn-type song just before the drugs were administered.

“Maybe now that we don’t have this on us,” said Dianna Hoyt, the stepmother of one victim, “we can try and relax and live with the memories we have of our children and be at peace.”

Mr. Rolling was 36 when he arrived in Gainesville shortly before the fall semester began at the University of Florida, a drifter with a criminal past who pitched a tent in some woods near campus. He followed two freshman roommates, Sonja Larson, 18, and Christina Powell, 17, to their off-campus apartment, raped Miss Powell, repeatedly stabbed both women with a hunting knife and mutilated their bodies.

The police discovered them on Aug. 26, after Miss Powell’s parents reported that their daughter was not answering her door or phone. Later that night, the police found Christa Hoyt, 18, dead in her off-campus duplex. Mr. Rolling had raped and stabbed her, severed her head and placed it on a shelf.

The next day, Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboada, both 23, were discovered stabbed to death in their apartment, not far from where the other killings took place. Mr. Rolling attacked Mr. Taboada, a former high school football player, as he slept, then killed Miss Paules. All of the victims were University of Florida students except for Miss Hoyt, who was attending a nearby community college.

Gainesville, a small city of pretty homes and live oaks, was crippled with dread. The campus shut down for a week and many of the 34,000 students scrambled home, some never to return. Others bought baseball bats and Mace, put triple locks on their doors or slept in shifts.

Helicopters with searchlights soared over the city by night. Sorority houses hired full-time security guards, gun sales soared and some townspeople never left their doors unlocked again.

“There aren’t words to explain the fear,” said Jane Hamby of Pomona Park, Fla., whose son was attending the university at the time and who traveled to the prison for the execution, standing in a field across the road. “We didn’t know what his next move would be, but the ones of us who could get to our children got them out of Gainesville.”

A long investigation ensued, with 6,500 leads and 1,500 pieces of evidence. At first, the police focused on a mentally ill student who had been evicted from the apartment complex where Miss Paules and Mr. Taboada lived.

But in January 1991, the police discovered Mr. Rolling in a county jail south of Gainesville, awaiting trial in a supermarket robbery. He initially denied committing the murders, but DNA tests ultimately showed he was responsible. He pleaded guilty on the eve of his trial in 1994, telling the judge, “There are some things that you just can’t run from.”

Mr. Rolling was also believed guilty of three slayings in his hometown, Shreveport, La., but was never tried for those crimes. He attributed his behavior to abuse by his father, a police officer, and to an evil alter ego.

In prison, he drew disturbing pictures and wrote a graphic book, “The Making of a Serial Killer,” with a woman who was his fiancée for a time. For his last meal, he asked for lobster tail and butterfly shrimp, prison officials said.

Across the road from the prison, dozens of onlookers gathered into groups for and against the death penalty. It was perhaps the largest turnout for an execution here since that of Ted Bundy, who was put to death at Florida State Prison in 1989 after being suspected of murdering more than 30 young women across the nation.

Two University of Florida students who had driven up from Gainesville said they were generally against the death penalty, but not in Mr. Rolling’s case. They were only 6 when the murders happened, they said, but read all about them on the Internet after enrolling at the university.

“We feel connected to these murders,” said Allison Kirkpatrick, 22, a senior. “It was a random year, it was random people, but it could have been our year, it could have been us.”

A wall near campus is painted with the names of the victims, hearts and “Remember 1990.”

Mr. Rolling was the third death row inmate executed here in recent weeks, and like the others he had filed a late appeal claiming that the lethal injection procedure was so painful as to be unconstitutional.

But Bill Cervone, the state attorney for the Eighth Judicial Circuit and a witness to the execution, said Mr. Rolling’s death did not seem punishing enough.

“To watch his death in such an antiseptic and clinical environment convinces me that the punishment does not fit that crime,” Mr. Cervone said. “We are, however, a society of laws, and the law governed what we carried out this evening.”

Laurie Lahey, the sister of Tracy Paules, said she had been reluctant to witness Mr. Rolling’s death but felt exhilarated afterward.

“Once everything quiets down, I’ll think about Tracy and I’ll be sad,” she said. “But right now, he’s gone. He’s gone.”

Plotting Crime, Street By Street (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

D.C. police have launched a new crime-mapping tool on the department's Web site, allowing anyone to create a map of a sliver of the city and immediately see what crimes have happened there this year.

Cartoonish icons are used to pinpoint crimes. If you map your neighborhood, you do not want the Zorro-like mask to pop up -- it indicates an armed holdup. Or worse, the red figure of a person lying in the street, which denotes a homicide. The site also features goblin-looking masks for muggings, money sacks for thefts, gas cans for arsons and cracked houses for burglaries.

But it's the easy access to the information, not the symbols, that authorities believe will draw people to http://crimemap.dc.gov . For example, it takes only a few clicks to discover that during the past six months there have been 15 robberies, 72 thefts and 18 vehicles stolen within 1,000 feet of Chinatown's Verizon Center.

Most police departments make crime numbers available to residents, and many have Web sites that allow people to search for the number of crimes in specific areas. But few can match the District's new site, with its searchable fields that include museums, stadiums, gas stations and check-cashing locations. The site's level of detail rivals or surpasses those of departments in Baltimore, Chicago and Los Angeles.

"Some people may think that if you tell people about crime in their neighborhood, they will be scared off," said D.C. police spokesman Kevin Morison. "We think if we give people information, they will be prepared."

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said he believes increasing the level of crime awareness will make neighborhoods safer. The information gets residents involved, he said, "so they can be even stronger partners in community policing."

When Long & Foster Real Estate agent Michael Dillon learned of the online maps yesterday, he joked that he might prefer to stay in the dark about crime. "It's kind of scary," he said. "Maybe I don't want to know."

But Dillon quickly noted that it will be useful for him to direct home buyers to the Web site when they ask the inevitable question: "Is it safe to live here?"

"We can't answer that. They have to look for themselves," Dillon said. "Everybody has a different threshold for crime."

Like most law enforcement agencies, D.C. police have been mapping crimes internally for years. They have used the information to look for trends and to help with officer deployment. Additionally, D.C. police have shared the data with residents at community meetings. But the department just started making the information available to the public on a widespread basis, largely in response to demand.

"They really wanted to handle inquiries about crime data," said Barney Krucoff, director of geographic information systems for the District and one of the creators of the online maps. "The benefit to them is they don't need to handle those in e-mail and paper."

Most crime information is updated daily, but homicides can take up to a week to appear. Most major crimes are included in the search using the department's preliminary data. Crimes such as drug dealing, prostitution, disorderly conduct and vandalism are not included.

Krucoff said he thinks he has a good "first version" of the technology but is working on updating the program to include more information, such as arrests. The program took about four months to develop and was made by the city's technology department without specified grant or funding, Krucoff said.

Other cities that have crime mapping technology generally use colored dots to differentiate among crimes. Krucoff said his team decided to use the icons, which look like they are straight out of a 1980s video game, simply because they could.

"Maybe we're more creative than the other cities," he said. "We're a little prettier."

Police said they have not gotten any complaints yet about the symbols being too flippant for the serious subject matter.

The crime maps, which are not accessible using some browsers, are mostly tailored to home in on a neighborhood and will only show crimes in chunks of the city, rather than citywide. The largest area that can be queried online is a police district, and data can be searched as far back as two years.

And there are other limitations. The system will not map an area if a search draws more than 500 crimes, meaning that it is impossible to map a month of crime in the entire 3rd Police District, because there were 607 reported crimes there in the past 30 days. Instead, clicking on that district, which includes neighborhoods north of downtown such as Adams Morgan, Dupont Circle and the U Street corridor, will turn up a list of crimes broken down by offense.

Some police departments in the region want to add technology similar to that used in the District.

In Montgomery County, police spokeswoman Melanie Hadley said that the department is gearing up to provide crime data on online maps, but the system will not be available until the agency fully transitions to a new crime reporting system.

D.C. police said they have gotten positive feedback since the maps went online, and the suggestions they have gotten mostly have had the same theme.

"People want more data, presented in more sophisticated ways," Morison said.

Staff writers Ruben Castaneda, Tom Jackman, Ernesto LondoÃ±o and Theresa Vargas contributed to this report.

Justice Department Webcast Focuses On Hiring, Retaining New Police Officers (PADN)

By Brian Babcock

Palo Alto (CA) Daily News, October 26, 2006

Police departments struggling to hire and retain qualified police officers participated in a U.S. Department of Justice webcast Tuesday to discuss strategies for addressing the problem.

While there was a time when departments had the flexibility to reject would-be recruits, a new generation of qualified potential officers isn't interested in the profession, which many regard as short on pay and benefits.

"Most of us have been in this profession for a while," said East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis, who took part in the hour-and-a-half webcast. "Not to date ourselves, but we come from a different era. ... The job became your life and I think, probably for good reasons, this generation looks at a more balanced and tempered approach."

About 25,000 people logged on to watch mayors and police chiefs from San Diego to Hattiesburg, Miss., discuss ways to grab and keep the attention of potential police officers.

As the panel jumped from topic to topic, a major theme of the webcast was the new generation's wants and needs. The panel discussed ideas such as speeding up the hiring process, which can take up to nine months, and using different techniques and technologies, such as the Internet, to recruit new officers.

"This is a generation that's used to instant results," said Maj. Jim Previtera of the Hillsborough, Fla., County Sheriff's Department. He said police departments have been too slow in utilizing tools the private sector uses to recruit new employees.

Previtera said his department reached out to the marketing firm that does the Outback Steakhouse commercials to help with its recruiting.

Davis said police departments need to ask themselves if the qualifications they ask recruits to have are unreasonable. Davis gave the example of denying a potential recruit because they'd tried marijuana once when they were in their teens.

"Our process is so unrealistic that we are encouraging our candidates to lie," he said. "Then we have a polygraph test to catch them lying and then ask them why they lied."

Davis said he doesn't want to lower the standards for officers but wants to re-examine the hiring process. He also said departments might need to relax standards for facial hair and body piercings.

"We need to accept that they're different," Davis said. "They're not bad or worse."

The East Palo Alto Police Department is suffering from a high attrition rate. Within the last couple of months, the department has lost about six officers for various reasons and has hired two San Mateo County Sheriff's Department deputies. Davis has said he expects to hire as many as 12 officers within the next 12 months to flesh out the force.

Ed Daley, city manager of Winchester, Va., said in a taped feature that he doesn't believe there is a best practice for recruiting new officers. He said this generation has different priorities and police departments and city officials need to identify those needs.

"If we're going to be competitive ... then I think you either flex, change, adapt or perish," Davis said. "I think it's that simple."

CIVIL LAW:

The Supreme Court's Crusade: Fairness For The Powerful (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

When Jesse Williams died of lung cancer, his widow sued Philip Morris, claiming it misled him about the danger of smoking. A jury agreed, awarding her $79.5 million in punitive damages. The Oregon Supreme Court affirmed the award, calling Philip Morris's decades of deception "extraordinarily reprehensible."

The United States Supreme Court is hearing arguments in the case next week, and the broader business community has joined Philip Morris in asking the court to sharply reduce the damages. They are relying on a controversial line of recent cases in which the court struck down punitive damages awards that it deemed "excessive."

The Philip Morris case will tell us a lot about the John Roberts court, which may be the most pro-business court in decades. It is a test of whether the court will abandon its conservative principles to be activist and "rights-making" when the party that needs help is a large corporation. It will also reveal whether the court will continue on its current disturbing path of giving corporations more protection from excessive punishment than it gives to people.

The court began its punitive damages crusade in 1996, in the case of a man who sued BMW for failing to tell him that the new car he bought had been damaged and repainted. The man won $4,000 in compensatory damages and $2 million in punitive damages. The Supreme Court set aside the punitive damages award as so "grossly excessive" that it violated due process, but the court declined to lay out any clear standards for when an award was too high.

In 2003, in a fraud case against State Farm Insurance by a policyholder, the court struck down $145 million in punitive damages. It held that the award was excessive since compensatory damages were only $1 million. That 145-to-1 ratio was unacceptable. Due process generally required, the court held, a "single-digit ratio" between punitive and compensatory damages.

These rulings are remarkably "activist" by all the traditional measures. They take a vaguely worded constitutional guarantee — that no one shall be deprived of property without "due process of law" — and translate it into a right that is not at all apparent from the words' plain meaning. They attempt to turn the guarantee into a precise mathematical formula. And they substitute the judges' worldview for that of elected officials. If Oregonians believe punitive damages are too high, their legislature can impose a legal cap.

These activist decisions, which give corporations valuable constitutional privileges, relied on the votes of conservative justices, who are supposedly skeptical of "judge-made" rights. Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy provided key votes for BMW. Justice Kennedy wrote the State Farm "single-digit ratio" opinion, and Justice O'Connor and former Chief Justice William Rehnquist joined it.

The contrast with the court's decisions on punishment of human wrongdoers is stark. In 2003, the court considered the sad case of Leandro Andrade, a father of three who was given a minimum of 50 years in prison under California's tough "three strikes" sentencing law, for shoplifting $153.53 worth of videotapes from Kmart. He argued that his prison term violated the Eighth Amendment. The Supreme Court — in a majority joined by Justices O'Connor and Kennedy and Chief Justice Rehnquist — could find nothing excessive in the punishment.

Based on the Constitution's words, Mr. Andrade certainly had a stronger case than BMW or State Farm. The Eighth Amendment expressly bars "cruel and unusual punishments," which might reasonably be interpreted to cover imprisoning a man from age 37 to 87 for stealing $153.53. The companies claimed only that the punitive damages awards violated their "due process" rights, a far greater textual stretch.

On the issue of what is "excessive" punishment, Mr. Andrade's claim is also stronger. It is hard to see how it is excessive to make Philip Morris, whose market capitalization is $166 billion, pay a mere $79.5 million for "extraordinarily reprehensive" and lethal conduct, but not excessive to make Mr. Andrade spend what is likely to be the entire second half of his life in prison for a petty theft.

The question of whether there should be constitutional limits on punitive damages has proved difficult to resolve, and it has caused divisions in both the court's liberal and conservative blocs. (It is one of the very few issues in which John Paul Stevens votes with corporations and Antonin Scalia votes against them.) Whatever the court decides, it should develop a constitutional theory of excessive punishment that covers human and corporate wrongdoers equally, as the Duke Law School Professor Erwin Chemerinsky and others have urged.

The current doctrines make no sense, least of all by the standards of conservative constitutional interpretation. Conservatives like to talk about the "framers' intent." The framers were deeply concerned about excessive punishment, and set forth their views on it in the Eighth Amendment. They would be perplexed that the high court they created believes their Constitution permits a father to remain in jail for 50 years for petty theft, but does not tolerate taking a fraction of the wealth from a company that kills people.

Sticks And Stones May Break Bones, But Warsaw, Ind., Makes Replacements (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WARSAW, Ind. -- When Don Running and his two partners decided to start up a company specializing in orthopedic plates and screws to mend broken wrists two years ago, it was a given that they would set up shop here.

Silicon Valley has computers. Detroit has cars. But in orthopedic devices, the undisputed world capital is Warsaw, a city of 12,500 with a silver-domed 19th-century courthouse and pickups angled into the curb on Main Street.

Part of a replacement knee from Zimmer Holdings, the largest orthopedics employer in the industry capital, Warsaw, Ind.

Three of the world's five largest makers of artificial joints and related surgical tools have their headquarters here amid the lakes and fields of northeastern Indiana. The local industry has grown so much that it's now a regional force, with orthopedics companies popping up in nearby farm towns and the suburbs of Fort Wayne, about 50 miles to the east.

"How many orthopedic-implant engineers do you find walking around most places?" asks Mr. Running. "Well around here, you bump into them in the supermarket."

Memphis, Tenn., and northern New Jersey are other industry hotspots, but none rivals Warsaw for sheer concentration. And while major orthopedics companies are looking overseas for cheaper places to produce items such as basic bone screws and metal plates, the U.S. retains a firm grip on the industry.

A big reason is that the U.S., with its population of fast-aging baby boomers, injury-prone weekend athletes and overweight people, is by far the world's biggest market for artificial hips and knees. The U.S. represents an estimated $14 billion of the annual spending in a global market of $22.9 billion, according to Knowledge Enterprises Inc., a Chagrin Falls, Ohio, market research firm.

The U.S. also effectively protects manufacturers in the sector with strict regulations for devices that go inside the human body. Rather than risk problems -- and crippling lawsuits -- U.S. health-care providers buy their artificial joints from companies they know, which generally means buying American.

Profits are so good in the orthopedics industry that there isn't much pressure on suppliers to shave costs by going to low-cost countries. "The reason this business is in Warsaw and not Mexico is because margins are 70% or better," says Ron Clark, an orthopedic surgeon who founded his own company in Fort Wayne, which is on the other side of the state from his home in Valparaiso, in part so he could be closer to Warsaw. Dr. Clark says savings from going abroad just aren't worth it.

A worker (top) at Zimmer; surgeons (bottom) practice joint replacements there.

To be sure, the industry's dynamics may be starting to change. Health-care providers are starting to push back against the industry's steady price increases, raising concerns among investors about whether profits for Warsaw companies and others can keep up the brisk growth.

There are other shadows over Warsaw's future. The U.S. Justice Department has opened two probes of orthopedics makers in the past two years, including an antitrust investigation in which Smith & Nephew PLC, of the U.K., has confirmed that one of its independent sales representatives tried to initiate an industry-pricing strategy in response to a U.S. hospital's bid request. Other producers, including those in Warsaw, have said they didn't respond to the suggestion.

The big implant makers also received a separate batch of subpoenas in early 2005 regarding an investigation of any financial ties between them and surgeons who recommend their products. Doctors work closely with device makers to develop and refine artificial joints, and the companies have long paid surgeons as consultants and designers.

At least for now, though, Warsaw's orthopedics businesses continue to hum. The industry got its start here over a century ago, when a Canadian pharmacist, Revra DePuy, came up with the idea of making flexible splints to replace the wooden barrel staves then used to set broken bones.

The company he created thrived and exists today as DePuy Inc., a unit of Johnson & Johnson. It eventually spawned other companies, as people left to start competing operations. Indeed, Warsaw's largest employer is Zimmer Holdings Inc., founded by a DePuy salesman who broke out on his own in the 1920s. Today, about 60% of the workers who live within seven miles of Warsaw are directly or indirectly engaged in orthopedics manufacturing, says Joy McCarthy-Sessing, president of the local chamber of commerce.

Such a concentration of one industry in such a small town is unusual, but the larger phenomenon isn't unusual at all. Many of the strongest U.S. manufacturers set up production far away from urban centers, with their high taxes, labor, and utility costs, and instead look for locations in small towns, close to major highways and railways. Proximity to transportation hubs allows for smooth logistics in an age of just-in-time deliveries. Warsaw, for instance, sits astride a highway, U.S. 30, connecting Fort Wayne and Chicago.

Economists have long known that businesses thrive when they congregate in one place. Think of Hollywood movie studios, or the Route 128 technology ring around Boston. The same holds true in manufacturing. "Companies that operate in clusters have greater access to talent," explains Jeffrey Grogan, partner at the Monitor Group, a Boston strategy consulting firm. They also serve as fertile ground for start-ups.

Mr. Running's company, Deo Volente Orthopaedics LLC, is a prime example. Mr. Running first met his partners, Rod Mayer and Jeff Ondrla, when the three were working together at DePuy in the early 1990s. Mr. Running and Mr. Ondrla are engineers and inventors, and Mr. Mayer's background is in sales.

Mr. Mayer got the idea for the company after seeing that the market for "extremity" devices, such as plates and screws for fixing broken wrists, wasn't then as developed as it was for major joints, such as hips and knees. The three were eager to get away from big-company bureaucracy.

And as often happens in the close confines of Warsaw, the partners' connections stretch into their personal lives: They were attending the same evangelical church in 2004 when they launched the company. Deo Volente means "God willing" in Latin.

The three men agree it is a hefty advantage to have so much of what they need at their fingertips. "It's a lot easier to drive across town and visit a supplier then it is to pick up the phone and try to talk through some complicated issue," says Mr. Ondrla.

Warsaw is dotted with small support businesses, from packaging firms that specialize in super-clean processes to machine shops. There are even multiple manufacturers of the plastic trays and cases needed to pack orthopedic kits. A total hip replacement, for instance, can require up to 22 cases of equipment and each case and tray is specially designed.

The region surrounding Warsaw has long been home to the U.S. automotive and machinery industries, churning out a stream of skilled machinists, toolmakers and industrial engineers. Orthopedics makers opening up shop in Warsaw found a ready supply of skilled workers, particularly in recent years as the more-traditional sectors have slumped.

Whole companies in the region have switched over to serving the orthopedics industry in recent years, including the small factory contracted to do most of the production for Deo Volente: Three years ago, Micropulse Inc., of nearby Columbia City, Ind., stopped doing any work for the automotive and other old-line industries -- which once accounted for over half of its business -- to focus on orthopedics.

"Half of our customers were closing, so we divorced them all," says Brian Emerick, president of Micropulse. His company is now growing 25% a year, he says.

List Errors Might Impede Voters (AP)

By Deborah Hastings

AP, October 26, 2006

Between every registered voter and the voting booth is The List. And if you're not on it, you might not be able to cast a ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0086771

One of the biggest changes wrought by the Help America Vote Act is the mandate that every state must have a voter registration database up and working by the Nov. 7 general election. But a dozen states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for finishing their databases, which produce lists of registered voters for every precinct. And four states have been sued by the Justice Department.

That leaves a confusing array of systems that may or may not work come Election Day, voting rights groups say. And it creates a growing anxiety that registered voters with every right to cast a ballot will be turned away because their names are not on the list for a variety of reasons, including something as innocuous as a typo.

"No issue is more important on Election Day than the quality of the list," said Doug Chapin of the nonpartisan reform group electionline.org. "Those databases are the final say on whether a person gets to vote."

The regulation was designed to assure that each state would have a central, independent repository for all registered voters - created by cross-checking voter registrations with existing state records to make sure dead people, incarcerated felons and others not eligible to cast a ballot were removed from the rolls. It was also supposed to make it easier to vote by having a single list instead of scores of county-based rolls.

Using driver license data and Social Security numbers, state officials were supposed to match that data to voter registration cards. It didn't take long for unforeseen problems to pop up. Someone may use a middle initial on his/her voter registration card, but not on his/her driver license. Married women may change their names, but not on every form of identification. Data entry errors can, and often do, occur.

"In theory, it looks like a really good idea," said Chapin. "But it's not as easy to match information on databases as they originally thought."

In September 2004, New York City decided to do a trial run. The board of elections sent 15,000 registration records to the Department of Motor Vehicles to match license numbers on the voter cards to those in the DMV. The results? Nearly 20 percent couldn't be matched because of typos made by city employees.

Earlier this year, the Department of Justice sued New York, Alabama, New Jersey and Maine for failing to implement statewide lists. The states have reached agreements with the Justice Department, most in the form of interim databases.

In March, the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University released a nationwide survey of voter registration databases. "Making the List" concluded the new list requirement could result "in millions of eligible voters being denied access to the polls."

Sometimes it's not the database that's the problem. Sometimes it's the technology for looking at the database.

In Maryland's September primary, some precincts couldn't access the state database because of computer software glitches, and there were no printouts to consult. Some machines mysteriously rebooted without warning. Both caused voting delays. Officials said those problems will be rectified by Nov. 7.

But in some small counties, in states with smaller populations, databases are no trouble at all.

"We already know everybody here, so it's not a problem," said election official Bill Conway, who oversees the voting of about 7,000 people in Arkansas' Desha County. "I know everybody in the county, and they know me. We do our own database. We already know everybody who's going to vote."

Black Groups Urge 3 To Resign From Ga. Election Board (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 26, 2006

Key leaders of two of Georgia's strongest black organizations are calling for the resignations of three members of the State Election Board for mailing letters to voters that suggested photo ID would be required to cast a ballot Nov. 7.

At a news conference on the steps of the state Capitol, officials from the Georgia State Conference of the NAACP and the Coalition for the People's Agenda urged Republican-appointed members Tex McIver, Randy Evans and Jeff Israel to resign from the election board for their part in sending out about 300,000 letters that they say were designed to suppress minority turnout on election day.

David Worley, a Democratic appointment to the five-member board, and Secretary of State Cathy Cox, who is also a Democrat and serves as the board's chair, were not asked to resign.

"We believe this was a deliberate attempt to confuse the voters. A deliberate attempt to further disenfranchise voters," said NAACP President Edward O. DuBose. "The damage has already been done and we are asking those board members to resign."

McIver, vice chairman of the board who headed up the letter campaign, said he intends to stay in office until his term expires in 2008.

"I was voted in by the Georgia state Senate. Everyone in that room, including Democrats, voted for me," McIver said. "And I intend to serve until my term is up. I very much regret that politics continue to creep into the good works of the SEB. We are trying to get people to the polls as best we can. That is our mission."

Calls to Evans and Israel were not immediately returned.

Twice this fall, the board sent letters to 300,000 potential voters believed to not have a valid driver's licence or state-issued ID. The first letter, mailed in September, explained how to get a free photo ID, and suggested one was required to vote Nov. 7. About 200,000 of the first batch of letters were sent after a judge voided the state's new photo ID voting requirement Sept. 19.

The election board, under threat of a civil suit filed by former Gov. Roy Barnes, voted this month to mail a second letter clarifying that photo ID is not required to vote in Georgia.

For many, that is not enough. Rep. John Lewis (D-Atlanta) has asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a federal investigation into the mailings, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson is pushing the issue at a conference he is conducting this week in Atlanta.

When the original 300,000 letters were being prepared to be sent out — before the judge's ruling — the election board unanimously approved the initial mailing. But after the judge's decision, nearly 200,000 of the letters went out under the direction of McIver. Evans drafted the letter. Worley has said the mailing should have been stopped after the judge declared the law unconstitutional.

"Politics have mussed up the election process," said Helen Butler, executive director of the Coalition for the Peoples' Agenda, an alliance of more than 20 civic organizations and churches. "The board has violated the trust of the citizens of Georgia."

Manassas May Face 2nd Lawsuit (WP)

By Nick Miroff, Washington Post Staff Writer

Discrimination Alleged Over Rejected Permit

The Manassas City Council's decision this week to reject the home business permit application of a part-time massage therapist has raised the possibility the city could face another lawsuit alleging discrimination.

West Street homeowner Howard Daniel, who is gay, says that a climate of homophobia pervaded the council's consideration of his application. The 4 to 3 vote Monday to deny his application has prompted him to consider legal action against the city, he said.

"There's little doubt that we're going to pursue this," said Daniel, who attended the meeting accompanied by a lawyer. "It's not over."

The threat of civil litigation hangs heavily over Manassas with the city already under investigation by the Justice Department for allegedly discriminating against Hispanic residents in violation of the Fair Housing Act. Some council members said they were frustrated that the decision on Daniel's application was being construed as discriminatory, saying that the matter was strictly a zoning issue.

"Most of the people who protested against him made it clear they like him as a neighbor," said Jackson H. Miller (R), who voted against Daniel's application. "What they don't want is a home-based business in their neighborhood."

Daniel, 44, is a licensed massage therapist who treats patients on a part-time basis in their homes and at Prince William Hospital. He applied to the city in July for a special-use permit that would allow him to see clients in the home he shares with his partner, Richard Devine, three blocks from the commercial district of Manassas's Old Town.

Since the City Council had approved permits for both of the other massage therapy home business requests it had received in the past, and Daniel's proposed client load was smaller, Daniel said he was encouraged to apply by the city planning office, which later recommended approval by the City Council. Daniel's immediate neighbors then signed a petition supporting his application.

But when the city had a public hearing Sept. 18, nearly two dozen city residents spoke against Daniel's request, expressing concerns about increased traffic, children's safety and the presence of "unknown" people in the neighborhood. Many were members of a local church, All Saints Catholic Church, who do not live in the neighborhood. An anti-gay message was later written on the car of one of Daniel's supporters, further escalating tensions.

Daniel has maintained that all of his opponents' concerns are addressed in his business plan, which limits his part-time practice to one patient every 1 1/2 hours, and specifies that clients will park in his driveway. But as council member Miller announced just before Monday's vote, the council had received another petition earlier in the day with the signatures of 20 additional West Street residents opposed to Daniel's request.

That wasn't the only last-minute issue. The council also received a letter from the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia warning its members not to deny Daniel a permit on the basis of his sexual orientation because that would violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution. Virginia ACLU legal director Rebecca K. Glenberg said the letter wasn't a threat to sue, but "people are free to construe it that way."

"It's unfortunate to see this business permit denied based on what appear to be discriminatory reasons and arising on the heels of Manassas's problems of housing discrimination against Latino Americans," Glenberg said.

During the meeting, Mayor Douglas S. Waldron (R) warned council members to be "very careful" about what they said, given the legal and media scrutiny brought by the case and the allegations.

"We all struggled with this vote and have gotten e-mails from all over the country," council member Steven S. Smith (R) said just before the vote. "And here we are."

Council members Andrew L. Harrover (R), Harry J. Parrish (R) and J. Steven Randolph (I) voted for Daniel's permit. Voting against it were Miller, Marc T. Aveni (R), Smith and Waldron, who cast the tiebreaking vote.

Right Hopes For Boost From N.J. Ruling (FWNS)

By David Crary

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, October 26, 2006

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruling Wednesday that ordered equal rights for same-sex couples was instantly hailed by gay-rights leaders, but it also energized their conservative adversaries, who predicted a backlash in their favor in the Nov. 7 election.

"This is a wake-up call for people who believe that marriage doesn't need constitutional protection," said Glen Lavy, senior counsel for the Alliance Defense Fund, which has opposed same-sex marriage in numerous court cases nationwide.

Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League, called the ruling "a plus" on the premise it would stir up resentment of "arrogant judges" and boost conservative election prospects.

Eight states - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin - will be voting Nov. 7 on constitutional amendments that would ban same-sex marriages and, in most cases, civil unions as well.

To conservative activists, the logic is that right-of-center voters who may have felt alienated by events such as the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley will now be motivated to go to the polls. And those voters will be more inclined to pull the lever for Republican candidates in key races such as that of GOP Sen. George Allen in Virginia.

Gay rights leaders disagree, saying gay marriage is not as volatile an issue as it was in the 2004 election, which took place only months after the nation's first legal gay marriages in Massachusetts.

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, noted that the New Jersey high court had given the state legislature 180 days to decide whether to offer same-sex couples marriage or some other form of partnership such as civil unions.

"The ability of the radical right to whip their base into a frenzy is limited," Solmonese said. "Voters are angry - they're looking for their leaders to talk about issues like the war in Iraq, and aren't having any part of throwing a group of Americans out there as a wedge issue."

Evan Wolfson, a gay-rights lawyer who heads Freedom to Marry, said the eight anti-gay marriage amendments likely would have passed even without the New Jersey ruling.

"It's always been an uphill fight to defeat any of these attack measures," he said. "I don't think today's ruling will make much difference. If we see margins of defeat smaller than before, that will be sign of progress."

Twenty states have previously passed constitutional amendments aimed at blocking gay marriage, mostly by large margins. But gay-rights activists have nurtured hopes of breaking that streak in one or more of the eight states with marriage ballot measures this year.

Hopes for an upset victory have been particularly high in Wisconsin, where a broad coalition of unions, church leaders, students and others has been opposing the proposed ban.

Mike Tate, campaign leader for the anti-ban group Fair Wisconsin, was hopeful that voters would not overreact to the New Jersey ruling.

"I don't think this decision is going to help the other side mobilize its base," he said. "They will try, but I don't think today changes one iota and one vote in Wisconsin."

However, Julaine Appling, head of the campaign advocating the marriage ban, said the court ruling only helped what she already considered a winning cause.

"At the expense of the people of New Jersey, this is the very best example of what our amendment is trying to prevent," she said. "This is a court redefining marriage without any input directly or indirectly from the people."

Matt Daniels, who as head of the Alliance for Marriage has been seeking a federal constitutional ban on gay marriage, said the New Jersey ruling would re-energize his cause - even if Democrats gain seats in Congress and thus diminish the prospects for such an amendment.

"We're not going to fold up our tents and go home," Daniels said. "This is going to be settled at the national level, one way or the other. We can't have a cohesive society if it's left to the option of the states."

New Jersey Court Orders Equality For Gay Couples (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

New Jersey's Supreme Court ordered legal equality for same-sex couples, in a politically charged ruling that the state constitution gives them the same rights as married heterosexuals. But the court left it to the Legislature to decide whether to formally recognize such unions as marriage.

In an opinion seeking to balance a sexual minority's rights with the social mores of the majority, Justice Barry Albin distinguished between the "right to marry" and the "rights of marriage," ruling that New Jersey's constitution guarantees same-sex couples the substantive elements of the latter, but not the symbolic meaning of the former.

THE COURT'S DECISION

Read the court's statement (pdf file)2 issued with its decision in Lewis v. Harris, by arrangement with FindLaw3.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated," Justice Albin wrote for the majority in the 4-3 decision. New Jersey had adopted several laws codifying gay rights, including a 2004 law giving same-sex couples many of the rights of married couples.

The three dissenters contended that the majority didn't go far enough, arguing that gays were entitled to the label as well as the rights of marriage.

Coming less than two weeks before midterm elections, the ruling quickly entered the political fray, with Republicans hoping it would energize their base of social conservative voters.

New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat, is seen as his party's most vulnerable incumbent. In a statement, Mr. Menendez backed the court decision. "I have always believed marriage is between a man and a woman," he said, but gay couples "with a lifetime commitment to each other" should enjoy full legal rights.

The Republican challenger for the U.S. Senate, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr., opposed New Jersey's 2004 Domestic Partnership Act and said the state constitution should be amended to overturn the court ruling, according to a spokeswoman.

Republicans hope yesterday's decision will draw attention to ballot initiatives in eight states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- that would ban same-sex marriage. Twenty states already have adopted such constitutional provisions; an Ohio initiative is credited with giving President Bush a critical edge in the 2004 presidential race.

But the New Jersey decision gives Republicans little ammunition to argue their judicial nominees will hold the line on gay rights. All three dissenters, who found that the state constitution requires full gay marriage, were appointed by a Republican governor, Christine Todd Whitman. One Whitman appointee joined the more-conservative majority, along with three appointees of former Gov. James McGreevey, a Democrat who resigned in 2004 after acknowledging his own homosexuality.

The New Jersey ruling modified a 2005 lower-court decision that likewise found no right to gay marriage, but stopped short of ordering the Legislature to equalize the rights of same-sex couples with heterosexuals. The 2005 opinion suggested gay couples could challenge specific laws that denied them the same rights as married couples.

The decision gives the Legislature 180 days to include gays within the definition of marriage or grant them equal rights under some other name. It follows the lead set by Vermont and Connecticut, which provide gay civil unions equality with marriage. Massachusetts, under a ruling of its highest court, is the only state to permit gay marriage.

The New Jersey court said it recognized "the cultural clash over same-sex marriage" and that the term "marriage" holds "an evocative and important meaning to both parties." In granting homosexuals the substance but not the symbolism of marriage, Justice Albin wrote, "We do not have to take...[an] all or nothing approach."

Prof. Frank Askin, at Rutgers Law School in Newark, N.J., said the ruling could cost employers who likely would be required to treat gay couples equally with married couples. "If benefits are provided to spouses, I think they will have to be provided to homosexual couples as well," he said.

Ruling On Gays May Echo At Polls (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0086775

By Charisse Jones And Andrea Stone
USA Today, October 26, 2006

Same-sex couples in New Jersey must be given all the benefits and rights enjoyed by married men and women, but state lawmakers will have to decide whether they can officially wed, the state's highest court ruled Wednesday.

The ruling leaves open the possibility that state lawmakers will follow the lead of Vermont and Connecticut and allow "civil unions." Such unions afford same-sex couples the same state rights as marriage but not the title. New Jersey lawmakers have 180 days to respond to the court's mandate. Massachusetts, which authorized same-sex marriage in 2003, remains the only state that allows gays to legally wed.

The New Jersey ruling comes less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 elections in which Republicans are battling to retain control of Congress.

Tony Perkins of the conservative Family Research Council predicted that the ruling would "give momentum" to efforts in eight states to pass constitutional amendments outlawing same-sex marriages.

Conservative activist Gary Bauer, head of the group American Values, said the ruling could swell the turnout of conservative Republicans in general.

"We're already noticing that those voters are getting more engaged, so there could be a surprise on Election Day," Bauer said. "This decision, particularly because it's a court decision, reminds voters that who controls the Senate makes a difference."

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political scientist at the University of Southern California, said the ruling "will remind people in those eight states that the question is alive" but doubted it will energize conservative voters elsewhere.

Forty-five states have laws or constitutional amendments barring gay marriage. New Jersey has neither.

The case the New Jersey court ruled on Wednesday was filed on behalf of seven gay couples who argued that being denied the right to marry violated equal-protection guarantees in the state's constitution. "Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state constitution," Associate Justice Barry Albin wrote in the decision by the court.

"This is very much a victory for same-sex couples in New Jersey because the court has sent a clear message that they deserve the same protections as all the long-term, committed heterosexual couples in that state," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a national gay civil rights group.

The ruling throws another issue into the close race between Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., and his Republican challenger, state Sen. Tom Kean. The race is critical to which party controls the Senate.

It forces them to "talk about an issue they would prefer not to, a complex value issue on which reasonable people disagree," said David Rebovich of the Rider Institute for New Jersey Politics.

Menendez and Kean said they believe marriage is between a man and a woman. "I would support an amendment to the state constitution reaffirming that," Kean said. Menendez said he supports civil unions.

N.J. Court Opens Door To Gay Marriage (AP-Y)

By Geoff Mulvihill
AP, October 26, 2006

New Jersey's highest court opened the door Wednesday to making the state the second in the nation to allow gay marriage, ruling that lawmakers must offer same-sex couples either marriage or something like it, such as civil unions.

In a ruling that fell short of what either side wanted or most feared, the state Supreme Court declared that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual ones. The justices gave lawmakers 180 days to rewrite the laws.

The ruling is similar to the 1999 high-court ruling in Vermont that led the state to create civil unions, which confer all of the rights and benefits available to married couples under state law.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state Constitution," Justice Barry T. Albin wrote for the four-member majority.

The court said the Legislature "must either amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel statutory structure" that gives gays all the privileges and obligations married couples have.

The vote was 4-3, with the three dissenting justices arguing that the majority did not go far enough. They asserted that gay couples should have the "right to the title of marriage" as well as its benefits.

Gay rights activists had seen New Jersey as a promising place because it is a largely Democratic state in the Northeast. The only state to allow gay marriage is Massachusetts. The only states allowing civil unions are Vermont and Connecticut. New Jersey is also one of just five states that have no law or constitutional amendment expressly banning gay marriage.

If the court had legalized gay marriage outright, the effect could have been more far-reaching, and New Jersey could have become more of a magnet for gay couples than Massachusetts, which has a law barring out-of-state couples from marrying there if their marriages would not be recognized in their home states. New Jersey has no such law.

A clear-cut ruling legalizing gay marriage this close to Election Day could also have been a political bombshell, galvanizing Republicans and the religious right. Eight states have gay marriage bans on their ballots in November.

New Jersey Republicans, who are in the minority in the Legislature, said they would work to ban same-sex unions by enacting a constitutional amendment.

For gay rights advocates, there was debate over whether the ruling was a victory.

Lara Schwartz, legal director of Human Rights Campaign, said if legislators have to choose between civil unions and marriage, it is a no-lose situation for gay couples. "They get to decide whether it's chocolate or double-chocolate chip," Schwartz said.

Steven Goldstein, executive director of Garden State Equality, New Jersey's main gay rights group, said his organization wants nothing short of marriage. "We get to go from the back of the bus to the middle of the bus," he complained.

The New Jersey high court castigated the treatment same-sex couples receive under the law.

"The seeming ordinariness of plaintiffs' lives is belied by the social indignities and economic difficulties that they daily face due to the inferior legal standing of their relationships compared to that of married couples," the court said.

Outside the court, news of the ruling caused confusion, with many of the roughly 100 gay marriage supporters outside asking each other what it meant.

"I'm definitely encouraged," said Chris Lodewyks, one of the plaintiffs who gathered at a Newark law office. But he added, "I'm not sure what this exactly means in terms of marriage."

Another plaintiff, Saundra Toby-Heath, was more effusive: "I feel they were listening and paying attention to us as human beings who wanted to have the same rights."

Garden State Equality, New Jersey's main gay political organization, quickly announced that three lawmakers would introduce a bill in the Legislature to give full marriage rights to gay couples.

"New Jersey is a progressive state and has a tradition of tolerance," said one of the lawmakers, Democratic Assemblyman Reed Gusciora.

GOP Assemblyman Richard Merkt said he would seek to have all seven justices impeached. "Neither the framers of New Jersey's 1947 constitution, nor the voters who ratified it, ever remotely contemplated the possibility of same-sex marriage," Merkt said.

Gay couples in New Jersey can already apply for domestic partnerships under a law passed in 2004. Among other things, domestic partnerships give couples the right to inherit possessions if there is no will and health care coverage for partners of state employees.

Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine supports domestic partnerships, but not gay marriage.

Former Gov. James E. McGreevey, who resigned in 2004 after announcing that he was gay and had an affair with a male staff member, praised the court's decision. "I applaud the court's courage," McGreevey said. "I regret not having had the fortitude to embrace this right during my tenure as governor."

Supporters pushing for full gay marriage have had a two-year losing streak in state courts, including those in New York, Washington state, and both Nebraska and Georgia, where voter-approved bans on gay marriage were reinstated.

They also have suffered at the ballot boxes in 20 states where constitutions have been amended to ban same-sex unions.

Cases similar to the one ruled on Wednesday, which was filed by seven gay New Jersey couples, are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland.

New Jersey's Justices Agree On All But The 'M' Word (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

It was a 4-to-3 decision, but all that divided the two sides in yesterday's New Jersey Supreme Court ruling on how the state should treat gay couples was a single word: marriage.

"What's in a name?" Justice Barry T. Albin mused in the majority decision.

The answer, it seems, is a lot.

All seven justices were in vehement agreement that gay and lesbian unions must be guaranteed all of the rights and benefits that come with heterosexual marriages. And all agreed that it was the court's role, in interpreting the State Constitution, to ensure that gay partnerships were in every legal particular equal in status to marriage.

But the vocabulary, the majority continued, must be committed to politics. “If the age-old definition of marriage is to be discarded,” Justice Albin wrote in the decision, “such change must come from the crucible of the democratic process.”

The court gave the State Legislature 180 days to come up with legislation guaranteeing gay people a legal mechanism to have their unions recognized in identical practical terms as those afforded to heterosexual marriages. It left for another day the question of whether the contours of and, more important, the label attached to that mechanism would satisfy the State Constitution.

The three dissenting justices would have gone further and faster, insisting that gay people are entitled not only to the particulars of marriage but also to the symbolism that surrounds it. “We must not underestimate the power of language,” Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz wrote for the dissenters.

The majority opinion, legal experts said, has found a political sweet spot.

“This makes sense as statesmanship,” said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern University and the author of “Same Sex, Different States.” “The word ‘marriage’ seems to push people’s buttons in a major way.”

The high court in Massachusetts, the only state that allows gay marriage, ruled that civil unions were not an adequate substitute. In a 2004 decision, one of its justices boiled the dispute down to a single letter. “We have a pitched battle over who gets to use the ‘m’ word,” Justice Martha B. Sosman wrote in a dissent.

Though the seven gay couples who sued for the right to marry in New Jersey had insisted that nothing less would suffice and that marriage by another name was stigmatizing and discriminatory, their lawyers expressed satisfaction with yesterday’s result on a practical level.

“It’s a win,” said Susan L. Sommer, a lawyer with the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represents the couples. “We would have liked marriage tomorrow, but this is great progress.”

Opponents of gay marriage said they were troubled by what the court left open. “I sort of think this is a temporary reprieve,” said Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy. “The Legislature could do civil unions, but the court has reserved the right to rule two or five years down the road that that’s not good enough.”

As they looked forward, though, the two sides were focused on symbols as much as on legal rights.

The meaning of marriage is special, said Evan Wolfson, the executive director of Freedom to Marry, a nonpartisan gay rights group.

“You wear it on your hand,” he said. “Language matters. Symbols matter. One of the main protections that comes with marriage is the vocabulary that everyone understands.”

Ms. Gallagher used similar phrases to reach an opposite conclusion. “Ideas matter,” she said. “Marriage as a legal structure is not nearly as important as it is as an instrument of civil society.”

The major shortcoming in the majority decision, she added, was its failure to engage some of the possible values and social implications of marriage. “The court really refused to consider the idea that marriage has anything to do with procreation and paternity,” she said.

High courts in New York and Washington relied on those interests to justify bans on gay marriage in their states, but the New Jersey attorney general’s office, to the dismay of many opponents of gay marriage, did not press those arguments.

Should the State Legislature ultimately give gay unions a name other than marriage, Mr. Wolfson said, it would amount to discrimination. “I don’t think there is an American in the country,” he said, “who would cash in their marriage in exchange for a civil union.”

Mr. Wolfson said that the New Jersey Legislature should “end discrimination in marriage, not repackage it.”

In their dueling opinions yesterday, the two sets of justices agreed on at least this much: the meaning of a single word is now a crucial battleground in the culture wars.

What they disagreed about is who should decide what it means. The majority said it was the Legislature; the dissenters said the courts.

In an aside, though, Justice Albin noted that in any event, “same-sex couples will be free to call their relationship by the name they choose.”

The dissenting justices suggested the court’s failure to require gay marriage as such was tantamount to the endorsement of pernicious discrimination.

“Labels set people apart as surely as physical separation on a bus or in school facilities,” Chief Justice Poritz wrote.

Justice Albin responded that courts can do only so much. “Plaintiffs seek not just legal standing,” he wrote, “but also social acceptance.”

Gay Marriage Backers Plan Big Push To Sway Trenton Lawmakers (NYT)

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — The New Jersey Supreme Court may have conferred the rights of married couples to same-sex partners in a long-awaited decision on Wednesday, but it also made it clear that the fight for gay marriage did not end with its decision.

The next appeal for gay rights advocates, the court emphasized, "must be to their fellow citizens whose voices are heard through their popularly elected representatives."

The issue revolves around a single word — whether to call this newly constructed relationship, which has all the rights and obligations of marriage — a marriage.

But it will be far from simple when the issue lands a few blocks away at the State House, where the governor and the Legislature have 180 days, according to the court, to come up with an answer.

Gay rights advocates say they will press hard to call this new legal relationship a marriage and not something else, such as a civil union. Many conservatives, meanwhile, have promised to push for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage — just as some lawmakers are doing now in Massachusetts, where that state's Supreme Judicial Court validated a right to gay marriage in 2003.

And one Republican lawmaker in New Jersey has promised to seek the impeachment of all seven justices — an unlikely quest in the Democratic-controlled Legislature.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine and top legislative leaders — all Democrats — are on record as opposing gay marriage and saying they view marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

Two years ago, New Jersey Democrats managed to sidestep the gay marriage issue when they passed a domestic partnership law that offered same-sex couples some — but not all — of the rights that married couples have.

Now the issue is back, and there appears to be no getting around it. And for lawmakers, it comes as all 120 members of the Legislature face re-election in 2007.

Governor Corzine said he welcomed the court's conclusions, adding, "I look forward to the legislative process implementing the court's decision."

But in a joint statement, Richard J. Codey, the Senate president, and Joseph J. Roberts Jr., the Assembly speaker, indicated that Democrats would not go the extra step of defining the new legal partnership as a marriage.

Another top Democrat, Senator Raymond J. Lesniak of Union County, echoed that point. He said that he and other members of the party's caucus had discussed a compromise, which would extend the marriage rights to gay couples but classify their relationships as "civil unions."

"Marriage has been a religious institution adopted by the government and a lot of religions have defined it in a way that that excludes gays," Mr. Lesniak said. "That's not what the government does, and the court clearly demands that we offer gay couples the same rights and obligations that heterosexual couples have under our marriage laws. But we can do it in a way that respects people's religious beliefs."

A similar approach was used by Vermont legislators after that state's high court struck down gay marriage law according to William N. Eskridge Jr., a Yale Law School professor who has written extensively on the issue.

But partisans of both sides of the gay marriage divide say they would not be satisfied with that approach. Garden State Equality, which has lobbied for gay marriage rights, began airing a television commercial asking for "marriage equality."

Republicans, meanwhile, indicated that they will be wary about attempts to alter New Jersey's current domestic partnership law. State Senator Leonard Lance, the minority leader, said he thought the court was overstepping its bounds by ordering legislators to rewrite the law.

Although the battlefront has shifted to the State Legislature, the ruling nonetheless had some spillover into New Jersey's tight race for the United States Senate.

Both Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., his Republican challenger, oppose gay marriage, so it has not been an issue in their campaigns. But Mr. Kean responded to Wednesday's court decision by saying that he would favor a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. Mr. Menendez said that he supported civil unions and would oppose any constitutional amendment that would take away people's legal rights.

But the immediate response to the court's decision, he said, "is now up to the Legislature to decide."

New Jersey Court Backs Full Rights For Gay Couples (NYT)

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — New Jersey's highest court ruled on Wednesday that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples, but ordered the Legislature to decide whether their unions must be called marriage or could be known by another name.

In a decision filled with bold and sweeping pronouncements about equality, the New Jersey Supreme Court gave the Democratic-controlled Legislature 180 days to either expand existing laws or come up with new ones to provide gay couples benefits including tuition assistance, survivors' benefits under workers' compensation laws, and spousal privilege in criminal trials.

All seven justices agreed that the state's Constitution demands full legal rights for same-sex partners. But its ruling, 4 to 3, revealed a split in how to proceed. The majority said that lawmakers, not the court, should decide whether to call those arrangements a marriage, a civil union or something else. The three dissenters went further, asserting that gay couples, like their heterosexual counterparts, must be allowed to wed.

The New Jersey court did not go as far as Massachusetts, which in 2003 became the first state to permit gay marriage. Instead, it could be considered the new Vermont, which created civil unions for gay couples in 2000, in the politically, legally and culturally charged world of same-sex marriage.

"Our decision today significantly advances the civil rights of gays and lesbians," Justice Barry T. Albin wrote for the majority. "We have decided that our State Constitution guarantees that every statutory right and benefit conferred to heterosexual couples through civil marriage must be made available to committed same-sex couples."

But the ruling passed along the thorniest question, of whether true equality demands the same name, to the Legislature, saying "such change must come from the crucible of the democratic process."

Within minutes of the court's 3 p.m. announcement, three Democratic Assemblymen, working with Garden State Equality, a gay rights organization, said they would introduce a bill demanding marriage.

But reaction from their fellow legislators was guarded, with some saying privately that civil unions, not marriage, would be the likely result. In a joint statement, the Assembly speaker, Joseph J. Roberts Jr., and the Senate president, Richard J. Codey, both Democrats, called the 180-day deadline "unreasonable" and said, "The only remaining issues now confronting the Legislature are ones of terminology and clarification."

For people involved in the legal battle over gay marriage, the decision is an important shift from recent court rulings in New York, Washington state and California that essentially rejected gay couples' claims on marriage and the benefits it confers. And by issuing a nuanced and complicated 90-page ruling that left observers struggling to declare who won and who lost, the court may have neutralized gay marriage as an issue in the Nov. 7 elections, when eight states will consider ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage.

"The decision certainly minimizes what the radical right thought they might have had as a mobilizing tool in the last days of the election," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy organization.

Nathaniel Persily, who teaches law and political science at the University of Pennsylvania and was a co-author of a recent paper titled "Gay Marriage, Public Opinion and the Courts," praised the justices for "an incredibly smart and politically astute opinion."

"The court has placed itself exactly where a majority of the American people are," Professor Persily said. "A majority of Americans are in favor of equal rights for gays tantamount to marriage, but a majority is also against calling that relationship marriage."

At the same time, he added: "This must be seen as a win for gay rights. They did not get the name they want, but they are getting more rights than could have been imaginable just a few years ago. Who would have thought 50, 20, even 10 years ago that a unanimous state supreme court would have said that gay relationships are entitled to equal rights as heterosexual relationships?"

But conservative groups opposed to same-sex marriage blasted the ruling as an example of the justices essentially trading judicial robes for legislative pens.

"The court is holding a legal gun to the head of the State Legislature, and saying, 'Listen, there are two bullets, you get to pick the bullet: either gay marriage or civil unions,' " said Matt Daniels, president of Alliance for Marriage, an organization based in the Washington area that supports a federal Constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. "And that is not democracy. That is court-imposed policy-making that takes this out of the hands of the people."

Until now, courts in many other states — including the Court of Appeals in New York in July — had rejected similar lawsuits by same-sex couples, with the common rationale being that only the legislative branch can define or redefine marriage. No legislature has yet done that, though several states, including New Jersey, and dozens of cities and towns have enacted domestic partnership laws to grant gay couples some benefits in recent years.

Nineteen states have adopted constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage. Most others have statutory bans, but New Jersey and four other states do not. In addition to Massachusetts, where more than 8,000 gay couples have married in the past three years, Vermont and Connecticut authorize civil unions, which generally offer the same legal protections, if not the same societal status, as marriage.

Wednesday's ruling caps a legal journey begun in 2002, when seven couples who had been denied marriage licenses in their towns filed the lawsuit now officially known as Lewis v. Harris. Two lower courts rejected their constitutional claim, with the Appellate Division ruling in June 2005 that marriage between members of the same sex was neither a fundamental right nor one covered by the constitution's equal-protection clause.

Many gay-marriage advocates thought New Jersey's high court, which heard the case Feb 15, was their best shot at victory.

It is regarded as one of the most liberal and independent in the country, having been among the first to strike down a ban on sodomy and rule in favor of adoption rights for gay couples.

The 4-3 split on Wednesday did not break along traditional political lines: the majority included all three justices appointed by a Democratic former governor, while the three dissenters, who backed the more far-reaching solution of opening marriage to gays, were named by a Republican.

"We do not have to take that all-or-nothing approach," Justice Albin wrote of the marriage question in the majority opinion.

"We cannot find a legitimate public need for an unequal legal scheme of benefits and privileges that disadvantages same-sex couples," he said. "We cannot find that a right to same-sex marriage is so deeply rooted in the traditions, history, and conscience of the people of this state that it ranks as a fundamental right."

The court also expounded about the importance of equal treatment to protect children, diverging from the rulings of other state courts, which had said protecting procreation was one rationale for limiting marriage to heterosexual couples.

"There is something distinctly unfair about the state recognizing the right of same-sex couples to raise natural and adopted children and placing foster children with those couples," Justice Albin said, "and yet denying those children the financial and social benefits and privileges available to children in heterosexual households."

In the dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz argued that the semantic distinction of marriage versus civil unions was itself a meaningful one, arguing that the institution "bestows enormous private and social advantages."

Agreeing that same-sex couples deserve the same rights and benefits as heterosexual ones, she wrote that she "can find no principled basis, however, on which to distinguish those rights and benefits from the right to the title of marriage."

As the case now moves from the domain of the courts to that of the legislature, some parties are gearing up for a fight.

Several Republican legislators — including State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., who is in a close race to unseat United States Senator Robert Menendez — said on Wednesday that they would like to see an amendment to the State Constitution banning same-sex marriage. But with the Democrats in control of both legislative chambers, and Mr. Codey and Mr. Roberts voicing opposition, such a ban seems unlikely.

At the same time, Garden State Equality, the gay rights group, began its lobbying campaign for marriage immediately after the decision, buying several weeks of television time for a new advertisement that began appearing on cable Wednesday night.

The ad features a cancer-stricken police officer, Lt. Laurel Hester, recalling her fight for death benefits for her female partner. Ms. Hester, bald and struggling to breathe, taped the commercial before she died early this year. The ad concludes with words appearing on the screen that read, "Support marriage equality. Your gay neighbors are depending on you."

New Jersey Says Gay Couples Have The Same Rights As Straight Couples (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, October 26, 2006

By Stevenson Swanson

Chicago Tribune

(MCT)

NEW YORK - In a ruling that could make New Jersey the second state to legalize gay marriage, the state supreme court said Wednesday that gay couples have the same right to the benefits of marriage as heterosexual couples.

The court, whose decision had been awaited for months by advocates on both sides of the contentious debate over same-sex unions, said the state constitution's guarantee of equal rights applied to gay and lesbian couples, but it stopped short of ordering state officials to legalize gay marriage.

Instead, it gave the legislature until April to amend the state's marriage statute to include same-sex couples or to pass a civil union law that provides those couples the same benefits as marriage.

"We do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples," Justice Barry Albin wrote for the 4-3 majority.

"Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people."

The ruling is similar to a 1999 decision by Vermont's supreme court, which resulted in a civil union law. A 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court was more sweeping, making that state the first - and so far only - state with legalized gay marriage, starting in 2004.

Connecticut also allows civil unions between same-sex couples, the result of legislative action that was not prompted by a court ruling.

The case that resulted in the latest ruling was brought by seven same-sex couples who were denied marriage licenses in New Jersey. The dissenting justices, led by Chief Justice Deborah Poritz, argued that the majority did not go far enough, saying that only marriage would allow gay couples to achieve equal benefits.

In making its ruling, the court reflected on the changes that have transformed marriage during the last 200 years, such as granting women greater rights within marriage.

"The institution of marriage reflects society's changing social mores and values," the majority said in its opinion. "Although courts can ensure equal treatment, they cannot guarantee social acceptance, which must come through the evolving ethos of a maturing society."

After setbacks earlier this year in state courts in New York, Nebraska, Washington and Georgia, gay-marriage advocates greeted Wednesday's decision with relief.

"We received a unanimous decision on one aspect, which is that all seven justices agreed that it violates the guarantee of equal protection not to give same-sex couples the same benefits as heterosexual couples," said Jon Davidson, legal director of the gay-rights advocacy group Lambda Legal, which argued the case on behalf of the plaintiffs. "So now the struggle in New Jersey moves to the legislature."

Cases similar to New Jersey's are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa and Maryland.

Opponents of gay marriage said the New Jersey court had shown the same judicial arrogance as the Vermont and Massachusetts courts.

"It amounts to taking the future of marriage out of the hands of the people of New Jersey," said Matt Daniels, director of the Alliance for Marriage, which advocates amending the U.S. Constitution to define marriage as the union of a man and a woman. "Nationally, it will add momentum to the marriage amendments that are on the ballots across the country, and more importantly, it will add momentum to the marriage amendment in the Congress."

That amendment, which President Bush has endorsed, failed to garner support in two votes in the Republican-controlled Congress.

Political observers said the New Jersey decision, coming less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, could rally evangelical Christians and other conservative voters to turn out in heavier numbers than expected in the eight states where constitutional amendments defining marriage as a union between a man and woman are on the ballot.

Two of those states, Virginia and Tennessee, are seen as key battlegrounds in the struggle for control of the Senate.

But because the justices stopped short of ordering New Jersey officials to legalize gay marriage, the ruling's impact on the election could be diluted, even in the Garden State, which is in the midst of its own tight Senate race. Incumbent Sen. Bob Menendez, a Democrat, is being challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr.

"There was a sense that this could really reshape the Senate race here," said Tim Vercellotti, of the Eagleton Institute for Public Interest Polling at Rutgers University. "But this is a much more muted effect. I think it's going to be a close race, and I don't think this ruling is going to affect that."

Reacting to the ruling, Kean called for the state legislature to pass an amendment to the New Jersey constitution defining marrriage as a heterosexual union, similar to amendments that voters in 20 states have approved already.

Menendez said he believes marriage should be reserved for a man and a woman, but added that he supports civil unions for same-sex couples.

Three New Jersey legislators said they would introduce a bill to legalize gay marriage. The state already has a domestic partnership statute, which grants some rights to same-sex couples, such as the right to make medical decisions for each other and to file joint state income-tax returns.

Gov. Jon Corzine has said he supports domestic partnerships for same-sex couples, but has also said he would not sign a bill prohibiting same-sex marriage.

A June poll by Rutgers' Eagleton Institute found that New Jersey voters are almost evenly divided on gay marriage, with 49 percent of those polled supporting it and 44 percent opposed.

Support for civil unions was far stronger, with 66 percent in favor and 29 percent opposed.

NJ Court Grants Rights, Not Marriage, To Gays (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

NEWARK — New Jersey's highest court ruled today that same-sex couples deserve the same rights as married people, but stopped short of calling their partnerships "marriage," saying that decision should fall to the state Legislature.

"Raised here is the perplexing question — 'What's in a name?'" wrote Justice Barry T. Albin in the majority opinion. "We will not presume that a difference in name alone is of constitutional magnitude."

The 4-3 ruling comes as a partial victory for gay rights advocates, who had hoped New Jersey would legalize gay marriage outright, as Massachusetts' Supreme Judicial Court did in 2003. Instead, the court's decision gives New Jersey lawmakers six months to create the necessary statutes for same-sex partnerships, which may be called "marriage" or, as in Vermont, "civil unions."

Monte Stewart of the Marriage Law Foundation, which opposes gay marriage, said the ruling is further proof that the Massachusetts court was not representative.

"The courts increasingly are understanding that man-woman marriage is a vital social institution, and because meanings matter, they're not going to radically alter those meanings," he said.

In a sharply worded opinion that dissented with a portion of the majority decision, Chief Justice Deborah Poritz said the court should not sidestep the question of the word "marriage."

"Labels set people apart as surely as physical separation on a bus or in school facilities. Labels are used to perpetuate prejudice about differences that, in this case, are embedded in the law," she wrote. "Ultimately, the message is that what same-sex couples have is not as important or as significant as 'real' marriage."

In 2003, when Massachusetts' Supreme Judicial Court ruled that gay couples had the constitutional right to marry, many foresaw a legal domino effect, but since then, high courts in several states have rejected the notion.

The most recent rulings came in July, when high courts in Washington and New York upheld state laws limiting marriage to one man and one woman. In both cases, the majority opinion held that the state legislature should settle the matter rather than the courts. Majorities in each case found that there was a rational basis, based on procreation, to limiting marriage to heterosexuals.

Meanwhile, voters in 20 states sought to preempt pro-gay marriage rulings by explicitly banning the practice in their state constitutions. In November, seven more states will vote on statewide bans and seven more are considering such a move. The Legislature in Massachusetts — still the only state in the union to issue marriage licenses to gay couples -- may approve a citizen initiative against gay marriage, allowing voters to weigh in on the practice in 2008.

Still, gay rights advocates have achieved victories. In California and Maryland, judges have ruled that same-sex marriage was protected by the state constitution. Last September, California's Legislature passed a bill legalizing same-sex marriage but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed the measure, saying a higher court should decide it.

Court challenges are pending in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

Many observers — on both sides of the issue — have seen New Jersey as the state most likely to follow Massachusetts' lead.

The case, Lewis vs. Harris, began in 2002, when seven same-sex couples applied for marriage licenses and were denied. The couples then sued the officials who denied them, arguing that the state Constitution guaranteed their rights.

In November 2003 — a few days before the landmark Massachusetts decision — a Superior Court judge refused to strike down the ban, reasoning that though the right to marry is fundamental, based on tradition, the right to marry someone of the same sex is not "deeply rooted in our nation's history." In June 2005, a panel of three appellate judges ruled 2-1 that only the Legislature could enact a law allowing gays to marry.

Despite those setbacks, advocates have been optimistic about a ruling by the state's Supreme Court, which has made several noteworthy rulings in favor of gay rights. The Supreme Court has ruled that the Boy Scouts could not bar gay troop leaders — a decision that was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court. Moreover, the state has not advanced arguments against gay marriage that are based on procreation or child-rearing.

Much suspense has surrounded the release of the decision, which took place on the day Chief Justice Poritz turned 70, mandatory retirement age, and prepares to leave the court. During oral arguments in February, Poritz asked pointed questions of defendants about the "deep-rooted tradition" argument underlying their lower court victory.

"For a long time, women were property in the marriage relationship. For a long time, women could not make a claim of rape against a husband," she said. "There've been lots of ways in which the traditional idea of marriage has changed, so why would we simply defer? It's historical. It's over."

Jersey Court Orders OK Of Gay Unions (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The New Jersey Supreme Court yesterday said that although there was no right to same-sex "marriage" in the state constitution, homosexual couples were treated unequally by the state and that lawmakers must find a way to correct this.

"Although we cannot find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage exists in this state, the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state Constitution," said Justice Barry T. Albin, who wrote the 4-3 decision in Lewis v. Harris.

Justice Albin said the democratic process must decide "whether marriage or some other term" will be used to name the rights and benefits, but the high court gave state lawmakers 180 days to "amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples" or "create a parallel statutory structure" that will give such couples "on equal terms" the rights, benefits and obligations borne by married couples.

The long-awaited ruling was a disappointment to homosexual rights advocates, who were hoping the court would make New Jersey the second state after Massachusetts to legalize same-sex "marriage."

"Those who would view today's Supreme Court ruling as a victory for same-sex couples are dead wrong," said Steven Goldstein, head of Garden State Equality, a homosexual rights group in New Jersey.

However, he said, three state lawmakers are poised to introduce a bill to legalize same-sex "marriage" and "thousands of us will now hit the streets, the phones and the hallways to get this legislation passed."

All seven justices agreed that the current situation was unconstitutional, but the three dissenters wanted the court to directly create a marriage right for homosexuals.

Retiring Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz led the dissenters, saying that she could "find no principled basis, however, on which to distinguish those rights and benefits from the right to the title of marriage," adding that denying the homosexual couples the symbolism surrounding the word "marriage" was to "demean" them.

David Buckel of Lambda Legal, who represented the seven homosexual couple plaintiffs, was more optimistic, saying, "The bottom line here is that the entire court said that there must be a remedy for the inequality that bars same-sex couples from marriage."

It should be easy for the legislature to pass full marriage rights for same-sex couples, given the public's widespread support for the issue, he added.

Many social and religious conservatives described yesterday's decision as another loss for homosexual "marriage," but no one called it a total victory for their side either.

"This is a wake-up call for people who believe that marriage doesn't need constitutional protection," said Glen Lavy, a lawyer with the Alliance Defense Fund.

"This is probably the best decision we could have hoped for out of New Jersey, the court that thought it could order the Boy Scouts to accept gay scoutmasters," said Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy.

The high court "pulled a Vermont," said Len Deo, president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council, referring to the Vermont Supreme Court's 1999 ruling that forced state lawmakers to either enact same-sex "marriage" or a parallel system of benefits for same-sex couples. The ruling resulted in the nation's first civil union law.

In his majority opinion, Justice Albin said there was no constitutional right to same-sex "marriage."

"Only rights that are deeply rooted in the traditions, history and conscience of the people are deemed to be fundamental," he wrote.

The New Jersey Legislature, which has a Democratic majority in both chambers, already has enacted a domestic-partner law that gives same-sex couples hospital-visitation rights and health and pension benefits for state employees.

State lawmakers should "do the simplest, fairest and most sensible thing: include gay and lesbian couples within the existing framework of civil marriage," said Lee Swislow, executive director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders.

However, John Tomicki, head of the New Jersey Coalition to Preserve and Protect Marriage, said his allies will work to both stop enactment of same-sex "marriage" and put a constitutional marriage amendment on the November 2007 ballot.

Party Lines Are No Guide To Opinions By Justices (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — It is not always easy to identify partisan fault lines in New Jersey. In the New Jersey Supreme Court, it is all but impossible, and nothing reflects that more clearly than Wednesday's 4-to-3 decision on same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0086784

Three justices appointed by a Republican governor would recognize the full status of marriage for same-sex couples. And of the three justices appointed by a Democrat — a gay Democrat, at that — none would go that far, and they joined in the majority opinion.

To obscure any partisan alliances even more, each contingent included Republican and Democratic justices.

Their opinions in Lewis v. Harris, the case decided on Wednesday, showed once again that, as one former associate justice, Peter J. Verniero, put it, "the political label dissipates very quickly when someone is appointed to the Supreme Court."

New Jersey's highest court has often been described as liberal, and, what is probably more important to the other branches of state government here, assertive. In its history, the court has gone where few others have in prescribing educational programs and state aid for poor school districts, for example, and in ordering the state's 566 municipalities to accept their "fair share" of low-cost housing.

Wednesday's decision, said Laurence H. Tribe, a constitutional scholar at Harvard Law School, "is consistent with the best traditions of the New Jersey court, not simply following what some perceive as a trend, but reasoning independently."

The court's independence, some analysts say, is notable because so many of its members over the last several decades have come from the state's executive branch.

Of the seven members of the court, Chief Justice Deborah T. Poritz served for a time as Gov. Christie Whitman's attorney general, and Justice Jaynee LaVecchia was Mrs. Whitman's commissioner of banking and insurance. And two of the justices served under Gov. Brendan T. Byrne: Virginia Long, also as commissioner of banking, and James R. Zazzali as attorney general. All were appointed by Governor Whitman.

Gov. James E. McGreevey, who is gay, appointed three of the justices: Barry T. Albin, who was a criminal defense lawyer; John E. Wallace Jr., who served as a Superior Court judge; and Roberto A. Rivera-Soto, who had spent his career in private practice.

By tradition, the court is balanced between Republicans and Democrats, and appointments have generally alternated between the parties regardless of who is governor. But the court that ruled in this decision was slightly out of balance by having two Republicans, Chief Justice Poritz and Justice Rivera-Soto; one who is unaffiliated, Justice LaVecchia; and four Democrats.

The court's membership will shift slightly upon Chief Justice Poritz's retirement on Thursday, her 70th birthday. Justice Zazzali, a Democrat, is to replace her, while the newest appointee, Helen E. Hoens, a Republican, will take his seat.

But while party identifications matter in the selection of justices, Mr. Verniero said, "it's just very difficult to predict how individual members are going to decide issues."

"If you listen to arguments before the court and close your eyes," he added, "it's difficult to tell which justice asking the questions is a Republican and which is a Democrat."

In Wednesday's decision, two McGreevey appointees and Justice LaVecchia joined the other McGreevey appointee, Justice Albin, in his majority opinion, while Chief Justice Poritz, who wrote a separate concurring and dissenting opinion, was joined by Justices Long and Zazzali.

During her 10-year tenure, Chief Justice Poritz has been generally known as a consensus builder on the court. Yet she sometimes dismayed Republican legislators, most notably when she wrote a unanimous opinion allowing the Democratic Party to replace Senator Robert G. Torricelli's name on the ballot a month before Election Day in 2002, making way for the election of Frank R. Lautenberg.

Chief Justice Poritz was also the author of a 1999 decision, later reversed by the United States Supreme Court, requiring the Boy Scouts of America to retain a gay assistant scoutmaster. And she wrote for the majority in a 2000 opinion striking down a parental notice requirement for minors seeking abortions.

An 'I Do' From McGreevey? He Would. (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 25 — Yes, he would.

That was the reaction of former Gov. James E. McGreevey when asked on Wednesday whether he would marry his partner if the New Jersey Legislature — in the aftermath of the State Supreme Court decision that same-sex couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexuals — decides that gay marriage will be honored.

After gathering his thoughts, Mr. McGreevey said that while he had no plans to marry his partner immediately, he did feel that a ceremony would be in his future.

"Yes," said Mr. McGreevey, who now lives in Plainfield with Mark O'Donnell, an Australian businessman. "Marriage would offer the ability to bless our relationship in a committed way."

Beyond discussing his own plans, Mr. McGreevey, 49, also predicted that the ruling would have a major effect on young people struggling with social mores and sexuality, much as he did while growing up.

"What it means, personally to me, for my partner, traveling around the country, talking to gay youth, is the basic notion that when the court embraces the constitutionality of gay marriage, there's a fundamental understanding that gay relationships are quote, unquote, as good as straight relationships," he said.

Mr. McGreevey acknowledged that he was a "gay American" when he resigned as governor in 2004. And in his best-selling memoir, "The Confession," he discussed the lengths to which he went to mask the fact that he was gay for four decades.

When he was governor, Mr. McGreevey opposed same-sex marriage, although he did support domestic partnership legislation that was approved in 2004. He said he now regrets his lack of initiative then.

"I only wish I had had the fortitude to embrace this basic right when I was governor," he said.

As for marrying Mr. O'Donnell, 43, his partner since September 2005, friends said that there were certain considerations. First of all, they said, Mr. McGreevey would have to be legally divorced from Dina Matos, his second wife.

N.J. Supreme Court Punts Same-Sex Marriage To Legislature (LAW)

By Michael Booth, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, October 26, 2006

New Jersey on Wednesday stopped short of becoming the second state in the nation to legalize same-sex marriage by judicial fiat.

The state's high court, while declaring unconstitutional state laws that deny same-sex couples the financial and social benefits and privileges given to married heterosexuals, held that fixing the problem is a legislative task -- and gave lawmakers 180 days in which to do it.

"At this point, we do not consider whether committed same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, but only whether those couples are entitled to the same rights and benefits afforded to married heterosexual couples," a divided court wrote in Lewis v. Harris, A68-05.

"Cast in that light, the issue is not about the transformation of the traditional definition of marriage, but about the unequal dispensation of benefits and privileges to one of two similarly situated classes of people."

The justices did not require the Legislature to amend the civil marriage statutes to include same-sex couples but only to come up with a statutory scheme that affords same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those statutes.

The court offered the Legislature the option of either amending the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or enacting a parallel statutory structure by another name.

"We will not presume that a separate statutory scheme, which uses a title other than marriage, contravenes equal protection principles, so long as the rights and benefits of civil marriage are made equally available to same-sex couples," Justice Barry Albin wrote for the 4-3 court. "The name to be given to the statutory scheme that provides full rights and benefits to same-sex couples, whether marriage or some other term, is a matter left to the democratic process."

The court warned that the state cannot make entry into a same-sex civil union any more difficult than it is for heterosexual couples to enter marriage, but said any parallel scheme can be regulated, similarly to marriage, to restrict civil unions based on age and consanguinity and to prohibit polygamous relationships.

Chief Justice Deborah Poritz, on the day of her retirement from the court, filed a partial dissent joined by two other justices. The dissenters disagreed with the majority's conclusion that there is no fundamental due process right to same-sex marriage encompassed within the concept of "liberty" guaranteed by article I, paragraph 1 of the state constitution.

The justices modified but affirmed dismissal of the suit, brought by seven same-sex couples, most of whom have children, that were denied marriage licenses by local clerks or vital-statistics registrars in 2002. The suit charged that New Jersey laws restricting marriage to male-female unions violate equal protection of law and fundamental rights.

The court found that denying marital-type rights to same-sex couples bears no substantial relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose, the standard of judicial review for encroachments on the equal protection clause of Article I, Paragraph 1, of the New Jersey Constitution.

The courts below had found no legal or historical basis for same-sex marriage nor anything to suggest that the framers of the federal or state constitutions considered it a fundamental right to be accorded special protection. Furthermore, the federal Defense of Marriage Act eschews the concept, raising the prospect that same-sex marriage decrees would not be accorded full faith and credit nationwide.

The state attorney general had argued that New Jersey's 2004 Domestic Partnership Act conveyed rights synonymous with those of married couples and thus satisfied constitutional requirements. By that statute, similar to laws in Vermont and Hawaii, New Jersey recognized civil unions among same-sex couples and some heterosexual couples.

The attorney general also argued that changing marital laws that have pre-existed the nation's founding required an act of the Legislature, and the court agreed.

To date, all but one state Supreme Court that has considered the issue -- Massachusetts -- has disagreed. Courts in Arizona, Washington, D.C., Indiana, Kentucky, Minnesota, New York, Washington state and most recently California have rejected challenges.

The Hawaii Supreme Court held in 1993 that the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples established a sex-based classification that required strict scrutiny under equal protection analysis. On remand, a trial court held the limitation in violation of the state constitution, but the case was halted when the electorate approved a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

In 2000, the Vermont Supreme Court likewise punted to the state's Legislature, holding that denial of benefits incidental to marriage to same-sex couples violated the state constitution's "common benefits" provision but that the violation could be remedied by legislation extending the benefits flowing from marriage to same-sex couples. The Vermont Legislature responded with a civil-union law in 2004.

A Ruling For Equality In New Jersey (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

The New Jersey Supreme Court brought the United States a little closer to the ideal of equality yesterday when it ruled that the state's Constitution requires that committed same-sex couples be accorded the same rights as married heterosexual couples. It stopped short, however, of ruling that same-sex couples have a right to "marry," leaving the question of what to call same-sex unions up to the State Legislature.

That omission will disappoint some gay-rights advocates, but there is no reason for lawmakers not to apply the term marriage to these committed relationships, and they should do so swiftly. Meanwhile, the court decision is an important step forward.

New Jersey already has a civil-unions law, but it gives same-sex couples fewer rights than married couples. Same-sex couples are penalized financially, in areas like employer-provided health benefits and inheritance taxes. They are also disadvantaged socially and in practical, day-to-day ways. One of the plaintiffs in the case had trouble getting her partner into a hospital emergency room with her when she was sick.

The court required the Legislature to level the playing field in every respect but one. It said lawmakers can call relationships between partners of the same sex marriage, or something else. This page supports gay marriage, but we also know it will not be recognized instantly. New Jersey's delay is unfortunate, but at least it makes it hard for anti-gay forces in the state to mobilize against the decision. The court ruling secures important rights, and paves the way for the full equality that will no doubt come.

New Jersey's Step Forward (WP)

IN REQUIRING that state law grant the same benefits to same-sex couples that it gives to married ones, the New Jersey Supreme Court has given the Garden State a nudge down a road it was already traveling. For those, like us, who support same-sex marriage, such steps are welcome. There is no good reason why same-sex couples in loving and committed relationships should not be granted affirmative recognition from state governments -- recognition that carries with it the rights and responsibilities of marriage. The New Jersey court unanimously pushed in a direction we would like to see all states ultimately go.

What role judges should play in that process is always a difficult question, and yesterday's decision will no doubt spark controversy. So it is worth emphasizing that the judicial impetus here is actually a gentle one. New Jersey's legal landscape -- both its case law and the statutes passed by its legislature -- was already fairly advanced. The state has a robust set of anti-discrimination protections for gay men and lesbians, and it has a domestic partnership law that confers many of the benefits of marriage on same-sex couples.

What's more, the court specifically declined to require that marriage itself be available to same-sex couples -- provoking a dissent from three justices who would have gone further and simply mandated marriage rights. Instead the judges distinguished between the right to marriage and the rights and benefits flowing from marriage. They argued that it makes no sense "on the one hand, [to give] gays and lesbians full civil rights in their status as individuals, and, on the other, [to give] them an incomplete set of rights when they . . . enter into committed same-sex relationships."

The New Jersey legislature has not -- as was the legislature in Massachusetts after its court acted in 2003 -- been denied the democratic prerogative of deciding state policy on this question. It could, if it chooses, do as little as extend the state's domestic partnership law to confer additional rights on same-sex couples. Or, it could create civil unions or extend marriage rights themselves. Like all actions by state supreme courts, the decision affects nobody outside New Jersey and is ultimately subject to the will of the people of that state, who are free to change their constitution if they dislike their court's view of it -- as many other states have done on this issue. In other words, the court has required only a modest step, one to which the people's representatives will decide how to respond.

Coming, unfortunately, only two weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, this nuanced decision risks getting lost beneath angry rhetoric about activist judges and protecting marriage. That would be unfortunate. No reasonable reading of this decision could argue for, say, changing Virginia's constitution to ban same-sex marriages that are already illegal there or for adding a noxious amendment to the federal Constitution. It argues only for letting the residents of New Jersey digest what their court has said and decide how best to make same-sex couples equal under the law.

Expanded DNA Collection Eroding Civil Liberties, Panel Says (AAS)

By Patrice Relerford, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, October 26, 2006

Efforts can invade privacy, put stress on already overworked crime labs.

WASHINGTON — Dramatic expansions in the collection and retention of DNA by state and local law enforcement officials threatens individual privacy rights and racial justice, a panel of legal experts concluded Wednesday.

A four-member panel of lawyers and DNA experts, including New York lawyer Barry Scheck and Helen Wallace of Genewatch UK, spoke about the subject as part of a discussion sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Experts characterized law enforcement officials' efforts to add samples to DNA databases as a slippery slope regarding privacy rights, and they criticized expansions at the state and local level of what they referred to as permanent, rogue databases not tied into the FBI's national DNA index.

"You've got to be smart about crime, smart about using these databases and smart about protecting civil liberties," Scheck said.

Panel members, including the ACLU's science advisor, Tania Simoncelli, said expansion efforts are eroding the performance of crime labs, which already face months or years of backlogged evidence.

"If you put that stress on them they're going to cut corners," said Scheck of overworked lab workers.

Scheck also pointed to a scandal surrounding the Houston Police Department's crime lab as proof that DNA evidence is not impenetrable.

This summer, independent investigator Michael Bromwich concluded that crime lab officials in Houston failed to report the results of DNA tests that did not corroborate suspects identified by police in more than 20 cases beginning in the 1980s.

Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, was selected to investigate the crime lab in 2005. Houston's lab was closed for more than three years after errors were exposed in the lab divisions that test firearms, body fluids and controlled substances.

Scheck said two men were released from prison based on the lab's misconduct, and he praised the department's efforts to identify problems.

Last year, Gov. Rick Perry signed a law that established the Texas Forensic Science Commission to investigate the quality of forensic evidence. The move is expected to help the state qualify for federal forensic science improvement grants.

"I think the answer is putting more teeth into these types of institutions," Scheck said. "Someone should look at Texas."

Abortion Ban Looms Large On S.D. Ballot (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 26, 2006

IRENE, S.D. — Georgia Kaufman is against abortion. She's torn, though, about the referendum on the Nov. 7 ballot that will decide whether the USA's toughest abortion restrictions will become law or be repealed.

“I personally do not believe in abortion,” says Kaufman. “I'm very proud that South Dakota is the first state to step forward and say ‘no.' ”

Still, she thinks it's wrong to make abortion illegal for women who have been raped or are victims of incest. The law would allow an abortion only if a woman's life is at risk. “I'm wrestling with that tremendously,” says Kaufman, 37, a waitress at the Irene Bar & Grill.

How Kaufman votes and the outcome of the referendum will reverberate outside conservative South Dakota. If voters uphold the law, which also would make it a felony for doctors to perform abortions unless the woman's life is in jeopardy, Planned Parenthood plans a lawsuit asserting the ban is unconstitutional. Supporters of the ban would use the case to challenge Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

California and Oregon have ballot measures that would require parental consent for minors to have abortions, and voters here will vote on gay marriage and allowing medical use of marijuana. The abortion ban, though, has generated the most debate and passion.

Republican Gov. Mike Rounds signed the law in March. Opponents gathered signatures to put the issue on the ballot. The latest statewide poll in July showed 47% of voters opposed the ban and 39% supported it; 14% were undecided. Both sides expect a close vote.

The latest round of ads has each side calling the other liars. The lead group supporting the law, Vote Yes for Life, is running TV and radio ads and mailing postcards that say it gives women "the option of terminating pregnancies that are the result of rape or incest."

The South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, which organized the repeal vote, says the law would allow rape and incest victims to use emergency contraception before a pregnancy could be detected, since they would not be able to have legal abortions.

At the Pump 'N' Stuff gas station and coffee shop in this town of 400, a half-dozen men crowd around the only table and explain their mixed feelings.

"I heard that if a woman gets cancer, she can't take chemo" under the law because it might harm the fetus, says Dale Korslund 68. "It should be a private deal, not a state or federal thing." Daryl Erickson, 50, isn't sure how he'll vote. "If the gal's raped, then (abortion) should be done," he says. "If not, no." Bill Ryken, 74, says the debate "gets to you after awhile."

National groups that support abortion rights have sent staffers to South Dakota. At the commons at the University of South Dakota in Vermillion, Kelsey Collier-Wise, 25, a law school student, was registering voters with help from Jessie Raeder of Los Angeles, who works for the Feminist Majority Foundation. Monday was the final day to register to vote in November's election. The table had stickers and flyers saying the ban "threatens women's lives." Collier-Wise says they have registered "hundreds of students" since August.

Sophomore Gina Cooper, 19, registered and left no doubt about her vote: "I believe firmly from past experiences with friends that abortion needs to be an option for women."

Ruth Herman is just as emphatic. She spends a couple hours every day helping at the headquarters of Vote Yes for Life in Sioux Falls. Herman, 56, who lives in Hartford, had an unplanned pregnancy 38 years ago and the baby was adopted. She's grateful abortion wasn't an option, because if she had one, "I would have regretted that the rest of my life. I see no reason for an abortion unless of course the mother's life is in danger, and this law will cover that."

Leslee Unruh, campaign manager of Vote Yes for Life, believes her side "has the momentum." Women who have had abortions and regret it are calling voters. Aqua-and-white yard signs reading "Vote Yes for Life" are ubiquitous even on country roads.

Most of the group's donations are from South Dakotans, she says, and she's not getting much help from national groups. Abortion opponents are "no longer looking at national leadership," she says. "They're thinking they can do it themselves in their own state."

Jan Nicolay, a former state legislator who runs South Dakotans for Healthy Families, says the group has sought donations from national abortion rights groups and their supporters. On Election Day, Planned Parenthood will test a text-messaging system that will send results to supporters across the nation.

Neither Nicolay nor Unruh will say how much they have raised or spent; campaign-finance reports are due next week. Nicolay expects a close vote. "We said from the beginning this would be challenging," she says. "It's very emotional, it's very personal."

Outside South Dakota's only abortion clinic, on the west side of Sioux Falls, protesters carry signs with photos of a dismembered fetus and take photos of everyone who enters the Planned Parenthood facility. The pictures will be posted later on a website.

Inside, about a dozen women sit in the waiting room. The clinic performs about 800 abortions a year, says Kate Looby, Planned Parenthood's state director. "While this election may have national implications," she says, "right now all that matters is that we maintain access to safe and legal abortion for the women of South Dakota."

Back in Irene, Kaufman knows the stakes are high: "I can see both sides. My decision could still go either way."

New Voting Systems Face Midterm Exam (WSJ)

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

November 7 may be the most problem-free Election Day ever -- or maybe not.

DOJ_NMG_0086789

Four years ago, still stinging from the "hanging chad" troubles of the 2000 presidential vote, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act. The new law gave the states $3.8 billion to replace punch-card and mechanical-lever voting machines, and to set up statewide voter lists to resolve election-day questions over who could vote and where.

States and counties bought a variety of new voting systems with the federal money, including optical scanners that read paper ballots and, in at least 34 states, touch-screen machines.

Two weeks before elections, voting-equipment makers and many election clerks say the new technology will eliminate lost or spoiled ballots and buoy voter confidence. "It gets better each time" voters use the new equipment, says Betty Ireland, West Virginia's secretary of state.

But groups that track voting laws and practices are warning of problems that could cost or lose votes. A Princeton University study has ignited additional worries that a hacker could alter results on the touch screens, although voting-machine makers -- led by Diebold Inc., the largest of a half-dozen manufacturers -- reject the possibility.

Here are some scenarios that could spell trouble on Election Day:

New equipment, elderly poll workers: Although Congress gave the states until next month to use the federal money, many either ordered or received equipment only this year. That means that 88 million potential voters will be casting ballots on unfamiliar machines, says R. Doug Lewis, director of the Election Center, an association of election officials.

That isn't likely to create problems for most voters. Touch screens lead voters through the ballot with a series of easy prompts. After Georgia installed Diebold touch screens in 2002, Diebold says the state's error rate -- the percentage of uncountable votes -- dropped to 0.4% from 3.5% in 2000.

In recent elections, though, the new equipment has sometimes baffled election workers, who are often retirees. In 2004, Carteret County, N.C., poll workers didn't notice the warning lights indicating a touch screen's memory was full, for example, and lost 4,438 votes.

Ohio, like many states, included a demand this year for paper ballots recording each vote cast on a touch screen. But in Cuyahoga County this spring, poll workers loaded the paper incorrectly, and -- because the paper ballot is the official tally in Ohio -- lost 10% of the votes.

Tarrant County, Texas, recorded 100,000 extra votes in 2004 because of software programming errors, says New York University's Brennan Center, which studies voting issues. In Florida's Palm Beach County in 2004, circuits became overloaded, backup batteries on the voting machines wore down and some votes were lost before anyone noticed, the Brennan Center says.

Larry Norden, a lawyer with the center, says the glitch that worries him most is the one "that goes undetected." In Mercer County, Ohio, this fall, votes cast for Democrats went instead to Libertarians because of a programming error. That was relatively easy to catch, he says, but a glitch that gave a few thousand Democratic votes to Republicans or vice versa might be harder to notice.

That is worrisome because many races are close, and control of Congress hinges on relatively few seats. Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law, which tracks election issues, says touch screens are being used in 22 of the 27 congressional races it estimates are the closest.

Voters who can't vote: In Montgomery County, Md., this fall, election officials neglected to equip polling stations with voter cards -- the electronic swipes that allow voters to access their ballots on a touch screen. Faced with long waits, some voters left in frustration.

Election groups warn that could happen elsewhere if equipment failures, poll-worker inexperience or new identification requirements create delays that discourage voters. The biggest bottleneck could be the statewide voter lists, which states are developing by compiling their county voter lists, matching them with Social Security and drivers-license databases, and purging the new list of voters who have moved or died.

But the job is complicated, and many state voter lists are being used for the first time. When New York tested a preliminary list in 2004, it found data-entry mistakes in 20% of the registrations, says Justin Levitt of the Brennan Center.

Most states plan to flag the name of a voter when databases don't agree -- when birth dates don't match, for example -- and let the voter correct the discrepancy at the polls or later, at the county elections office. But public-interest law groups say they will file lawsuits if lots of voters are kept from casting ballots by mistake.

New recount delays: Wary about losing votes on their new touch screens, 27 states recently passed laws requiring a "paper trail" as part of the technology. Diebold -- typical of other manufacturers -- equipped its voting machines with a roll of banking ATM paper. After a voter casts a touch-screen ballot, it's printed for the voter to see, then spooled into the machine.

But there's no technology to machine-read the paper ballots, which instead must be unspooled and read by election workers. In Ohio, recounting 300 of the thousands of primary-elections spools took two days. Nevada election workers said they needed four hours to recount one spool of 64 ballots.

In a disputed election it could be days or weeks before a winner is declared. "That's not going to enhance voter confidence; it will diminish it," says Ohio State law professor Daniel Tokaji.

A hack attack: Bloggers have long warned that a hacker could infect touch screens with a virus that alters the vote totals. That scenario took on new seriousness last month when a Princeton University computer professor showed a congressional committee how he infected the memory on a Diebold touch screen -- causing votes to automatically switch from one candidate to another -- after opening the machine with a key he bought on the Internet.

Diebold has dismissed the Princeton demonstration, saying it was on an early model touch screen with old software and that it ignored "normal security procedures" like broken security tags that would alert election workers to a break-in. "These things are tested to the hilt" for security vulnerabilities, says Mark Radke, marketing director for Diebold's election-products unit.

But other computer scientists and security experts have criticized Diebold for denying them access to its software for testing and for dismissing the possibility of a "rogue" election worker tampering with a touch-screen's software. That warning was renewed this week when a former Maryland legislator received an anonymous package containing the reportedly stolen computer code that ran the state's 2004 poll.

Voting Machines Had Defective Part (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The maker of Maryland's electronic voting system replaced a flawed electronic component in several thousand touch-screen voting machines in 2005, state election officials acknowledged this week.

To eliminate unpredictable "screen freezes" that have occurred since the machines were first used in Maryland in 2002, Diebold Election Systems installed new system boards in about 4,700 voting machines from four Maryland counties: Allegany, Dorchester, Montgomery and Prince George's.

The screen freezes do not cause votes to be lost, officials said, but they confuse voters and election judges who sometimes wonder whether votes cast on a frozen machine will be counted.

The acknowledgment of the repairs came in response to queries from The Washington Post and sheds further light on Maryland's troubled transition to electronic voting. Critics said it raises concerns about whether the state and company officials have kept the public adequately informed about problems with a system that cost taxpayers $106 million.

State officials said this week that they learned after the November 2004 election that a flawed system board was the source of the screen-freeze problem. But documents show that Diebold had diagnosed the problem early that year.

Ross Goldstein, deputy state elections administrator, defended Diebold's handling of the problem. "They have updated all the units, and the problem has been resolved," he said.

Mike Morrill, Diebold's Maryland spokesman, said the company had not completed its research into screen freezes until early 2005, when it agreed to replace all the system boards as the only way to guarantee that the problem would not recur.

He said the flawed system boards were confined to the four counties because other counties received machines with updated system boards. Montgomery experienced screen freezes more often than the others, Morrill said.

The screen freezes are unrelated to the problems experienced in September's primary, when Diebold's electronic voter-registration machines rebooted without warning in every Maryland precinct. The rebooting was caused by a software defect, which Diebold says has been corrected.

Even so, the two leading candidates for governor -- Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) -- have called on voters to use absentee ballots in the election, citing uncertainties about the reliability of Maryland's system.Disclosure Issues

State and Diebold officials have been discreet in discussing the replacement of the system boards -- the core electronic component of the voting machines -- to address the screen freezes.

Morrill, the Diebold spokesman, said the company had "publicly disclosed" information about the problem and its solution in communications with the State Board of Elections staff, including a six-page letter from an executive to state Administrator of Elections Linda H. Lamone written in reply to her questions about the system boards.

But the minutes of the July 12, 2005, meeting of the election board said only that a "technology refresh" would be conducted to bring voting units from the four counties "up to the same specifications as the equipment in the later phases of the implementation." The minutes did not mention the replacement of thousands of system boards.

Board Chairman Gilles W. Burger and members Joan Beck and A. Susan Widerman said they do not recall being told that system boards would be replaced as part of the technology refresh.

Burger said Lamone should have brought the replacement of the system boards to the board's attention. "If she withheld this information from the body she reports to, I think she is not carrying out her duties as a public official," said Burger, who in 2004 sought with other Ehrlich appointees to oust Lamone, a move that was blocked in court.

Goldstein said board members could have learned the details of the technology refresh. "If they had asked, we would have told them," he said.

Within the company's Maryland offices, executives tried to keep confidential any discussion of the need to replace system boards, according to four former Diebold contractors interviewed in recent weeks.

On Dec. 6, 2004, Tom Feehan, Diebold's Maryland project manager, replied to a subordinate's e-mail that referred to Diebold engineers in Ohio replacing system boards in "failed units" from Montgomery. Feehan's three-sentence reply was sent to the subordinate and two other employees who had received the original message.

"All, Please delete all copies of this e-mail," said Feehan's message, a copy of which was obtained by The Post. "It should have been sent confidential. Call me for further specifics."

Morrill said Feehan was concerned that the original e-mail "portrayed a decision as if it had been a final decision when in fact it was not made yet." Morrill said that "there was no secrecy" attached to the review of the system board problem and that at the time of the e-mail, Feehan was discussing the problem with state board staff members.

Diebold's upper echelon also appeared reluctant to discuss problems, according to several Maryland legislators who met privately with company executives in February 2006.

The executives attended an off-the-record session with members of the election law subcommittee of the House of Delegates to discuss the feasibility of Maryland switching to a system that would provide a paper record of each vote in time for this year's elections.

Del. Jean B. Cryor (R-Montgomery) said she asked the Diebold executives several questions, including whether there had been hardware defects in Maryland voting machines. "They assured us that everything is fine," she said.

Del. LeRoy E. Myers Jr. (R-Washington) said that as at other sessions with executives of the company, "it was always 'no problem, no problem, no problem.' "

Morrill said Diebold executives have always made clear that "we've upgraded technology constantly on our machines, both in Maryland and in other states."A Record of Trouble

Under a 2001 contract with the state, Diebold sent nearly 4,700 electronic voting machines to the four counties in the first phase of Maryland's transition to a uniform electronic voting system.

In Sept. 10, 2002, primary elections, the machines had their first outing in Maryland. Montgomery's Board of Elections received 59 calls from precincts to report machines out of service. In the 2002 general election, the board received 53 such calls. Many of the machines were shut down after their screens froze, county officials said.

On February 1, 2004, Diebold's Maryland office issued a document, "Weekly Update of Montgomery County Root Cause Failure Analysis," that said the screen-freeze error "has been identified as a 'hardware' failure." The memo said no definitive single cause had been isolated but added that "replacement of the system board did resolve the problem."

The memo was obtained from the State Board of Elections through a lawsuit filed by Linda Schade, an activist with a group called TrueVoteMD. The group has tried to push Maryland to adopt a system that provides a verifiable paper trail of each vote cast.

A second Diebold memo provided by the board to Schade, dated March 28, 2004, blamed a "specific batch of RAM chips used in the manufacture of a quantity of system boards." It added that "batch-level tracking" was not used in the manufacturing process, so "it is impossible to identify or predict the occurrence of [system board] failures."

The second memo said 156 system boards had been replaced to address a variety of problems. Relative to the 16,000 Diebold voting machines in Maryland at the time, the memo said the 156 replacements represent a failure rate of 0.97 percent. "This is not a case of defective production units being released for shipment," the memo said. (A 2005 Diebold letter revised the number of system boards replaced to 129.)

Maintenance records obtained by The Post show that Diebold technicians in Ohio replaced an additional 133 system boards from June to November 2004, including those in machines that had experienced screen freezes.

By the 2004 general election, the screen-freeze problem had not been solved. Montgomery reported 106 screen freezes on Election Day, meaning that 4 percent of the 2,500 machines deployed in the county were affected.

The problems prompted another "root cause failure analysis" by Diebold. In February 2005, the screen-freeze problem was again identified as a "hardware issue," according to a memo. A March memo promised that the company would "implement permanent corrective or preventive action."

National Federation Of The Blind Files Target Lawsuit (USAT)

By Laura Parker
USA Today, October 26, 2006

Bruce Sexton is blind. He would like to shop on Target's website, but says he can't "read" it. He says the site lacks certain coding — found on many other websites — that would activate software to allow blind computer users to hear audio descriptions of what is on Internet pages.

Sexton, 24, who lives in Berkeley, Calif., and the National Federation of the Blind are suing Target on behalf of the 1.3 million blind people in the USA. The suit alleges that the giant retailer discriminates against the visually impaired by violating state and federal laws that protect the disabled.

The case draws national attention because it could have implications for virtually every retailer and business in the USA that operates a website. The case also fuels a wider debate starting to play out in courtrooms: whether anti-discrimination laws apply to the Internet.

It's a key question in lawsuits across the nation. Craigslist.org, a popular advertising and networking website, is being sued in federal court in Chicago over allegations it has allowed ads for apartments and other housing that discriminate on the basis of race, sex, class, religion or familial status.

In court papers, Craigslist argues it is protected by the federal law that protects website owners from liability for content posted by the sites' users. Craigslist CEO Jim Buckmaster has said it would be impossible for the site's staff to review the 2 million free housing ads posted to the site each month. A hearing in the case is scheduled for Nov. 13.

In the Target case, the retailer contends that the federal Americans with Disabilities Act and two California laws cited by Sexton apply only to its brick-and-mortar stores and do not extend to the Internet.

Last month, a federal judge disagreed with Target and rejected its bid to dismiss the suit. The case is proceeding toward trial, but no court date has been set.

The recent ruling was "very significant," says Brian Blair, an Orlando lawyer who specializes in defending companies accused of violating laws that protect people with disabilities.

"For any business that has a physical location and a website, (the ruling) says you need to take reasonable steps to permit accessibility for the disabled," says Blair, who is not involved in the dispute.

Blind or visually impaired people are able to use the Internet by installing "reader" software on their computers that searches for codes embedded on websites.

The codes enable text and graphics to be read or described audibly. The software also lets the blind navigate sites by using keystrokes instead of a mouse. Such functions have not been available to blind users of target.com, court papers say. Because Target's website has required the use of a mouse, blind customers have been unable to make purchases on the site.

Target.com has "thousands of access barriers that make it difficult, if not impossible, for blind customers" to use the site, the suit says.

The Americans with Disabilities Act requires stores, restaurants and other businesses to provide access to people with mental and physical disabilities. Since the Internet emerged, several lawsuits have focused on what site owners should be required to do to make their pages accessible to the disabled.

A lawsuit filed by the National Federation of the Blind against America Online in 1999 was dropped after AOL agreed to design new versions of its software to accommodate disabled users.

In 2002, Southwest Airlines fended off a similar challenge after a Miami judge found that federal disability law did not apply to the airline's website because a "virtual" ticket counter is not a physical place. Southwest's Brandy King says the airline opposed the lawsuit because it believed its website complied with federal disability law. Since then, she says, Southwest has added more coding to the site to help the blind.

Andrew Langer, manager of regulatory policy for the National Federation of Independent Business in Washington, said the cost of changing a website to accommodate disabled viewers often is not significant for large companies. He said companies often fight such lawsuits for philosophical reasons.

Businesses want to attract customers, he says, "but they want to do it on their own terms. You want to make decisions for your business without being coerced."

Langer says that as retailers get more savvy about the Internet, "more are going to be making sure their websites are readily accessible to the blind," he says.

Carolyn Brookter, a Target spokeswoman, declined to discuss the lawsuit. In an e-mailed statement, Brookter said the retailer is "making online enhancements that will benefit all our guests, including those with disabilities." She added that "one of the things the enhancements will do is further increase the usability of the website for guests with sight disabilities." She did not elaborate or say when the changes would be made.

Sexton says he visited Target's site two weeks ago to see whether it had been improved. “They've made some minor changes,” he says. “But they haven't made it an easy or enjoyable experience for me.”

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

Bury the hatchet

Inside the Beltway has learned that NAACP Chairman Julian Bond, who has repeatedly denounced the Republican Party and conservative black leaders alike, will come face-to-face this evening with U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Janice Rogers Brown. Judge Brown was nominated to her position by President Bush and is frequently mentioned as a possible Supreme Court nominee.

The two are among three prominent black leaders being saluted at a reception for the White House Fellowships program, hosted by conservative commentator Armstrong Williams in his Northeast Washington home.

Renowned neurosurgeon Dr. Benjamin Carson of Johns Hopkins Hospital fame is the third honoree.

Mr. Williams, who sits on the President's Commission on White House Fellowships, was unavailable for comment yesterday, however a spokesman in his office stressed that "there will be no gauntlet -- politics will be put to the side for this celebration of White House fellows."

To the best of his knowledge, the spokesman said this will be the first time Mr. Bond and Judge Brown have met.

Mullah rocks

That was syndicated columnist Mark Steyn -- "The man who likes to poke the world in the eye," blared one recent headline -- belting out a Rod Stewart classic while a guest on "Bill Bennett's Morning in America" radio show this week.

Discussing his gloomy new book, "America Alone: The End of the World as We Know It," Mr. Steyn was waxing on the hypocrisy of Islamism and recalled how U.S. military forces discovered vintage eight-track tapes of Mr. Stewart's music in Taliban leader Mullah Omar's compound after the liberation of Afghanistan in 2001.

Suddenly, Mr. Steyn broke into song, riffing on the Stewart hit, "Da Ya Think I'm Sexy."

Mr. Bennett's producer, Seth Leibsohn, told the Beltway: "It was a unique moment for a talk show, but not so unique for Bennett's show, where the former education secretary often breaks into song given his love of '50s rock and roll."

Audio of Mr. Steyn's spontaneous performance can be heard at bennettmornings.com.

Tacky reporting

Sheryl Stolberg, White House correspondent for the New York Times, learned the hard way this week to stick to reporting on President Bush and keep her interior-decorating critiques to herself.

"Your [reporting] pool is informed that some readers took offense to the previous pool report's description of the pool hold in Boca [Raton, Fla.], which shall not be repeated here. Upon reflection, it seems an apology is in order to those who open their homes so that we might do our jobs. Please excuse your pool's lack of graciousness. Good manners sometimes slip away after a tiring day."

What on earth did she file in her initial White House pool report about Mr. Bush's trip to Florida? Read for yourself:

"Fancy gated neighborhood called The Sanctuary, with big stucco houses. Jordan Zimmerman, founder and chairman of Zimmerman advertising, was the host. Your pool was holed up at the next door neighbor's house, where there was a verrrrrry expensive Bentley and a less expensive Mercedes in the garage. We were in the pool room. Very big, but tacky decor, in the humble view of your pool."

Place your bets

The 2008 presidential elections are still two years away, but as President Bush observed at his press conference yesterday, every possible major party candidate and then some are being weighed by all the pundits and their mothers.

Will Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, run and become the first woman president? Or might Illinois Sen. Barack Obama win his party's nomination and become the nation's first black commander in chief?

Obviously, it's anybody's guess -- including who the ultimate Republican nominee will be. Still, it's always fun to ponder, as political analysts at Intertops.com do with their updated odds on who will become the next president:

ANTITRUST:

FCC Likely To Avoid 'net Neutrality' Debate In AT&T-BellSouth Merger Decision (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, October 26, 2006

As the Federal Communications Commission mulls conditions on AT&T Inc.'s $83 billion merger with BellSouth Corp., the commission faces pressure to turn the process into a fight over network neutrality, the concept that Internet service providers like AT&T should treat all traffic the same.

It's pressure, experts add, that the FCC is likely to resist.

Net neutrality proponents — consumer groups and Internet companies like Google, among them — worry San Antonio-based AT&T wants to create a two-tiered Internet where it picks which sites thrive and which flounder.

And some now view the debate over deal conditions as their golden opportunity to make AT&T sign off on net neutrality protections before it closes the largest telecom deal in history.

"(AT&T) wants this merger to happen before the end of the year," said Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, which filed comments Tuesday asking the FCC to make AT&T treat all Internet content equally. "I think that's the biggest card we hold."

The FCC originally was set to rule on the merger Oct. 12, but pushed back its vote to Nov. 3 after commissioners reached an impasse over what conditions, if any, to impose on the deal. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin proposed approving the merger without conditions, but the two Democrats commissioners said they wanted to see consumer-friendly safeguards.

In response, AT&T offered a set of conditions to which it would agree, including making speedy Web access available for $10 a month if bundled with phone service and not increasing rates competitors pay to access its networks.

Competitors and consumer groups had until Tuesday to file remarks about the AT&T proposals.

Analysts said they would be surprised if the FCC deviates too far from the conditions AT&T has already offered up — especially into territory as controversial as net neutrality. So far, the Justice Department and 18 states have approved the transaction, making the FCC its last regulatory hurdle to clear.

"I think pretty much what AT&T proposed will be accepted," said Patrick Comack, telecom analyst for Zachary Investment Research in Miami. "The Democrats on the FCC want to show they won something for consumers, but they aren't going to end up pushing AT&T around too much, especially on net neutrality."

While the FCC faces pressure to do something about net neutrality, analysts say the AT&T-BellSouth merger is unlikely to be the forum where it chooses to do so. Congress debated net neutrality this year amid heavy lobbying from the telecom and tech industries but never brought legislation to a floor vote.

"The FCC is not going to set policy for a whole industry based on concessions on one merger," Frost Bank analyst Le Keough said.

AT&T blasted the net neutrality demands, saying that they "smack of public relations-driven opportunism as opposed to a thoughtful approach to policymaking." In its proposed conditions, AT&T said it would abide for 30 months by net neutrality rules the FCC adopted last year.

"The proper place to be debating the pros and cons of net neutrality is in the U.S. Congress or in an industry-wide proceeding at the FCC," said Jim Cicconi, AT&T senior executive vice president external affairs.

Even some merger critics said they're not holding out hope that the FCC will make the company sign off on stringent new net neutrality guarantees. More realistic to expect, they add, are conditions that would offer consumers low-cost broadband and protect rivals that sell to business customers inside the merged AT&T-BellSouth's territory.

"This particular FCC has basically done nothing to stop these mergers," said Bruce Kushnick of watchdog group TeleTruth. "They're not going to make any controversial requirements at this point, especially not on something like net neutrality."

The FCC is split 3-2 in favor of Republicans, but one Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, will abstain from the vote since he previously worked for a group that represented AT&T and BellSouth competitors. That gives the panel an even partisan split.

FPL Group, Constellation Energy Call Off Their $12.5 Billion Deal (WSJ)

By Andrew Dowell And Christine Buurma

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

FPL Group and Constellation Energy Group called off their $12.5 billion merger, as state regulators' concerns about rising power prices scuttled another major utility deal.

The decision follows Exelon Corp.'s move Sept. 14 to scrap its $17 billion acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group for similar reasons and makes clear that any deal making in the sector faces a high hurdle.

FPL said it will focus on organic growth rather than mergers in the wake of the failed deal. FPL spokeswoman Mary Lou Kromer said the company will consider acquiring nuclear-power plants and wind farms to build out its wholesale power-generation business.

Shares of Baltimore-based Constellation were down 19 cents, or 0.3%, to $62.37, while shares of Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL were up $1.60, or 3.3%, to $49.77 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Constellation, the company being acquired in the transaction, asked to call it off because of uncertainty over whether the deal could win regulatory approval in Maryland, the companies said.

The companies both said they have strong prospects as separate operations.

The merger, announced in December, faltered after being caught up in partisan battles between Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich and the Democrat-controlled state Legislature. In June, state lawmakers passed a law that disbanded the Ehrlich-appointed Maryland Public Service Commission after the commission approved a 72% rate rise for Constellation's utility subsidiary, Baltimore Gas & Electric.

In September, the Maryland Court of Appeals ruled that the Legislature couldn't fire the commissioners. But the court left intact a provision of the law that prevents the commission from ruling on the FPL-Constellation deal until its members are replaced, leaving regulatory review of the merger uncertain.

Investment bankers and utilities expected a series of mergers in the fragmented industry, after a Depression-era law limiting utility mergers was repealed last year. The biggest obstacle to deals getting done has proved to be state officials seeking large concessions from utilities over concerns about record electricity rates.

Plug Pulled On Md. Utility Deal (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Political uproar in Maryland over rising electric utility rates has derailed plans for the $12.4 billion takeover of Constellation Energy Group Inc., owner of the state's largest utility, by a Florida company.

FPL Group Inc., owner of Florida's biggest utility, yesterday abandoned its proposed acquisition after Constellation of Baltimore suggested that the two companies drop the merger because of "continued uncertainty over regulatory and judicial matters in Maryland and the potential for a protracted and open-ended merger review process."

The proposed takeover, unveiled in December, has been at the center of a political brawl in Maryland, made more intense by a request this year by Constellation's Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. unit for a 72 percent increase in electric rates. Litigation was continuing, and Maryland's Public Service Commission still needed to approve the FPL merger.

"It's been a long time in coming, and I'm not surprised," Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) said yesterday. He blamed Democratic legislative leaders for creating uncertainty with a law that temporarily lowered rates and dismissed the state's utility regulators. Maryland's highest court later reinstated the PSC members but let stand a provision of the legislation that prevented those members from ruling on the merger.

The coming elections were unlikely to alter the outlook. Democrats are expected to retain control of the state legislature. And Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, has vowed to fire the PSC members, who he said yesterday had showed an "utter lack of leadership and professionalism."

The end of the merger does not mean any relief for Maryland ratepayers, who still face sharply higher energy costs in a deregulated electricity market. Though rate increases were limited by the legislature this year, the full amount of higher costs will take effect Jan. 1, 2008. Moreover, ratepayers will not receive $21.4 million a year in cost savings from the merger that Constellation had promised to pass on during the next decade. Those savings were supposed to show up starting in January. Cancellation of the merger also makes it more likely that Constellation will reopen negotiations with the legislature on another $386 million in dispute.

But consumer groups critical of Constellation said that the sum would deflect only a small portion of the full rate increases that will be phased in over the next 14 months and that BGE customers were better off without the merger.

Johanna Neumann, a policy advocate at Maryland Public Interest Research Group, said "the blocked merger is a victory for BGE ratepayers." She said the merger "would have created an energy giant large and powerful enough to dictate electric rates" and that "the risk of skyrocketing electric bills far exceeded Constellation's paltry pass-on of savings."

The collapse of the FPL-Constellation deal highlights the difficulty of merging two utilities, despite the 2005 repeal of the Depression-era Public Utilities Holding Company Act (PUHCA) that many experts had predicted would lead to a major consolidation of the industry. Last month, Exelon Corp. dropped its $17.8 billion bid for Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. after failing to come to an accord with New Jersey regulators.

"There was a lot of enthusiasm after the repeal of PUHCA that all the barriers [to mergers] were gone," said Robert Burns, senior researcher at the National Regulatory Research Institute at Ohio State University. "That is simply not the case. There are still regulatory hurdles to go over and a lot of those hurdles are appropriate. State commissions want to make sure their ratepayers are protected."

Though many analysts had anticipated the merger's cancellation, it was not clear why it occurred now. "There was no particular tipping point or precipitating event," said Paul Allen, senior vice president of corporate affairs at Constellation. "There was no clearly identifiable path forward for obtaining approval. We needed to get on with running our business."

Some sources close to the companies said the collapse of the merger took place during a culture clash between the button-down Constellation and the more freewheeling FPL, especially in dealing with Maryland legislators. FPL chief executive Lewis Hay III said at a conference last month in New York that FPL had "limited patience" left with the Maryland legislature, and on Oct. 4 FPL filed suit against the state and the PSC to force a timely review of the merger.

Hay and Constellation chief executive Mayo A. Shattuck III were "like Felix and Oscar," said one person familiar with the companies who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his business relationship with them.

But the two chief executives praised each other yesterday in a joint statement, and a Constellation executive said style or corporate culture had nothing to do with the merger's cancellation. "With any two companies, you are going to be able to find differences of style and approach," Constellation's Allen said. "But the deal was a good idea. The transaction made sense. We just couldn't see a path to getting it done."

Constellation and FPL have reorganized over the past few years to take advantage of the partial deregulation of electric utilities. While local utilities used to own their power-generating plants, those plants have now been spun off into companies or, in the case of Constellation and FPL, subsidiaries. With high energy costs, those power generators have been demanding higher prices from utilities, which must then pass them on to customers long used to stable rates. The result has been big profits for power generators and wholesalers, and rate shock for consumers.

By taking over Constellation, FPL would have greatly expanded its reach, and Constellation would have gained financial muscle.

"FPL and Constellation didn't make any bones about it. FPL wasn't interested in the local [Baltimore] utility," said Theresa Czarski, the deputy at the Office of the People's Counsel. "It was interested in Constellation's generating assets."

After spending tens of millions of dollars on lawyers and investment bankers, the two firms are going separate ways.

Analysts say that Constellation remains an attractive business on its own. It has a fleet of relatively low-cost power generation plants, including nuclear, and its energy wholesale business markets electricity across the country to industrial and big commercial customers.

"On a stand-alone basis, we believe the stock is undervalued," Citigroup Inc. analyst Greg Gordon said in a report issued yesterday. He said the main risks to the company were the volatility of energy prices and further legislation limiting rate increases in Maryland.

FPL also asserted that it would grow on its own. Like Constellation, it has a large and profitable energy wholesaling business and its Florida Power and Light utility has been adding about 100,000 customers a year; it now has 4.4 million customers. FPL also has a unit in the wind-farm business.

"We are very much focused on continuing to grow those businesses and will be able to continue to provide shareholder value for some time," said Mary Lou Kromer, FPL's vice president for marketing and communications.

Constellation shares closed yesterday at $62.37, down 19 cents a share. FPL shares closed at $49.77, up $1.60 a share.

Yankee Candle Agrees To $1.4 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Yankee Candle Co. agreed to be acquired by a private-equity firm for $1.4 billion, plus the assumption of $300 million of debt.

The South Deerfield, Mass., maker of scented candles and home fragrances said Madison Dearborn Partners LLC will buy it for $34.75 a share, in a deal expected to close in the first quarter. Yankee Candle shares soared $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The company in July said it had hired Lehman Brothers to help it explore alternatives, including a possible sale. Yesterday, Yankee Candle's chief financial officer, Bruce Besanko, said the auction attracted "multiple interested parties," but he declined to be more specific.

Credit Suisse analyst Paul Lejuez said the deal came sooner than expected and the price was surprisingly high, possibly "an indication that private equity is willing to accept a lower rate of return than one would typically assume."

Madison Dearborn managing director Rob Selati said the Chicago private-equity firm will work with the company's current management to "build on Yankee's brand strength and to capitalize on the significant growth opportunities ahead."

Yankee Candle also said third-quarter net income fell 3.2% to $14.9 million, from $15.4 million a year earlier. With fewer shares outstanding in the latest period, per-share earnings improved to 37 cents from 35 cents. Sales rose 17% to $159.6 million, with same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, up 8%.

Milberg, Weiss & Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Milberg Weiss is under federal indictment, but that doesn't mean the class-action specialist isn't still making legal mischief. A case in point is Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston, in which Milberg has even managed to get part of the Bush Administration on its side. Someone in the White House should be embarrassed about this one.

In Billing, Milberg is suing investment banks on behalf of investors who participated in dot-com era IPOs that later went south. The case has been dismissed once, only to be reinstated by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals and is now headed for the Supreme Court. But the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has sided with Milberg, even as the SEC has submitted briefs in defense of the banks.

The Supreme Court has asked the Solicitor General to provide the government's view of the case -- but the question is, which arm of the government? Our sources say that, sometime in the next few days, the SG's office will file a brief recommending that the Supremes overturn the appeals court -- meaning, in short, that the SEC will have won the turf war. But the brief is being circulated within the Administration, so things could still change.

To understand how the SEC and Justice ended up on different sides, some background is in order. The plaintiffs allege that investment banks during the dot-com era engaged in anticompetitive practices violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. Some of the alleged collusion sounds like standard IPO underwriting -- creating a syndicate, building a pre-IPO order book, et cetera.

Some of it, if true, probably crosses the line. In this second category are activities such as requiring IPO investors to buy additional shares after the stock starts trading, punishing those who sell quickly by denying them access to future IPOs. But here's the rub: Such behavior is already barred by securities regulations handed down by the SEC. Milberg Weiss's innovation was to sue on behalf of investors in an antitrust class-action, rather than under securities laws. This creates the nifty potential of a treble-damage award for the plaintiffs (and their lawyers, natch).

The trial judge threw the case out on grounds that this was a securities-law problem, not an antitrust action. When Milberg Weiss appealed, the Second Circuit -- which is vying with the Ninth Circuit in creative law-making -- asked Justice and the SEC for their views. They took different sides, and the Second Circuit ruled for Milberg and the Antitrust Division.

Beltway turf battles are nothing new, but grown-ups in the executive branch are supposed to settle them. For a Bush Administration that has long called for reining in the trial lawyers, allowing its own Antitrust Division to aid Milberg in another abuse of the tort system is an amazing legal and political abdication. We hope somebody at Justice is making sure that the Solicitor General's brief in Billing argues against giving the trial bar an expansion into the antitrust field.

Radio Chain Said To Weigh Selling Itself (NYT)

By Ken Belson And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

The Mays Family, which built Clear Channel Communications into the country's largest network of radio stations through decades of acquisitions, is in negotiations to be taken private by a consortium of investors for more than $18.5 billion, people involved in the talks said yesterday.

The investors, who have been in discussions with Clear Channel for months, include Providence Equity Partners, the Blackstone Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, these people said.

The negotiations come as family- controlled media companies across the nation explore the possibility of selling their companies or taking them private. Cox Communications, the cable company based in Atlanta, went private in 2004. Cablevision, which is controlled by the Dolan family, is in the middle of negotiations to become private.

Clear Channel said yesterday in a statement that it was "evaluating various strategic alternatives to enhance shareholder value." The company has hired Goldman, Sachs & Company as its financial adviser.

Other potential suitors have emerged in recent days. They include Cerberus Capital Management, Oak Hill Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, people briefed on the negotiations said. Now that the company is seeking alternatives, other suitors, including big media companies, could surface.

As of yesterday, Clear Channel had a market capitalization of $16.1 billion, thanks partly to an 18 percent surge in the company's stock since Aug. 9 amid speculation about a sale. Yesterday, shares of Clear Channel rose 15 cents, to $32.35.

Even with the rise in the company's shares, the company could still receive a 15 percent premium through a sale, according to Eileen Furukawa, who covers the company for Citigroup Global Markets. That would represent an offer of about $37.30 per share.

Clear Channel's shares, however, have declined during the last half-decade, reflecting the steady defection of radio listeners who are spending more time listening to iPods and visiting Web sites and writing e-mail messages. Radio stations are also under threat from subscriber-based networks like XM Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio.

More than 9 out of 10 Americans still listen to traditional radio stations, but the amount of time people tune in has slid 14 percent over the last decade, according to Arbitron ratings.

The steady dilution of radio listeners is a far cry from 1972, when Lowry Mays, the company's chairman, founded Clear Channel. A former investment banker, he bought several channels in San Antonio, where the company still has its headquarters. In 1984, the company went public and earned a reputation for turning around depressed stations.

The Federal Communications Commission in 1992 loosened rules on owning radio stations, paving the way for Clear Channel to sweep up more stations. The company now has more than 1,200 stations, and owns a substantial number of billboards and other outdoor advertising.

The company generated $6.6 billion in sales in 2005. Its stations include Z100 in New York and KISS-FM in Los Angeles.

As Clear Channel has grown, it has come under attack for homogenizing radio entertainment by standardizing playlists, playing too many commercials and not running enough local news. This in part spurred the growth of satellite-based subscription services like XM Radio.

In 2004, L. Lowry Mays stepped down as chief executive and one of his sons, Mark, took over. Another son, Randall is the company's chief financial officer. Before joining Clear Channel, he worked in the mergers and acquisitions department at Goldman Sachs.

Last year, Clear Channel sold 10 percent of Clear Channel Outdoor Holdings, its advertising unit, in an initial public offering. The company also spun off Clear Channel Entertainment, an events producer, to shareholders.

Big Law Firms From 2 Coasts Move Closer To A Merger (NYT)

By Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Two major law firms — Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe — came closer to walking down the aisle yesterday.

Top committees of the two firms recommended a deal, the two said yesterday. The combined firm would be called Dewey Orrick, with 1,500 lawyers and offices around the world. Together, they would form the seventh-largest law office in New York, and have revenue around $1 billion, the firms said in a joint statement.

The merger would be the latest in a wave of consolidation among law firms.

A merger "gives us a stronger geographical reach, complementary practice areas and gives us financial strength to continue to build practice areas," the chairman of the management and executive committees, Morton A. Pierce, said.

Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., said: "This will create a new and highly unusual, if not unique, value proposition for our clients. Few firms will match the depth we'll have."

Some terms of the deal are not yet final, and it is subject to approval by each firm's partners. Mr. Pierce said the firms hoped to obtain approval by mid-December, paving the way for Dewey Orrick by Jan. 1. The Wall Street Journal reported the move by the firms' top committees yesterday.

Based on details released yesterday, while Dewey's name will have first billing, the new partnership will retain Orrick's signature green "O" logo. Mr. Morton and Mr. Baxter will serve as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking the additional title of presiding partner.

At a glance, Dewey and Orrick seem like opposite-coast reflections of each other. Both have long histories: Dewey's name is that of the former New York governor and presidential candidate Thomas E. Dewey, while Orrick is one of San Francisco's oldest law firms, founded in 1863.

Dewey Ballantine, a 550-lawyer firm with 11 offices, earned $392 million in revenue and $1.24 in profit per equity partner last year, according to the May issue of The American Lawyer. Orrick, with 950 lawyers in 18 offices, reported $554 million in revenue and $1.24 million in profit per equity partner in the same period.

Both have prominent corporate deal making and litigation practices. Dewey is considered a specialist in mergers and acquisitions; it advised the hospital operator HCA in its $33 billion leveraged buyout, and the Walt Disney Company in its $7.4 billion purchase of Pixar Animation.

A main Orrick niche is in advising companies on debt financing, leading The American Lawyer's list for advising municipal bond underwriting deals. Its clients on several capital market transactions and restructurings last year included Bear Stearns, Banc of America Securities and J. P. Morgan Chase.

Growing Funds Fuel Buyout Boom (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Already Biggest, Blackstone Pool Will Raise Additional $4.4 Billion As Firms Seek Larger Targets

Accelerating the buyout boom and putting some of the world's biggest public companies in reach, Blackstone Group has decided to increase the size of the world's largest private-equity fund to $20 billion.

The move by Blackstone, which already had raised a record $15.6 billion for the fund from investors, secures bragging rights for now in an industry that has several other giants looking to create funds of $15 billion or more.

But there is much more than pride at stake: Private-equity firms have been on a tear lately, buying up publicly traded businesses with the intention of making them more profitable -- frequently by aggressively cutting costs -- and then selling them for big gains, either to other companies or to public shareholders via new stock listings. Fifteen out of the top 20 buyouts on record have been announced in the past 18 months, and private-equity firms this year have accounted for 17% of all major mergers and acquisitions.

Now, all but the largest public companies are potential acquisition targets, especially given the growing trend of "club deals" involving multiple private-equity firms. Their increased financial firepower -- aided by heavy borrowing at low rates by companies they own -- has giant buyout firms already eyeing takeover targets with stock-market values of $50 billion or more, say people familiar with the matter.

Investment strategists who compile lists of potential targets in recent weeks have pointed to hardware giant Home Depot Inc., computer maker Dell Inc., and semiconductor maker Texas Instruments Inc. In Europe, investment bankers point to other big names, including Vivendi SA of France, BT Group PLC, the British telecommunications company, or even food giant Unilever, which is based in the U.K. and the Netherlands.

The largest-ever private-equity purchase remains the iconic $25.1 billion acquisition in 1988 of RJR Nabisco by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. Close behind: this year's agreement by KKR, Bain Capital LLC and Merrill Lynch & Co.'s private-equity arm to purchase U.S.-based hospital chain HCA Inc. for $21.3 billion.

Just a year ago, the biggest private-equity funds had little more than $5 billion. Blackstone's previous fund, one of the world's largest at the time, was $6.45 billion, raised in 2002. Blackstone declined comment.

Private-equity firms raise money from deep-pocketed investors, including pension funds, university endowments and wealthy families. The firm's managers make money through fees imposed on their clients -- usually about 1.5% of how much they invested -- and on their companies, along with dividends they have those companies pay. Then they get a big cut of the profits when they sell companies, frequently via lucrative new initial public offerings of stock.

The firms used to raise new funds every five years or so, but now that pace has quickened to as often as every two years, keeping a constant flow of new money pouring in as old investments are cashed out. "We are seeing a significant privatization of corporate America," said James Westra, a lawyer with the Boston office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP, who works closely with private-equity firms.

So far this year, about $159 billion has been secured for new buyout funds world-wide, according to Thomson Financial. The firms have spent $421 billion on buying companies this year, up from $253 billion in all of 2005.

Over the past decade, private-equity funds have average investment returns of 17% a year, Thomson Financial data show, though the biggest funds generally do much better.

Blackstone's move likely will ramp up the race for bigger funds. Carlyle Group of Washington, D.C., is targeting a single fund of $15 billion, but may now opt for a larger size. KKR of New York has several initiatives going which will raise a total of as much as $25 billion, though not in a single fund. Texas Pacific Group has a new $15.2 billion fund. Spokesmen for Carlyle, KKR and TPG all declined to comment.

Martin Halusa, chief executive of private-equity firm Apax Partners Worldwide LLP of London, has said that a $100 billion fund is foreseeable.

Founded in 1985, Blackstone now employs 750 people world-wide. In addition to running private-equity funds, it offers investors slices of hedge funds, and operates a group that helps revamp troubled companies.

It decided to reopen its new $15.6 billion fund to investors because it was approaching a limit on how much it can spend each year. The firm promises its clients that it won't invest more than 40% of its money a year to avoid betting too much at once.

Among institutions that have invested in the new fund: Government of Singapore Investment Corp.; CALSTRS, or the California State Teachers' Retirement System; Calpers, or California Public Employees Retirement System; and the Canada Pension Plan.

The new megafunds likely are to intensify criticisms among some investors, especially about the fees that private-equity firms charge. Several investors in Blackstone's previous funds say they are opting out of this one, citing those fees.

Some investors say the fees allow private-equity firms to prosper even if their deals tank, separating investors' interests from the firms'.

"A lot of models are set up just to generate fees," said Joe Landy, co-head of New York private-equity firm Warburg Pincus LLC, at a recent conference. Warburg doesn't charge the companies it controls such fees.

These firms are subject to increasing public scrutiny. Several firms have received preliminary inquiries from the U.S. Department of Justice regarding possible collusion on deals involving multiple funds teaming up. Blackstone hasn't received an inquiry, a person familiar with the matter says.

Private-equity firms used to be disadvantaged in bidding wars for companies, because buyers in the target's industry could wring greater cost efficiencies out of their purchases, so they could afford to bid more. That is what happened last year when private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC bid for Maytag but was beat out by Whirlpool Corp.

That balance recently has swung in favor of private-equity firms, which in turn will fuel their ability to buy ever-bigger companies. The reason: The debt markets are extending financing to the private-equity firms at a cheaper rate and on more flexible terms, allowing the private-equity firms to offer more. Private-equity firms recently have paid as much as 20% over their acquisition's current share price.

Many in the industry say things will only slow down when lenders raise rates or stiffen terms.

"What drives private equity today is how much leverage you can put on your companies," says Robert Kindler, head of mergers and acquisitions for Morgan Stanley. "At some point the merry-go-round has to stop."

NYSE To Buy Rest Of Amex Tech Stake (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

NYSE Group Inc. plans to buy the one third of its technology unit that it doesn't own for about $40 million from the American Stock Exchange, according to people familiar with the matter.

NYSE, which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will become full owner of Securities Industry Automation Corp., or SIAC, with the transaction. Amex and NYSE have been negotiating for months to complete a deal.

Both markets see the move as necessary as electronic trading and technology become crucial to gaining business for exchanges now structured as for-profit companies. In that environment, the sharing of technology between two exchange rivals became unpalatable.

NYSE wanted full control of the subsidiary, which handles the exchanges' communications networks and computer systems among other things. Amex gets cash to build its own technology, which it is hoping to roll out later this year after getting regulatory approval.

The deal will make it easier for NYSE to integrate its communications and market-data operations with those of Archipelago Holdings Inc., the electronic-exchange operator that the Big Board merged with in March. Analysts say cost cutting and layoffs are possible at the unit as NYSE tries to expand profit. A deal could close as soon as next month.

NYSE is also hoping to merge with pan-European exchange operator Euronext NV, and a good chunk of the more than $250 million in cost savings anticipated from that deal will come from reducing the number of technology platforms.

SIAC may be further restructured if NYSE finishes its deal with Euronext, which depends on a shareholder vote and is facing some political opposition in Europe.

German Regulators Say No To Coherent Buy (AP-YBIZ)

German Regulators Say No to Coherent's Proposed $376M Acquisition of Excel

NEW YORK (AP) -- Coherent Inc., a Santa Clara, Calif.-based maker of lasers for commercial and scientific uses, said Wednesday German regulators are prohibiting its $376 million acquisition of Excel Technology Inc.

Although the acquisition had passed U.S. antitrust authorities, the German Federal Cartel Office issued a prohibition order on the deal.

"While we are clearly very disappointed and disagree with the FCO's decision, we remain committed to accomplishing acquisitions that meet all our criteria for growth, diversification and financial performance," said John Ambroseo, Coherent's president and chief executive, in a statement.

The deal, announced in February, valued Excel, a maker of electro-optical and laser systems used for scientific, industrial and medical purposes, at $30 per share.

The acquisition was expected to close in the June quarter.

Shares of Coherent were trading at $35.60 in the after-hours session, down 9 cents from Wednesday's closing price of $35.69 on the Nasdaq. Excel shares finished the Nasdaq session unchanged at $29.

German Regulator OKs Metro-Wal-Mart Deal (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

FRANKFURT, Germany --Metro AG's deal to buy Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s German operations received approval Wednesday from Germany's antitrust regulator, clearing the way for an acquisition that will expand Metro's presence in its home market.

The Federal Cartel Office approved the deal after deciding the addition of the 85 Wal-Mart stores would not give Metro a dominant position in the market.

The deal calls for Duesseldorf-based Metro to take over 19 pieces of Wal-Mart real estate and lease the remaining locations. Neither company has disclosed the deal's value.

Metro will fold the stores, which had sales of nearly euro2 billion in 2005, into its Real hypermarket brand. The first conversions are set to be finished before Christmas, and the rest should be integrated by mid-2007.

The addition of Wal-Mart's warehouses and logistics systems is expected to strengthen the position of Metro's existing 550 Real stores in the German market.

Metro operates more than 2,100 stores in 30 countries worldwide.

The deal, announced in July, marked Wal-Mart's second withdrawal from a major foreign market.

In May, it pulled out of the highly competitive South Korean market. The Bentonville, Arkansas-based retailer is concentrating on expanding in China and Central America.

Wal-Mart entered the German market in 1997 with the acquisition of the Wertkauf and Interspar hypermarket chains. But the German stores, which employ 11,000 people, struggled to break into the local market.

Shares of Metro were down less than half a percent to euro45.64 (US$57.24) in Frankfurt trading.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Military Tells Panel Stryker Unit Is Vital (HSB)

By Gregg K. Kakesako

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 26, 2006

An environmental group and Hawaiian activists want a halt to all related activities

Government lawyers say that halting Schofield Barracks' $1.5 billion Stryker unit would do "irreparable harm" to the Army, soldiers of the 2nd Brigade and the nation's security.

They oppose a motion by island environmentalists and Hawaiian activists who want the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to approve a temporary order halting all work on Stryker-related activities in Hawaii.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys Andrew Mergen and Michael Gray on Monday said "national security concerns" are more compelling today than they were on Nov. 5, 2004, when a federal court judge rejected environmentalists' first petition for a preliminary injunction.

The Army argued that the 2nd Brigade is scheduled to become a "fully manned, trained and equipped Stryker Brigade Combat Team, ready for deployment by November 2007."

Lt. Gen. John Brown, who heads Army troops in the Pacific, wrote in a letter published Monday in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin that the combat deployment will be to Iraq. This will be the second time the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade will pull combat duty there.

David Henkin, attorney with Earthjustice, said he expects the 9th Circuit in San Francisco will rule on its request for a temporary injunction by Tuesday.

Henkin said Earthjustice wants to temporarily stop the project so the environmental group and the Army can discuss what activities can proceed.

On Oct. 5 by a 2-1 vote, a three-judge federal appeals panel ruled that the Army's environmental impact statement was inadequate because it didn't consider other training sites where the 328, 19-ton, eight-wheeled combat vehicles could be located.

Henkin said Earthjustice wants a permanent injunction preventing the Army from proceeding with 28 Stryker-related construction projects, totaling $693 million.

Henkin said Earthjustice wants the federal court to rule by Tuesday because the Army wants to start construction on a Schofield Barracks Battle Area Complex training area on the next day.

ZapataEngineering was awarded a nearly $5 million contract two years ago to clear 941 acres for gunnery training and weapons qualifications.

In its response, Army lawyers rejected Earthjustice's arguments that the 2nd Brigade could finish its training in Alaska or Washington because the Stryker units assigned to those Army posts would be back from Iraq.

"Training at another location would also requiring transporting ... personnel, equipment and vehicles to that installation that require 80 percent of the Air Force's transport capacity and would consume 40 out of 270 available training days," the Army lawyers wrote.

Government lawyers also said moving the 2nd Brigade out of Hawaii to complete its training would "reduce the Army's posture to deter conflict and meet treaty obligations in the Pacific region including the Republic of Korea."

Shell Could Face Criminal Charges In Russia (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 — A Russian official threatened criminal prosecutions against employees of Royal Dutch Shell, ratcheting up pressure on the company's $22 billion oil and gas project on Sakhalin Island on Wednesday.

The remarks suggested a further unraveling of the relationship between Western energy companies and the Russian government, which is intent on gaining control of the energy sector.

Shell and two Japanese partners were accused of violating Russian environmental law at their Sakhalin 2 project. The project consists of two offshore platforms, a pipeline, the world's largest liquefied natural gas plant and an oil terminal. A Russian state company, Gazprom, wants a 25 percent share. Mitsui and Mitsubishi, of Japan, are minority owners.

"The breaches at Sakhalin 2 fall under five articles of the criminal code," Yuri Trutnev, the minister of natural resources, said after touring a pipeline Wednesday, in remarks shown on Russian television news. "This falls under criminal law and we think it's necessary to apply it. All the relevant documents should be sent to the prosecutor general within two weeks."

Lower-ranked Russian officials had threatened criminal charges earlier this month. The statement by Mr. Trutnev, however, carried more force and suggested an escalation because he is a member of the cabinet.

Mr. Trutnev said the ministry would calculate the cost of environmental damage from Sakhalin 2 within four months. He also said work on some pipeline sections should halt immediately and that he was preparing to cancel a water use permit, needed by the company.

President Vladimir V. Putin denied during a question-and-answer session on Russian television Wednesday that environmental laws were being selectively enforced against foreign energy companies.

Mr. Trutnev, whose ministry inspected Sakhalin 2 in August and again in September, had said the second inspection provided enough grounds to revoke a major environmental permit. He had said the permit would very likely be canceled this week. He delayed a decision on that permit, however, by one month for further study.

On Wednesday, Shell provided the ministry with its response to the August inspection; the company said 98 percent of the infractions cited had been rectified.

"I am pleased that Minister Trutnev has taken the time to visit Sakhalin to see firsthand the work in progress," Ian Craig, chief executive of Sakhalin Energy, the operating company, said in a statement Wednesday. "There is no question of our commitment to correct any errors that we or our contractors may have made," he said.

A company spokesman, Ivan O. Chernyakhovsky, said he could not respond to the threats of criminal prosecution made by Mr. Trutnev. "A lot was said today; we aren't ready to comment on it all in detail," he said. "We think we have complied with Russian legislation."

Weakening The Fight For Mine Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Despite being twice rebuffed by the Senate, President Bush has named Richard Stickler, a stolid mining industry careerist, to run the mine safety agency whose serial ineptitude has been laid bare this year by the deaths of 42 mineworkers. Waiting until the Senate left town for the elections, Mr. Bush resorted to a recess appointment to place Mr. Stickler at the heart of enforcing new safety reforms that, in earlier hearings, the appointee himself had claimed were not at all that necessary.

To the contrary, these reforms became a crying need brought home to the nation from the depths of the Sago mine disaster in West Virginia, where 12 workers died in January. Sago presented a clinic in failed government oversight. The new law would double a miner's emergency oxygen to two hours; mandate electronic devices to track trapped miners; and repair the damage originally done by the administration in cutting more than 200 mine safety inspectors in the name of budget economy.

Mr. Stickler points to his six years as Pennsylvania mine safety chief to rebut criticism that he is the latest example in the administration's dangerous history of packing safety agencies with pro- industry regulators. But the bulk of his career was in corporate management of mines. Miners and lawmakers have cited the federal agency's own data in warning that injury rates at his mines were higher than the national average. The administration's pro-industry tack is a running scandal exemplified by Steven Griles, a mining lobbyist who was appointed deputy secretary of the interior. Mr. Griles devoted four years to rolling back mine regulations and then returned to lobbying for an industry long known for its patronage clout with politicians.

Senate opposition to Mr. Stickler reached the point that the nomination was twice withheld. The Republican majority leader, Bill Frist, said that if the president resorted to a recess appointment — a device guaranteeing Mr. Stickler at least a year in office — the Senate would schedule a showdown vote in response. Senator Frist must be held to his promise. Lawmakers should demand a bulldog enforcement director rather than another industry lapdog.

Tribal Police Chief, Officer Face Federal Charges (AP)

PHOENIX -- The White Mountain Apache tribal police chief and another officer have been charged with manipulating records in a federal investigation after the FBI began looking into the use of departmental funds at casinos.

Police Chief Lincoln Perry and Officer Tim Goode pleaded not guilty Wednesday in U.S. District Court, said Wyn Hornbuckle, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. They were each arraigned on one count of conspiracy to falsify records and 17 counts of falsifying records.

Perry and Goode are scheduled to stand trial Dec. 5 in Prescott, according to Hornbuckle.

Federal officials alleged the two men embezzled between $10,000 and $20,000 over a five-year period. According to authorities, Perry and Goode were the only ones allowed to sign on a bank account maintained by the tribal police investigations unit. The account is used for undercover purchases and payment to informants. Perry was already on suspension when the charges were filed.

In February, FBI investigators became aware of the account. A review of records gave rise to a probe into possible embezzlement and theft, Hornbuckle said. In April, a federal grand jury subpoena was issued for bank records dating back to January 2001.

Hornbuckle said Perry and Goode submitted fake receipts to tribal police in response to FBI agents looking into the bank account.

The records showed multiple withdrawals from the account from casinos in Las Vegas, Scottsdale, Hon-Dah, Camp Verde and San Carlos, Hornbuckle said.

After their court appearance Wednesday, Perry and Goode were released and barred from using firearms, gambling, traveling outside the state and contacting tribal police about their case.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

MCLU Says FBI Is Spying On Peace Activists (WCSH)

WCSH-TV, October 26, 2006

The FBI has apparently been keeping files on the emails of peace activists in Maine. Last year, the Maine Civil Liberties Union filed a Freedom of Information Act request from the FBI.

Wednesday morning, it released the results, 18 pages of emails that the FBI had in its files.

Those emails were put out by "Peace Action Maine," the "Maine Center for Peace and Justice" and "Veterans for Peace" as they were organizing for two different protests.

Activists say they were shocked that their government was "spying" on them.

"I was surprised. And maybe I'm naive or idealistic, but I think that in America, the first amendment stands for freedom of speech and association. If someone is expressing their views in a peaceful way, they should be free from suspicion and should not be under surveillance or interrogation by the government," said Shenna Bellows from the MCLU.

DOJ_NMG_0086804

A spokesperson for the FBI, Nenette Day, says the agency does not monitor or investigate peace groups in Maine. Day says the emails were likely forwarded to the FBI, then placed in a file.

Peace Groups Say FBI Monitored Their E-mails (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

PORTLAND, Maine - The FBI has turned over e-mails it obtained from members of two Maine peace organizations containing information about demonstrations at the Brunswick Naval Air Station and Bath Iron Works, the Maine Civil Liberties Union said Wednesday.

The e-mails were turned over in response to a Freedom of Information request that the MCLU filed last year.

Obtaining the e-mails of Peace Action Maine and Veterans for Peace is a waste of FBI resources, and it has a chilling effect on people who want to speak out against government policies, said Shenna Bellows, executive director of the MCLU.

It also brings to mind the FBI's clandestine surveillance in decades past of Martin Luther King Jr., John Lennon and civil rights organizations, she said.

"History seems to be repeating itself," she said at a press conference at the Peace and Justice Center.

An FBI spokeswoman said the agency gets its information from a myriad of sources, including concerned citizens who send along correspondence they've obtained.

But it is incorrect to suggest that the FBI was spying on the Maine peace groups or intercepting their e-mails electronically, said Nenette Day of the Boston FBI office.

Day did not know exactly how the FBI came into possession of the e-mails, but said a federal court order would be required to obtain them electronically. The FBI would request such a court order only if it had evidence that a crime or an act of violence was going to be committed, or that national security was being compromised, she said.

"We do not investigate individuals engaged in their constitutional rights, including the right to free speech and assembly," Day said.

The MCLU filed a Freedom of Information request last year on behalf of Peace Action Maine, Veterans for Peace, five other organizations and 15 individuals.

In January, the FBI confirmed that it possessed some e-mails from the Maine Coalition for Peace and Justice, the MCLU said.

Late last month, the MCLU received copies of e-mails the FBI had obtained from Peace Action Maine, Veterans for Peace and two individuals connected to peace groups. The e-mail messages were redacted so they didn't contain names or information considered to be classified.

The e-mails discussed plans for a demonstration of the Blue Angels air show at Brunswick Naval Air Station on Sept. 10, 2005, and about a protest at the christening of a Navy destroyer at Bath Iron Works on July 23, 2005.

Some of the e-mails that were released were written by John "Jack" Bussell, a board member of Veterans for Peace. Bussell, who served in the Army from 1959-79, said peace groups have long suspected their activities are being scrutinized.

"But to see it is shocking," he said.

Cops Arrested For Allegedly Stealing $31,000 (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, October 26, 2006

Officers Richard E. Doroniuk, 30, and Officer Mahmoud "Mike" Shamah, 27, were picked up at their homes this morning without a struggle. A civilian, Larry "Peanut" Cross, also is implicated. They are charged with conspiracy to commit theft.

Doroniuk allegedly was caught on an Aug. 17 wiretap — the day before one of their ripoffs — discussing that he needed to be careful because other cops had recently been busted.

They also planned to conduct a home invasion on one of the drug dealers whose lockers they targeted, but the ripoff was never carried out, officials said. They intended to buy a diamond necklace or something else valuable for an unidentified person who was going to help them with the robbery, authorities said.

"Today's arrests result from the department's ongoing commitment to remove bad cops from the streets," said police Supt. Phil Cline.

The arrests come just a month after four police officers were arrested for allegedly invading homes and robbing people of valuables. More cops are expected to be arrested in that case. Earlier this month, the Chicago Police Department launched an evaluation of officers with 20 or more complaints lodged against them to identify problem cops.

The FBI and the police Internal Affairs Division conducted the sting. The FBI learned from an informant that Cross was discussing ripoffs by Doroniuk and Shamah. Cross allegedly asked the informant to provide information about locations for the officers to commit thefts, authorities said.

The FBI directed the informant to tell Cross about the Grand-Pulaski Self Storage facility, where undercover agents rented a unit and left a black backpack-style bag containing $20,000, according to an FBI affidavit.

On June 13, Doroniuk and Shamah allegedly went to the storage unit with a search warrant and two other unidentified officers. Surveillance agents allegedly saw them enter and exit the unit carrying bolt cutters. When they left, the money was allegedly missing.

As of early October, there were no police records showing the money was seized or inventoried, authorities said.

On Aug. 18, the FBI set up another sting at a storage facility at Grand and Kilbourn, where the FBI informant told Cross there were drugs and at least $30,000 in cash from drug sales, authorities said. The FBI put $18,100 in the locker.

Doroniuk, Shamah and four unidentified officers went to the storage unit with a search warrant and seized the money, authorities said. They turned in $7,000 as evidence from the search and allegedly stole the remaining $11,100. Cross told the informant the officers gave him $800, authorities said.

During a wiretapped conversation on Aug. 17, Doroniuk allegedly discussed the arrest with Shamah, saying “We got to be ... real smart about this ... man.” Doroniuk also was caught on tape talking about the arrest of other officers with an unidentified accomplice.

Doroniuk joined the department in January 2000 and Shamah’s been a Chicago Police officer since August 2001. Both officers are tactical officers in the Morgan Park District on the Southwest Side.

It was unclear whether any of the unidentified officers who participated in the seizures face any disciplinary action.

They are expected to appear before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan at 3:30 p.m. today.

2 Chicago Police Officers Charged In Narcotics Case (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, October 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Two Chicago police officers were charged Wednesday for allegedly conspiring with a narcotics dealer to steal $31,100 in what they mistakenly believed was drug money.

Officers Richard E. Doroniuk, 30, and Mahmoud "Mike" Shamah, 27, both members of a South Side tactical unit, were arrested without incident in their homes early Wednesday, federal officials said.

The two officers appeared Wednesday afternoon before U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan R. Nolan, who set a bond hearing for Tuesday.

Doroniuk attorney Robert Clarke said the officer "is going to get his full day in court and that's what he wants," while Shamah attorney Anthony Pinelli declined to comment because he was still studying the case.

Federal officials said the money had been planted in self-storage lockers as part of a sting operated jointly by FBI agents and Chicago police internal affairs investigators.

Officials said the officers used information from a third defendant, Larry "Peanut" Cross, 55, to obtain search warrants for the lockers.

According to the complaint, the officers failed to report any of the money seized from a locker in June and only part of the cash taken in a second theft in August.

They took the money believing they were ripping off a drug dealer, federal officials said. They said Cross already was in state custody.

A criminal complaint unsealed following the arrests charged all three men with conspiracy to steal government funds.

Police Superintendent Phil Cline said the charges "should send a clear message to the public and the department's 13,600 honorable men and women that officers who violate the public trust will be held accountable."

"Today's arrests result from the department's ongoing commitment to remove bad cops from the streets," Cline said in a statement.

Doroniuk has been a police officer since January 2000 and Shamah since August 2001, federal officials said.

Jail Guard Charged With Accepting Bribes From Inmate (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

SANTA ANA, October 25, 2006 - A federal grand jury indicted a jail guard Wednesday on charges he accepted $6,000 from an inmate in exchange for smuggling in banned cell phones.

Also on abc7.com:

Daily Newsletter | Breaking News Alerts | Eyewitness News team Bios Jose Abel Flores, 37, of Corona, was arrested Oct. 17 at his work, the Santa Ana City Jail. He was being held on $100,000 bond and was scheduled to be arraigned Nov. 6.

If convicted of two bribery counts, Flores faces a maximum sentence of 30 years in federal prison.

Flores accepted two $3,000 bribes in exchange for bringing cellular telephones to a federal inmate being held in jail on narcotics and weapons charges, according to the indictment. The bribes were paid from a purported friend of Flores, but in fact the friend was an undercover FBI agent, authorities said.

Ring Allegedly Hid Meth In Elmo Dolls (AP)

DENVER -- Drug agents broke up an aggressive northern Colorado ring that shipped methamphetamine hidden in Elmo dolls and other toys, authorities said Wednesday.

The alleged ringleader was among 19 people in custody, authorities said. Agents said they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine worth $864,000 and capable of supplying 4 million doses.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the alleged ringleader, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested Tuesday in Greeley after a yearlong investigation that stretched from Colorado to California.

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Rocky Mountain Region, said Valle-Sierra was working with about five methamphetamine rings.

"I've never seen a meth arrest have more impact than this one," he said.

Officials said Valle-Sierra was trying to take over the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado with an operation that used night-vision goggles and bulletproof vests.

Sweetin said agents believe Valle-Sierra bought methamphetamine in the Los Angeles area but it was probably made in a large lab in Mexico.

Colorado Meth Ring Smuggled Drugs Inside Elmo Dolls And Other Toys, DEA Says (AP)

AP, October 26, 2006

DENVER — Authorities said Wednesday that they have broken up a methamphetamine ring that shipped the drug in toys including an Elmo doll.

Agents said 19 people were in custody, including the alleged leader of the northern Colorado drug ring, and that they seized more than 45 pounds of what they described as high-quality methamphetamine.

Officials released photos of an Elmo doll found in a car in Barstow, Calif., with a caption saying 4 pounds of methamphetamine was found inside. Eid said he could not discuss what happened because the doll of the "Sesame Street" character was evidence in the case.

· Crack the case in FOXNews.com's Crime Center.

Authorities said other toys also were used to hide drugs but did not elaborate. Other photos showed drugs shipped in a suitcase and tucked inside a tire.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the alleged ringleader, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested Tuesday in Greeley after a yearlong investigation.

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, regional Drug Enforcement Administration special agent in charge, said the operation was selling methamphetamine that was about 99 percent pure, while most methamphetamine sold on the street is about 30 to 40 percent pure. Authorities said the seized drugs, valued at $864,000, amounted to about 4 million doses.

Of the 21 people named in a federal indictment, 12 are suspected illegal immigrants, Eid said. Two suspects remain at large, he said.

Cops Take 45 Lbs. Of Meth In Greeley (DENP)

Denver Post, October 25, 2006

Drug agents raided a number of homes and a business in Greeley Monday and Tuesday, arresting 10 people and confiscating more than 45 pounds of methamphetamine.

Federal agents said the people arrested were part of a large drug ring which had been under surveillance for more than a year.

Last week, a federal grand jury indicted 21 people, including the 10 arrested this week. Another 9 people were already in custody on state charges and 2 people are fugitives.

Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and officers from the Weld County Drug Task Force confiscated $59,000 in cash, four weapons, one of which had been stolen, a bullet-proof vest and a night-vision goggles.

DEA agent-in-charge Jeffrey Sweetin said the methamphetamine was made in California and transported to Colorado.

Meth Arrests Put Greeley Cartel On Ice (DENP)

Denver Post, October 26, 2006

Authorities say they have dismantled a drug cartel headquartered in Greeley that moved millions of dollars in high-quality "ice" methamphetamine in buses and packed inside stuffed toys.

Stretching from Los Angeles to Roanoke, Va., the operation primarily sought to monopolize the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado by relying on a product that was an "unheard of" 99 percent pure, federal and local law enforcement officers said Wednesday.

After a 13-month investigation, agents reportedly seized more methamphetamine in this one operation than was taken in all of 2005 across Colorado.

The potent white powder was mass-produced in Mexican drug factories - an example of a trend away from making smaller batches in scattered trailers, apartments and motel rooms.

With U.S. authorities tightening up on the availability of the over-the-counter medications used to make methamphetamine, drug sellers more often are getting supplies from other nations, said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration's Rocky Mountain division.

On Oct. 18, a federal grand jury returned an indictment charging 21 people - including alleged cartel leader Rigoverto Valle-Sierra - on drug-trafficking charges that could bring sentences ranging from 10 years to life in federal prison, U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said Wednesday in a Denver news conference.

Nineteen of the 21 suspects have been arrested, and five search warrants were served at three homes, a business and a storage unit in Greeley, Eid said. Agents arrested Valle-Sierra without incident Tuesday in Greeley.

"The impact is huge," Sweetin said. "There is a lot less dope in Colorado."

The investigation began in September 2005 and eventually included agents from the DEA, police from Greeley and Los Angeles, and deputies from the Weld County Sheriff's Office.

Officers began making large drug seizures in May in Greeley, Los Angeles and points in between. They ultimately confiscated 53 pounds of methamphetamine with a street value as high as $2.4 million, said Dennis Follett, a Denver DEA agent.

They also seized $12,000 in cash bound in $1,000 stacks, a bulletproof vest, night-vision goggles and four weapons.

Still, the seizures represent only the "tip of the iceberg" of the ice methamphetamine that the drug organization sold on Greeley streets, Sweetin said.

Smugglers used various means to hide the meth, including putting it in plastic bags and stuffing it into tires and an Elmo Sesame Street doll.

Drugs were transported from Mexico through Los Angeles to Greeley, which served as the hub city, and then to Wyoming, Nebraska and Virginia, Eid said.

The 21 suspects represent the upper tier of a drug operation in which hundreds of dealers, including Greeley gang members, distributed the meth to customers that included school-age children and people of all races and economic levels, Follett said.

Twelve of the suspects are in the country illegally, Eid said.

The drug cartel was using the high quality of its product to capture the methamphetamine trade in northern Colorado, Sweetin said. Sellers offered their 99-percent-pure ice at the same price as lower-quality drugs with only 30 to 40 percent purity, he said.

Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said the drugs were flowing to the Greeley area because of a growing population, including a large segment of illegal immigrants. "The supply is coming to the demand," he said.

Meth Ring Broken Up (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, October 26, 2006

A methamphetamine distribution ring with tentacles across northern Colorado has been smashed and the kingpin arrested, law enforcement authorities announced Wednesday.

A federal grand jury indicted 21 people Oct. 18 on drug-trafficking charges that could result in federal prison sentences for life, officials said at a press conference at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Denver.

Twelve of the 21 people indicted, including one with at least 10 aliases, were in the country illegally.

Officials said more than 45 pounds of high-purity methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 were seized during a 13-month investigation. The wholesale value of the methamphetamine was about $865,000, with a street value in the millions, the officials said.

Another 8 pounds of methamphetamine, $12,000, four weapons, a bulletproof vest and a set of night-vision goggles were found in the sweep of arrests in the Greeley area this week.

"Most meth is seized in ounces. This was a monstrous amount," said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in the Rocky Mountain states. "This will have an impact for decades in Greeley."

Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said Greeley has emerged as a major point for methamphetamine sales and distribution because of the population growth on the northern Front Range, which includes a large community of illegal immigrants.

"The supply is coming to the demand," the sheriff said.

Officials said the organization used buses and private vehicles to ferry the illegal drug from southern California to Las Vegas and on to Greeley, bypassing potential markets in cities and resorts along the route. From Greeley, where agents documented links to gangs, most of the methamphetamine was sold in northern Colorado.

However, some of the drug was sent to traffickers in southeastern Wyoming, western Nebraska and as far east as Virginia.

In at least once case, the traffickers stuffed a child's Elmo doll with four pounds of methamphetamine to hide the illicit cargo, Sweetin said.

The alleged leader of the organization, Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, was arrested without incident Tuesday in Greeley, officials said. Weld County Drug Task Force officers and DEA agents arrested nine others earlier this week. Nine more already were in custody on state charges, and two are fugitives.

Trials may not begin for more than a year, but each defendant could face at least 10 years, and up to life, in federal prison, on charges of conspiring to distribute methamphetamine and of distributing the drug, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. Each defendant also is charged with other drug-trafficking crimes.

U.S. Attorney Troy Eid said the arrests illustrate the trend that methamphetamines are being manufactured in high-volume plants elsewhere and shipped to Colorado. Previously, methamphetamines were cooked in mom-and-pop laboratories for local sale.

The alleged traffickers were organized in overlapping circles of distributors and sellers at various levels in a high-volume trade, as opposed to a vertical structure in which each soldier had a specific duty.

Ten Arrested In Big Weld Drug Bust (GT)

Greeley Tribune, October 25, 2006

A major multi-agency drug bust resulted in 10 arrests Monday and Tuesday in Weld County, adding to the nine people already in custody on state charges.

Several agencies today announced that a large methamphetamine distribution organization based in Greely has been dismantled by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Weld County Drug Task Force.

The investigation, which began in September 2005, resulted in the seizure of more than 45 pounds of ICE methamphetamine, 1.1 kilos of cocaine and $59,000 in cash. The organization used buses and cars to transport the high-quality meth from California to Colorado.

On Oct. 18, a federal grand jury in Denver returned an indictment charging 21 individuals with various drug-trafficking crimes, including conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute and to distribute methamphetamine. DEA agents and Weld County Drug Task Force officers arrested 10 people this week, including Rigoverto Valle-Sierra, the alleged leader of the organization.

Two of the 21 individuals are fugitives.

Officers also executive five search warrants at three residences, a business and a storage unit in Greeley.

The case, also involving the Greeley and Evans police departments, Weld County Sheriff's Office and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is being prosecuted by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Local Agent Tipped Off Friends, DEA Says (CA)

Commercial Appeal, October 26, 2006

A federal DEA agent was indicted Wednesday on charges that he tipped off former high school classmates that one of them was a target in a large cocaine trafficking case here in August.

Tommie Purifoy II of West Memphis turned himself in to federal authorities in South Florida where he was assigned as a special agent in the Drug Enforcement Administration's Miami field office.

"It gives me great pain in the pit of my stomach," said Sherri Strange, DEA special agent in charge in Atlanta. "The temptations for agents are great. They handle millions of dollars in cash and contraband, but they cannot compromise the integrity of the office."

She and U.S. Atty. David Kustoff noted that the DEA identified the problem and conducted the investigation that led to Purifoy's indictment.

Purifoy, a Memphis police officer from 2001 to 2004, allegedly passed sensitive DEA information along to Christopher Ivy, who called Sean Williams, who called his cousin, Brian Nicholas Williams, an alleged drug trafficker.

All attended West Memphis High School together and had been friends since at least 1996.

Despite being tipped off to the yearlong investigation, Brian Williams and 10 others were arrested here three days later on Aug. 24 on cocaine trafficking charges.

More than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 in cash was seized, according to authorities, who called it the largest local drug bust of the year.

According to the indictment, Purifoy was in Memphis on personal business on Aug. 21 and stopped by the DEA office where an ongoing wiretap was being conducted.

When he saw a chart of several driver's licenses in a pyramid-type format, he remarked that he had attended high school with some of the suspects, including Brian Williams.

Later that day, the indictment says, Purifoy called Ivy and told him Brian Williams was the target of a DEA drug investigation.

Ivy then contacted Sean Williams who in turn contacted his cousin, telling him he was at "the top of the food chain."

Purifoy, Ivy and Sean Williams were charged with obstruction of justice.

Purifoy also was charged with unlawful disclosure of electronic surveillance, while Ivy and Williams also were charged with making false statements to federal officers.

The charges against Purifoy carry up to 25 years in prison. He has been suspended without pay.

Kustoff said Ivy worked at a school in Memphis, though he would not identify the school or Ivy's position. Sean Williams worked for a trucking company in Fayetteville, Ark.

DEA Agent Indicted On Charges He Tipped Off Suspect (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, October 26, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. - A Drug Enforcement Administration agent who worked in Miami has been indicted on charges of tipping off a former high school classmate who was a target in a drug trafficking investigation.

Tommie Purifoy II turned himself in to the Miami field office, authorities said Wednesday. He has been suspended without pay.

Purifoy is originally from West Memphis, Ark., and was a police officer in Memphis from 2001 to 2004. He was in Memphis on personal business on Aug. 21 and stopped by the local DEA office during a wiretap operation, according to the indictment.

A chart of people suspected in a major cocaine trafficking ring was posted and he remarked that he went to high school with one of the suspects, Brian Nicholas Williams.

Purifoy is accused of passing the information to his friend Christopher Ivy, who passed it along to Sean Williams, the cousin of suspect Brian Nicholas Williams.

Despite the tip, three days later authorities made the largest drug bust in the area for the year, when they seized more than 88 pounds of cocaine and over $500,000 cash. Brian Williams and 10 others were charged in connection with the drug ring.

Purifoy is charged with obstruction of justice and unlawful disclosure of electronic surveillance and could face up to 25 years in prison. Ivy and Sean Williams are charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal officers.

"It gives me great pain in the pit of my stomach," said Sherri Strange, DEA special agent in charge in Atlanta. "The temptations for agents are great. They handle millions of dollars in cash and contraband, but they cannot compromise the integrity of the office."

U.S. Attorney David Kustoff and Strange said the tip was discovered and investigated by the DEA.

MPD Cop Turned DEA Agent Gets Indicted (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, October 25, 2006

DEA Special Agent Tommie Purifoy, II, is charged with obstruction of justice and disclosure of electronic surveillance.

Federal authorities say Purifoy and two other men were indicted Wednesday for telling a Mid-South drug dealer he was being investigated by the DEA.

"The one characteristic of a narcotics agent that can never be compromised," says Sherri Strange, the Special Agent in charge of the investigation, "is his or her integrity."

Strange says Purifoy joined the DEA in 2004 after working for the Memphis Police Department for three years.

Purifoy was assigned to the DEA's Miami bureau. But during a visit home in August he made a trip to the Memphis DEA office.

Investigators say Purifoy was in a wire-tap room and noticed a pyramid of pictures on the wall. The top picture was one of Purifoy's boyhood friends, Brian Williams, a man under investigation for cocaine trafficking.

Williams and Purifoy attended West Memphis High School together in 1996. Their friendship, say investigators, dates back at least a decade.

Here's what the feds say happened next. On August 21st, at 6:15 P.M., Purifoy called another high school buddy, Christopher Ivy, and told him the DEA was watching Williams.

At 7:45 that night, the feds say Ivy called another West Memphis High School pal, Sean Williams. Williams is Brian Williams' cousin and investigators say the two talked soon after Ivy's call.

At 9:59 P.M., the feds say Sean Williams called Brian Williams to tell him he was the target of a federal drug investigation.

The warning didn't matter. Three days later, on August 24th, federal authorities arrested Brian Williams and 10 other people on drug charges. They confiscated 40 kilos of cocaine and more than $500,000 in cash. Investigators say it's the largest coke bust in Memphis this year.

Two months have passed since then. And now Tommie Purifoy, Christopher Ivy and Sean Williams are indicted and charged with interfering with a federal investigation.

Purifoy turned himself in to authorities in Florida Wednesday. Ivy and Williams were in federal court in Memphis on Wednesday. All three are out on bond. They are expected to be arraigned on November 1st at 9:30 A.M.

Investigators say they were able to find out who tipped Brian Williams off because they had placed a wire-tap on Wililams' cellphone.

Federal Agents Bust One Of Their Own For Helping Dealers (WMC)

WMC-TV, October 26, 2006

A member of the Drug Enforcement Agency is on the other side of the law. Tommie Purifoy started working for the DEA in March of 2004 and he was assigned to the Miami Office. But instead of upholding his oath as an agent, he's accused of showing loyalty to his high school friends, who turned out to be drug dealers.

According to the indictment, Tommie Purifoy set aside his duties as a Special Agent for the DEA to warn his friends about a pending drug bust, a wire tap investigation Purifoy learned about while visiting the DEA office in Memphis.

"Purifoy left the office and soon after contacted his friends," said federal investigators. They say Purifoy's friends turned out to be drug traffickers who ran a cocaine distribution ring that was busted up in late August.

More than 40 kilograms were seized in the largest drug bust of the year. Most of the cocaine and cash in the investigation were found in a house on Meadowview Road in Memphis. That's when the DEA learned it had a leak and Tommie Purifoy's days as a special agent became numbered.

"Within 60 days, this man has been indicted by a grand jury and a lot of work has been done to bring the prosecution as quickly as it's moved," said U.S. Attorney David Kustoff.

Purifoy turned himself in to authorities in Florida where he was assigned to work. He's expected to be released on a signature bond. Two others were indicted today, along with Purifoy. All face obstruction charges. Purifoy is expected to appear in federal court here in about four weeks.

15 Arrested In Richmond Drug Raids (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 26, 2006

(10-25) 12:45 PDT RICHMOND -- About 200 federal and local law-enforcement officers targeting a street gang known for drug activity swooped down on North Richmond today, arresting 15 people and seizing nearly a pound of methamphetamine.

The arrests took place during simultaneous 10 a.m. raids in Richmond and unincorporated North Richmond. Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police and FBI SWAT team members dressed in camouflage jumpsuits served at least a dozen federal search warrants.

As sheriff's helicopter Star Two circled overhead, several people were detained in the area of Fifth and Market streets in North Richmond, an unincorporated community of 4,000 residents that police say is a hotbed for drug sales, shootings and violence.

"Our goal is to take the violence out of North Richmond," Contra Costa County sheriff's Lt. Kitty Parker said at the scene.

Many of the suspects sought today were named in sealed federal indictments on various drug and gang-related charges, said Special Agent Joseph Schadler, FBI spokesman in San Francisco. Others were arrested on state charges.

The names of those arrested on federal charges weren't released today pending their appearances Thursday in U.S. District Court in Oakland.

Some people sought today are alleged members or associates of the Project Trojans street gang. On March 14, a similar raid by FBI agents and local police resulted in the arrests of 15 people affiliated with the gang. They were indicted by a federal grand jury in Oakland on charges of cocaine and methamphetamine trafficking.

Police say the 300 or so members of the Project Trojans, classified by the U.S. Department of Justice as one of the most violent African American street gangs in Northern California, are responsible for much of the area's bloodshed, including hundreds of killings.

The gang, also called PJT, has long been selling drugs on North Richmond's streets, and feuds over turf and drug sales have sparked violence, according to police,

A group of residents standing at the corner of Fifth and Market today voiced displeasure at the operation. One woman, who declined to give her name, said officers should be spending time solving homicides. "It don't make no sense," she said.

But authorities said the recent raids in North Richmond were aimed at stemming the tide of violence that is associated with drug and gang activity.

"It's a continual process to make this community safer," said David Johnson, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in San Francisco. "It's going to take some time to make inroads in this particular community."

15 SUSPECTED GANG MEMBERS ARRESTED IN NORTH RICHMOND (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, October 26, 2006

Federal, state and local law enforcement agencies arrested 15 suspected gang members in a coordinated raid in unincorporated North Richmond today, according to spokesman for the San Francisco FBI Field Office Joseph Schadler.

More than 200 FBI agents, Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies, Richmond police officers and agents from the West Contra Costa Narcotic Enforcement Team rolled into North Richmond at 10:15 a.m. today and arrested people selling drugs on street corners then stormed 19 buildings simultaneously on federal search warrants.

SWAT teams from Portland, Sacramento, Los Angeles and San Francisco raided the 19 locations and threw flash-bang grenades to flush out the occupants, Schadler said.

Authorities were targeting people believed to be established gang leaders of the Project Trojans street gang, Schadler said.

"The key to this is we're trying to take the head off the organization," Schadler said.

The raid was part of an investigation that began in 2004 into the gang's activities. Wiretap and undercover operations ended in February and the first raid was conducted in March, Schadler said. At that time nine people were arrested for manufacturing and distributing cocaine, crack and methamphetamine.

The charges against the people arrested today will remain sealed until Thursday when the suspects will be brought before a U.S. magistrate judge in Oakland, Schadler said.

No injuries and no incidents were reported during the raid.

Pittsford Man Charged In Federal 'club Drug' Case (RDC)

By Matthew Daneman, Staff writer

Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle, October 26, 2006

A Pittsford man is one of 10 people indicted on federal drug trafficking charges for allegedly smuggling "club drugs" into the United States.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of New York announced the charges, which came after an investigation of nearly two years into what the U.S. Justice Department called "a large scale drug smuggling and trafficking group operating in and around Buffalo and Rochester."

DOJ_NMG_0086812

The drug ring allegedly smuggled such club drugs as Ecstasy, GHB, ketamine and crystal methamphetamine from Toronto.

Jeffrey Parasida, 28, of Pittsford was charged with a pair of violations under the federal Controlled Substances Act, as were nine other defendants from the Buffalo region, according to the Justice Department.

White Plains Pharmacist Facing Federal Drug Charge (JN)

The Journal News, October 25, 2006

WHITE PLAINS - The owner of a White Plains pharmacy is accused of illegally dispensing tens of thousands of doses of the generic form of the highly addictive painkiller Vicodin, federal authorities said.

Syed Zahid Ali, 58, owner of Post Pharmacy at 82 East Post Road, is due in court next week to face charges he illegally distributed hydrocodone as well as a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders. The Saddle River, N.J., man cannot account for 100,000 tablets of the painkiller, federal authorities said. He is also accused of refilling prescriptions for the drug despite the bottles being marked "no refill."

Ali denied the charges in an interview yesterday at the counter of his pharmacy, which remains open for business.

"I didn't do anything wrong," he said.

Ali said he can account for all the hydrocodone that he has dispensed over the more than six years that he has owned the pharmacy. The tablets were never missing, but his files were, he said.

The illegal trade of prescription painkillers like hydrocodone is "very high and increasing," according to an annual assessment released in January by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided the Post Pharmacy on April 19, 2005, according to court papers filed in federal court in White Plains. They seized Ali's records. After comparing the store's prescription records and inventory with Ali's purchases of the drug from suppliers, they determined 100,000 pills missing.

Ali's purchases of the drug were more than twice the combined total of two other pharmacies in White Plains - a much larger Duane Reade store and Express Drugs, a pharmacy about the size of Post Pharmacy, according to a criminal complaint filed by DEA Agent Stephen Loftus.

Ali said all the hydrocodone he bought went to fill the prescriptions that he received.

"I don't know how much business they're doing," he said of the other pharmacies. "I have the prescriptions."

Ali said that after the DEA raid, he founds five files in the back of his pharmacy that agents missed. The files contained more than 4,000 prescriptions for hydrocodone. Those files square his purchases with his filled prescriptions, he said.

"I calculated how much I bought and how much I dispensed and it came out 100 percent right," he said.

Ali said his lawyer advised him against turning the records over to the DEA. He said he was confident when those records are presented in court, he'll be cleared.

Herbert Hadad, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, declined to comment.

Ali also denied he ever refilled prescriptions that carried a prohibition against refill. But undercover White Plains police officers got five such refills in August and September 2004 for hydrocodone and Provigil prescriptions that were single-use or refill-barred, according to the criminal complaint. Provigil is a stimulant used to treat sleep disorders like narcolepsy.

Ali, a licensed pharmacist since 1977, faces up to five years in prison if convicted. He said he has not changed the way he does business since the raids. He still dispenses hydrocodone and Provigil.

"I have deliberately done nothing different," he said.

Trial Date Set In Drug Case (TRE)

The Reporter, October 25, 2006

A 2007 trial date has been set in federal court for a Fairfield man described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforce -ment Administration.

Federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton on Tuesday scheduled 1 p.m. Jan. 23 for the trial of 32-year-old defendant Eduardo Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - in Eastern District Federal Court in Sacramento. In addition, Judge Karlton set 9:30 a.m. Dec. 12 for pre-trial motions in the case.

Pichardo was arrested by DEA agents on June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. A DEA spokesman said the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

Last week, Pichardo was indicted on additional charges of money laundering.

Pichardo has pleaded not guilty to all charges. He remains in federal custody.

Bloomberg, Daley Lead Mayors In Coalition Against Gun Violence (AP)

By F.N. D'ALESSIO, The Associated Press

AP, October 26, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and Milwaukee Mayor Thomas Barrett had harsh words Wednesday for the Bush administration and the gun lobby's influence on Congress.

"When Washington makes bad decisions to protect criminals rather than the public, we suffer the consequences," Bloomberg said at a news conference outlining the agenda for Thursday's Midwestern summit of Mayors Against Illegal Guns, a group Bloomberg founded with Boston Mayor Thomas Menino.

Bloomberg said he had hoped to have 50 of the nation's mayors on board by the end of this year, but 109 mayors from 44 states already have joined.

"These cities represent more than 44 million Americans," the New York Republican said.

Daley, Bloomberg and Barrett, accompanied by counterparts from a number of smaller cities, complained that inaction by the federal executive branch and the influence of the gun lobby, particularly the National Rifle Association, on Congress have left local officials to combat the problem of illegal weapons.

"Mayors know that illegal guns have nothing to do with the Second Amendment and everything to do with law enforcement," Bloomberg said. "But cities can lead where Congress won't."

He added that the goal of the mayors' group is to "hold Congress' feet to the fire."

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities.

"A lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels," Fratto said in an e-mailed statement. "Enforcing gun laws that are on the books is an essential facet of our efforts. The president and Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced."

NRA spokesman Andrew Arulanandam said: "If the mayors were serious about reducing crime, what they would do is they would work with city prosecutors to enforce gun laws as opposed to having press conferences."

Daley, a Democrat, said Chicago police have confiscated 10,803 illegal handguns and assault weapons this year. He said the city still steers firearms violators into the federal court system whenever possible because federal sentences tend to be harsher, but he agreed the gun lobby has a disproportionate influence at the federal level.

"We've had to work hard to keep Congress from making things even worse," said Daley referring, among other things, to federal attempts to restrict cities' access to tracing firearms data.

Bloomberg said the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives keeps its own records of multiple firearms purchases and attempted purchases but denies that information to local authorities.

Democrat Barrett said mayors are closer to the problem and have a better view of it than legislators.

"We are the individuals who receive the phone calls from the police saying someone has been murdered," Barrett said. "We are the ones who attend the funerals."

The mayors, including Tulsa, Okla., Mayor Kathy Taylor and Rockford, Ill., Mayor Lawrence Morrisey, spoke at Chicago police headquarters from behind a table loaded with illegal firearms seized by police in recent months. Most were rapid-fire automatic pistols, but there also were automatic shotguns, military-style assault rifles and even a Prohibition-style Thompson submachine gun.

The Midwestern mayors were to meet in an all-day conference Thursday to discuss legal and technological strategies. Bloomberg said Menino would hold a similar conference in Boston on Nov. 9 and Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin would hold one in her city Nov. 30.

Gladewater Gun Dealer Faces 5 Years In Prison, $250,000 Fine (LONGNJ)

Longview (TX) News-Journal, October 26, 2006

A gun dealer in Gladewater faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 after pleading guilty to falsifying records needed to purchase a firearm, said U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwin in a Wednesday media release.

According to court records, Michael Zirkle, 41, agreed to allow an ATF confidential informant to use someone else's identity on the forms necessary to purchase a .40-caliber pistol.

Zirkle has surrendered his gun dealer's license and forfeited 47 firearms, valued at approximately $19,000, as part of the plea agreement. As a convicted felon he is not permitted to possess a firearm again.

STORE OWNER ADMITS TO ILLEGAL FIREARMS SALES (TMT)

Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph, October 26, 2006

A Gladewater pawn shop owner and gun dealer who allegedly sold firearms to felons pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court.

Michael Zirkle, 39, Gladewater, pleaded guilty to making false statements into the records of a federal firearms licensee. He faces up to five years in prison and could be ordered to pay restitution to the victims or to the community.

On Jan. 6 in Gregg County, a confidential informant for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives entered the "Ace of Pawn" pawn shop in Gladewater, owned by Zirkle. He told the defendant he wanted to buy a .40-caliber pistol for himself, but he wanted to use the identity and personal information of another person when filling out the required ATF form. Zirkle agreed, according to court documents.

U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love allowed Zirkle to continue to remain out of jail on bond pending his sentencing hearing after there were no objections from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Noble.

Zirkle surrendered his firearm license and forfeited 47 guns - 31 rifles, six pistols, eight shotguns, a revolver and a machine gun rifle - he possessed as a firearms dealer, defense attorney F.R. "Buck" Files Jr. said during the hearing.

In the plea agreement, Zirkle agreed that the 47 weapons were used to perpetrate the violations stated in the indictment, which includes selling firearms to felons. "The defendant shall not, in any manner, participate in, nor shall aid, assist, support, facilitate, or finance another, in the purchase or sale of any firearm for any purpose, the plea agreement states.

Files said his client listened to all of the audio recordings of conversations between Zirkle and a confidential informant and decided to plead guilty.

Zirkle was indicted on three counts of false statements of a federal firearms licensee, false statements in the attempted acquisition of a firearm, failure to record sale of firearm and failure to conduct a background search. He was also indicted on five counts of selling a firearm to a felon, failure to record and maintain records of receipt and disposition of firearms and failure to maintain records to receipt and disposition of firearms.

Old West Leaves Dodge City; Guns Remain (AP-Y)

By Maria Sudekum Fisher, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Dodge City has a rich history as an Old West frontier town, where cowboys and gunslingers could take a break from the trail and get their fill of saloons and brothels.

Today, the tidy town built on meatpacking and rodeos is again plagued by gunfighters. But this time they're in street gangs, some of which have second-generation members as young as 11. The drug of choice is methamphetamine and the weapons range from automatic rifles to baseball bats.

"When it was old Dodge City, it was cowboys coming off the range and ending up in Dodge and raising hell and letting things go," said John Ball, Dodge City chief of police. "This is entirely different. There is no comparison.

"The gangs, these are people who are choosing to commit dangerous and criminal acts and they're choosing it as a lifestyle that is criminal and wrong. There is no regard for anyone in the community, and I can't begin to explain their rationale."

Street gangs, often thought of as a big-city problem, have been turning up in rural areas across the country since the 1980s, frightening residents and straining smaller law enforcement departments. Rural gangs are often more transitory than their urban counterparts, but they appear to have a foothold in several communities.

About 24,000 gangs operate around the country, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which estimates there are about 760,000 members in 2,900 communities.

The 2004 Youth Gang Survey conducted by the Justice Department, 82 percent of large cities surveyed, 42 percent of suburban counties, 27 percent of smaller cities and 14 percent of rural counties reported active youth gangs.

In Ottumwa, Iowa, Chief of Police Jim Clark says gangs are starting to show up in his town of about 25,000. Five years ago, Ottumwa had an occasional visit from a gang member from Los Angeles or Chicago. Now, Clark estimates there about 100 gang members in town. Some moved to Ottumwa with their families. Others have been sent to live with relatives to escape gangs in bigger cities, Clark said.

"But then they start up the same kind of violence," he said.

For now, Ottumwa gangs are mostly involved in petty violence, graffiti and gang fights.

"But my concern is that we stay on top of it so it doesn't get so out of hand that we start having drive-by shootings," Clark said.

DOJ_NMG_0086815

Rural gangs are often more locally grown than urban gangs, said Arlen Egley Jr., senior research associate at the National Youth Gang Center in Tallahassee, Fla. But if they are attached to a national gang, like the Crips or the Bloods, they're more likely to "cut and paste" from those gang traditions.

"You'll find Bloods wearing blue," Egley said, when they traditionally wear red. These "hybrid" gangs are more prevalent in the Midwest, he said.

Gang activity in Dodge City started in the 1980s. Ball said he now estimates the town of 25,000 has more than 300 gang members, most of whom are Hispanic. Dodge City is one of the few western Kansas towns that has been growing, largely due to the influx of Latinos drawn to the meatpacking industry in southwest Kansas.

A recent uptick in gang violence over the summer caught the town's attention. From Aug. 19 to Sept. 22, the city recorded seven drive-by shootings. No one was killed, but police made nine gang-related arrests after the shootings, and houses that weren't intended as targets were sprayed with bullets.

Ball said the violence not only threatens residents, but also ties up the police department, which has about 50 officers.

"We don't have some of the resources or the manpower that other bigger departments do," he said.

Vickie Mercado, a longtime Dodge City resident, wants her hometown to get a handle on gangs. Mercado's 18-year-old son, Justin, who was not in a gang, was shot to death by a 14-year-old gang member who is eligible for parole in 2011 for Justin's death.

That was 10 years ago. Before Justin's death, Mercado and her family always felt safe at home.

Justin's death galvanized the community — for a while. An organization, Stop the Violence, was started to educate Dodge City residents about gangs. But interest in the group has tapered off.

"I think it'll take another tragedy for people to come forward and get involved again," Mercado said.

But another tragedy is what she wants to avoid.

Fugitive Fatally Shot Was Holding Shoe, Not Gun (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

LITHONIA, Ga. - Federal agents fatally shot a fugitive early Wednesday after the man refused to put down what they thought was a gun but turned out to be a shoe.

Agents went to an apartment complex in suburban Atlanta to arrest 24-year-old Youwiers Vilpie, said U.S. Marshal Richard Mecum. They were serving a warrant from the Drug Enforcement Administration office in south Florida. Vilpie also was wanted for questioning in two homicides in Ft. Myers, Fla., Mecum said.

Agents first tried to use a Taser to stun him, but it wasn't effect, Mecum said.

He said Vilpie at some point emerged with "something in his hand and he pointed it at them."

"They weren't sure what it was because it was dark, and they thought it was a gun," Mecum said. "They told him several times, 'Put it down, put it down, put it down,' and he wouldn't put it down and kept pointing it at them."

After the shooting, the agents discovered Vilpie had had his hand inside a shoe.

Suspect Killed After Confrontation With U.S. Marshal (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 26, 2006

Federal agents shot and killed a fugitive from south Florida early Wednesday when he refused to put down what they thought was a gun, but turned out to be a shoe.

Agents from the Southeast Regional Fugitive Task Force went to the Hillandale Park apartments near Lithonia about 4 a.m. to arrest 24-year-old Youwus Vilpre, said Richard Mecum, U.S. Marshal for North Georgia.

A Former Salvadoran Army Officer Convicted Of Killing Priests Is Arrested In L.A. As A Human Rights Violator (LAT)

By Hector Becerra, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0086816

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

A former Salvadoran army officer convicted of killing priests is arrested in L.A. as a human rights violator.

Gonzalo Guevara Cerritos was a decorated, American-trained officer in the Salvadoran army.

But for the last year, the 43-year-old toiled as a janitor at a West Los Angeles-area motel, a man with a secret who was always looking over his shoulder, his girlfriend said.

His clandestine existence came to an end Wednesday, when federal authorities announced that they had arrested him as an illegal immigrant who was a human rights violator.

The Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency said Guevara Cerritos was one of nine Salvadoran officers and soldiers implicated in one of the most notorious massacres in El Salvador's history: the 1989 death squad murders of six Jesuit priests whom some in the army viewed as subversives.

A sublieutenant with the Atlacatl Battalion during El Salvador's war against the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, a leftist guerrilla group, Guevara Cerritos was convicted for his role in the slayings.

In 1993, he received a pardon as part of a general amnesty that was granted after the country's 12-year civil war.

His girlfriend, Eusebia Mejia, 45, said Guevara Cerritos could never escape the shadow of the massacre and fled to the United States in hopes of a new start.

But when he arrived in Los Angeles — home to more than 250,000 Salvadorans — he quickly realized he would not find peace. Fearing that someone would recognize him on the streets of Los Angeles, he kept his head down and rarely went out.

"He was a real homebody," said Mejia, of Watts, who has lived in L.A. for 11 years and met Guevara Cerritos after he arrived in the city. "For him, it was from home to work, and from work to home. And every Sunday to church."

But the strategy apparently didn't work: Federal authorities said it was a tip from the public that put them on Guevara Cerritos' trail.

He was taken into custody Oct. 19 as part of an effort by U.S. immigration agents to catch and deport human rights violators.

"We will not allow the United States to be a place of refuge for aliens seeking to escape a violent criminal past," said Robert Schoch, a special agent for the federal immigration office in Los Angeles.

In 2003, the agency formed a unit to investigate individuals who were involved in crimes such as genocide, war crimes and persecution.

Guevara Cerritos' arrest resonated among Los Angeles' Salvadorans, many of whom fled human rights abuses during the civil war.

"This goes to show that no one escapes God's justice," said Aquiles Magaña of Carecen, an El Salvadoran immigrant rights organization.

The priests' murders created a worldwide furor in part because Guevara Cerritos and the other assailants had received training from the U.S. government, taking courses at the School of the Americas at Ft. Benning, Ga.

The bloodshed occurred before dawn, Nov. 16, 1989, at the rectory of El Salvador's Jesuit-run University of Central America. All but one of the priests were in nightclothes and slippers when they were shot. A dormitory cook and her teenage daughter also were killed.

Salvadoran courts ultimately ruled that Guevara Cerritos did not fire any of the fatal shots, but found that he was part of the conspiracy. He was convicted of conspiring to commit acts of terrorism and placed under house arrest for two years.

When the amnesty set him and many other army officials free, Mejia said, his life didn't get easy.

She said Guevara Cerritos lived in fear that someone would eventually seek revenge in El Salvador. Every year, the priests' killings were re-created in his hometown of San Salvador and soldiers involved in the incident were burned in effigy.

"He didn't come to the U.S. to hide from justice. He came for asylum, trying to seek refuge," said his attorney, Fernando Romo. "He said he was always looking behind his back, always concerned people would recognize him. Now he's definitely worried they're going to send him back."

Guevara Cerritos is being held at a detention facility in Lancaster pending a deportation hearing.

Romo said Guevara Cerritos' training as a lieutenant in the Salvadoran army helped him cross the rugged Arizona desert last year with the help of a coyote.

Mejia said the U.S. government is wrong about Guevara Cerritos. Rather than being a human rights abuser, she described him as a loving father figure to her children and a gentle, God-fearing man.

"He was a good man," she said.

His attorney also disputed the government contention that a tip led them to Guevara Cerritos.

He says his client was trying to seek asylum and that someone in the government matched his name using the Internet and informed immigration officials, who declined to provide details about the tip.

Other Salvadorans are less sympathetic to Guevara Cerritos' plight.

"He probably thought that by coming to the U.S., things would be better," said Carlos Vaquerano, a Salvadoran activist who said he lost three brothers to the death squads. "He probably thought he could escape his past. That nobody would notice him."

Vaquerano said it was not unheard of for people who were involved in the paramilitary squads to come to the U.S.

Some even became active in churches, he added, "as a way of getting forgiveness."

Voters On Immigration: Action, Please (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 26, 2006

BENSON, ARIZ.

Much of America hit the pause button this fall on the flaming debate over illegal immigration, once it became clear Congress would not act before the election. But not Arizona.

Here in a state where the wave of border crossers is so great that it washes over every aspect of life, illegal immigration is a flash point in virtually every political race this fall. Moreover, there's a candidate for every view - from those saying "send 'em back and bar the door" to those who'd provide a path for citizenship for some undocumented workers.

Randy Graf, a Republican who hopes to win the open seat in a House district that sits on the border, is one who takes a tough stance. As he led a biker rally against illegal immigration on Sunday, someone handed him a frayed denim vest that "used to belong to an illegal alien." When Mr. Graf put it on, the crowd cheered. But the theatrics went too far, and his face blanked when the giver joked: "It has a bullet hole in the back."

Graf is in an uphill battle to hold the Eighth Congressional District for the Republicans. Predecessor Rep. Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, holds a more moderate view of immigration reform, as does Graf's Democratic challenger, Gabrielle Giffords. But Graf is banking that a majority of voters in this district feel as he does - and there are signs that Arizonans are, indeed, worked up over illegal immigration.

"Our surveys show that immigration is the most important issue for likely voters in this state," says Fred Solop, a political scientist at Northern Arizona University and director of the Social Research Laboratory there. But voters aren't distinguishing between competing proposals, he adds: "They just want something to be done."

The state's all-Republican congressional delegation - some of whom are in unexpectedly close contests for reelection - is deeply divided on the immigration issue. Sharing Representative Kolbe's view are Rep. Jeff Flake, in the upscale Phoenix suburb of Mesa, and the very popular Sen. John McCain. They'd like to see an approach to immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship for some of the 12 million people now in the US illegally.

On the other side are Graf and Rep. J.D. Hayworth, who represents the also-upscale Fifth Congressional District in Scottsdale. They say their colleagues' plan amounts to amnesty for illegal immigrants and would reward people for breaking the law. The nation must secure its borders first, they say. Then there's Sen. Jon Kyl, up for reelection this year, who favors expanding a guestworker program but who would also require undocumented workers to leave the US before applying for citizenship.

"Arizona is a microcosm of the nation when it comes to views on this issue. We're ground zero for the debate," says Farrell Quinlan, a spokesman for the Arizona Chamber of Commerce in Phoenix. "Our economy is growing, and a lot of industries have grown to rely on that source of labor."

Senator McCain's approach is to put party loyalty ahead of immigration differences. He has endorsed both Graf and Representative Hayworth, rather than candidates whose views on immigration are closer to his own. He is also stumping for Senator Kyl. Immigration's toll on Arizona

In peak migration season, more than 8,000 immigrants cross from Mexico into Arizona every day, according to the National Border Patrol Council. Many find jobs in the state's booming construction, tourism, and farm industries. But the surge in newcomers exacts a heavy toll on schools, hospitals, and law enforcement, as well as on the migrants themselves, who in summer months perish by the scores in Arizona's harsh border regions.

"Politicians have very little will to change the current system because they're beholden to corporate interests who want the status quo maintained," says T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council of the AFL-CIO.

Arizonans will also vote next month on four ballot initiatives concerning illegal immigration. These include moves to deny bail to illegal immigrants charged with serious felonies, to refuse punitive damage awards to illegals involved in civil lawsuits, to make English the state's official language, and to bar undocumented people from receiving in-state tuition rates, state-funded childcare assistance, and other educational services.

On Friday, the US Supreme Court threw out an order by a federal appeals court that blocked Arizona from enforcing Proposition 200, which requires voters to have voter identification. The governor's seat

Besides McCain, Arizona's other key player in the immigration debate is Gov. Janet Napolitano (D). While she has vetoed GOP bills that would have allowed local police to screen and deport undocumented people, she also makes the case that immigration is a federal responsibility and that Washington should do more to relieve costs borne by border states. In August 2005, she declared a border emergency and has stepped up cooperation with Mexico on issues such as human trafficking and those making fraudulent IDs.

On Nov. 7, she faces Republican Len Munsil, who promises to spend $515 million on border security during his first term as governor, and Libertarian Barry Hess, who says he would give the 110th Congress just 60 days to come up with a plan to secure the border. He also supports cooperating with citizen militias such as the Minutemen.

"It's been very helpful for us to have a governor in Arizona who has a strong record on immigration," says Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. The race for the Eighth district

A founding member of the Minuteman Project and a former state legislator, Graf says his primary goal, if elected, is to stop illegal immigration. While President Bush has increased the border patrol to 14,000 agents by the end of this year, "it will take 40,000 to 50,000 more officers to secure the borders," he said Saturday at a town-hall meeting at a retirement community in Tucson.

National GOP leaders had urged Graf not to run because, they say, he is too hard-core on this issue for the Eight District.

Ms. Giffords, a state senator, is leading Graf in recent polls by double digits. She says Americans do not have confidence in the US House of Representatives, especially its ability to solve the immigration crisis.

"We are shouldering the cost of what is a national problem," she said at the same Tucson meeting on Saturday. Giffords prefers a more comprehensive approach to reform legislation, to open more legal avenues for work "so the border patrol can focus on drug smugglers." A surprise contest in the Fifth

In one of the surprises of the electoral season, Representative Hayworth finds himself in a race that's too close to call. Ordinarily, Hayworth is a fixture on the GOP talk circuit, sent to places where Republican colleagues are in tight races, but he has been staying close to home this time, aides say. His lead in the polls over Democratic challenger Harry Mitchell - once in the double digits - is now down to two or three points. Each camp says its own private poll gives its candidate a slight edge.

"A lot of money is going into that race," says Mr. Solop, the pollster. "Both national parties are in there now."

In a virtuoso debate appearance in Scottsdale on Monday, Hayworth reminded constituents that he is the only Arizonan in history to have served on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee - a role that has allowed him to help the district. Two weeks ago, President Bush signed the Homeland Security Appropriations Act for fiscal year 2007, including funding for a fence along the border with Mexico, in Scottsdale, he said.

Mr. Mitchell, for his part, said Washington has the wrong priorities and that the nation needs a tough, realistic immigration plan.

"The enthusiasm is on our side," said Mitchell at a fundraiser on Friday, shouting over the thunk-thunk-thunk of the music of alternative pop rockers Jimmy Eat World and the Format. Tickets sold out in three days, mainly to students.

"J.D. is really out of touch," Mitchell says of his opponent. "He wants to only seal the border and make everyone a felon. It's just plain not realistic."

Mitchell, who helped lead Tempe's redevelopment and has a statue in his honor, adds: "The state has a 3.6 percent unemployment rate, and it depends on tourism, hospitality, and construction, and they need these workers."

Edward Hermes, a student representative on the Arizona Board of Regents, came to the fundraiser to check out Mitchell's message. "We're tired of all the positioning," he says. "We want a solution."

On Monday, Arizona State University students in Tempe marched to Phoenix in protest over Proposition 300 - the ballot initiative that denies education services and child-care benefits to illegal immigrants.

"Some 60,000 to 100,000 students apply to the university every year. If you spend 20 minutes on each one, you would need 17 full-time positions to deal with Prop. 300," says Jean Moreau. "Tuition goes up every year, and I don't see how we're going to get the money without cutting more classes."

"Voters are in a very ugly mood, on issues ranging from the war, scandals in Washington, the apparent loss of a moral compass, and the economy," says pollster Earl DeBerge of the Rocky Mountain Poll in Flagstaff, Ariz.

TAX:

Survey Finds Giving By Wealthy Largely Immune To Tax Changes (WSJ)

By Sally Beatty

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Many wealthy people would still give a lot to charity even if Congress wiped out popular breaks for donating, a study suggests. While these high-net-worth Americans already contribute two-thirds of household charitable giving, donating $126 billion last year alone, they would give more if nonprofits could rein in administrative costs and better demonstrate the impact of donations.

The researchers at the Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University, underwritten by Bank of America Corp., distributed 30,000 surveys between June and September in neighborhoods where the average household had liquid assets of $3 million or more. Responses from 945 were used in the analysis. The survey, designed as a nationally representative random sample, defined high-net-worth households as those with incomes of greater than $200,000 or assets over $1 million. Such homes represent 3.1% of U.S. households, the researchers said.

The results are at odds with several stereotypes about how and why rich people give to charity. Patrick Rooney, director of research at the center, said previous research has shown that giving declines generally when the value of tax deductions on the donation declines. But 52% of responding households said their giving would stay the same if they received no income-tax deductions for it. And 38% said such giving would somewhat decrease, but only 7% said it would dramatically decrease.

In addition, 56% said the amount they would leave to charity in an estate plan would remain the same if the estate tax were repealed. Politicians and charity officials have been arguing for years about whether a repeal of the estate tax would be good or bad for charity and society at large. Some wealthy Americans, including investor-philanthropists George Soros and Warren Buffett, have argued that doing so could hurt philanthropy by removing incentives to give to charity. But in the study, only a small percentage of high-net-worth households, 1.6%, said repealing the estate tax would dramatically decrease their charitable giving, while 3.9% said it would somewhat decrease giving. Prof. Rooney said that suggests the very rich are less sensitive to tax rates.

The arts, meanwhile, have long been associated with the very rich. But the households surveyed said they give just 11% of their charity dollars to the arts. Nearly double that amount went both to religion and education, each getting about 22% of donations from these households.

Other recent surveys conducted by the center have found that Americans generally give far more in percentage terms -- a full 60% -- to religion. But these households give a lower percentage to education, health and the arts than the wealthy, the center has found.

Charities are under pressure to contain administrative costs and demonstrate the impact of their work. Nearly 75% of the wealthy surveyed said they would give more if less money was spent on administration, and nearly 60% said they would give more if they were able to determine the impact of their gifts.

The study also found that 41% use wills to give away money, and almost 20% use foundations. A large majority of the wealthy (nearly 80%) do volunteer work, and a majority (61%) serve on charity boards. Only 8% say they give as a way to limit funds that will go to their heirs.

"Maybe part of what is driving this lack of reported tax motivation is that this group feels like they are primarily motivated by altruism and giving back to society," said Prof. Rooney.

IRS Help Can Be Hard To Get, Audit Says (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Got a complex tax problem? Phoning an IRS Taxpayer Assistance Center for an appointment won't necessarily produce a solution, a federal audit shows.

The Treasury Department inspector general overseeing the IRS called 50 assistance centers — 36 with tax account problems and 14 with tax law questions. Auditors reported that eight phone messages weren't returned, and five weren't returned within two business days as IRS guidelines require.

Moreover, auditors managed to schedule appointments for just five of the 36 calls that involved tax account problems, the type of complex tax issues that often require a face-to-face session to resolve.

That performance, outlined in an audit released late last week, undermined the centers' mission, the auditors concluded. They stressed that the “convenience of scheduling appointments could encourage taxpayers to try to resolve tax account problems earlier, thus reducing taxpayer burden.”

"When the IRS doesn't provide proper customer service, it's harder for honest taxpayers to pay their taxes correctly," said Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the ranking minority member on the Senate Finance Committee.

"The IRS has made it clear it would like taxpayers to go to its website" for help, said Colleen Kelley, head of the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents IRS workers. "That works for some people, but not for others."

The IRS maintains 400 Taxpayer Assistance Centers nationwide. It encourages taxpayers to request face-to-face appointments for tax account issues that are difficult to resolve over the telephone.

Designated taxpayer phone lines in the offices logged about 500,000 calls during the 2006 federal tax season, from January through mid-April, the audit reported.

Sixty-eight of the centers had been scheduled to close under an IRS budget-cutting plan announced in 2005.

The agency reversed that plan last year after some members of Congress, the IRS employee union and the National Taxpayer Advocate's office argued that shutdowns would hurt the poor, the elderly and others who have limited access to tax counseling.

The new audit blamed the difficulty of getting return calls and appointments on IRS employees who either failed to follow, or were unfamiliar with, agency guidelines. Moreover, the audit characterized some IRS regulations as unclear and obsolete.

"There are no criteria for the Taxpayer Assistance Center employees to follow to determine if an appointment should be made for any tax account issue, or if an appointment can be made only for complex issues that cannot be resolved over the telephone," the audit reported.

Auditors recommended that the IRS update the guidelines and develop new controls to ensure that taxpayer calls are returned.

In a formal response, Richard Morgante, head of the IRS Wage and Investment Division, wrote that the agency agreed to implement the recommendations.

"We will ensure our employees understand we will not refuse an appointment to any taxpayer," Morgante wrote.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

FT Interview: Rob Portman (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

A Democrat victory in next month's midterm elections would jeopardise efforts to contain government spending, put upward pressure on taxes and undermine -America's ability to negotiate free trade agreements, Rob Portman, the White House budget director, claimed on Wednesday.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Mr Portman said voters had an economic choice to make at the polls on November 7.

"There is a clear distinction between Republicans and Democrats, both on the revenue side and on the spending side."

Mr Portman, a former US trade representative, said that "unfortunately" there was also a clear choice on free trade, with Republicans in favour and Democrats largely against.

However, he said he was hopeful that the two parties could come together for a serious attempt to reform Social Security and Medicare after the election, regardless of who won.

His comments come as the Bush administration tries to put the economy at the -centre of the election debate, hoping to capitalise on low unemployment, rising wages, falling petrol prices and a strong stock market.

Mr Portman told the Financial Times that if the Democrats took control of Congress, there would be more pressure for higher spending on non-defence discretionary expenditure. He said the alternative budget for 2007 put forward by Democrats in the House of Representatives increased spending by $177bn (€140bn, £94.5bn) over five years.

"That was positioned as a moderate budget," he said.

He warned voters against assuming that President George W. Bush could veto all extra spending proposals.

"Yes, the president has veto power, and could use it more frequently. But we also need to get these bills done. It is always a matter of negotiation," he said. Mr Portman also suggested that Mr Bush might not veto an increase in the minimum wage proposed by a Democrat Congress, provided it was part of a "package" that included relief for small businesses.

On taxes, Mr Portman asserted that "the Democrat leadership says different things at different times".

He said some congressional Democrats wanted to let all the Bush tax cuts expire, while some wanted to let the tax cuts for bigger earners expire, along with the dividend and capital gains tax cuts.

"They are not going to make the tax cuts permanent."

DOJ_NMG_0086821

But he conceded that even a majority Republican Congress might not find the votes to make all the tax cuts permanent. He said the argument had been shifting in favour of this, with revenues now above their 40-year average of 18.2 per cent of gross domestic product.

Mr Portman claimed a Democrat-run Congress would seek to raise taxes in other areas to offset reform of the Alternative Minimum Tax.

He regretted that trade had become a partisan issue.

"If you look at Republicans vs Democrats, there is a very clear delineation now, unfortunately, on trade. The Democrat leadership is against trade agreements. I don't mean Nafta and big agreements – they seem to be against them all."

A Democrat win next month would make it "more difficult, definitely" for the administration to secure an extension for its fast-track Trade Promotion Authority.

However, he said a renewed push on reform of Social Security and Medicare would still be possible, even if Congress changed hands. A growing number of Democrats as well as Republicans in Congress recognised the need to slow the growth of entitlement spending.

"I think it is possible regardless," he said.

Entering The Era Of Smart Card ID (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The government begins issuing a new identification card tomorrow, the kickoff of a multiyear effort to provide all government workers and many contractors with a "smart card" that can be used to verify their identity when they enter a building or log onto computer networks.

In addition to showing a person's name and agency, an electronic chip in the card will contain personal data, such as images from two fingerprints, a special identification number and digital certificates that permit access to places and systems.

President Bush issued a homeland security directive in 2004 requiring that agencies issue the cards and install software that will allow them to be recognized across the government. The goal is to have government employees carry one ID card, replacing the multiple cards many employees must use to get into offices or obtain sensitive information.

Issuing the cards and upgrading equipment to read them will probably take three to five years, said Karen Evans , the administrator for electronic government and technology at the Office of Management and Budget. The ambitious effort, she said, will improve national security and ensure "that we give access to who we should."

Groups concerned about privacy rights and database security are watching the Bush administration's card project, in part because it may provide lessons for ongoing debates on whether Americans should carry a national identification card.

Evans said personal data on government employees and contractors would not be compiled in one vast database. However, it seems likely that some large records-keeping systems will be created or expanded with the advent of the new card.

There is no tally of how many smart cards will be handed out across the government, but they will number in the millions. The Defense Department, for example, has 3.2 million "common access cards" in circulation and will replace them as they expire -- a five-year project that includes deployment of new software.

There's also no estimate of how many federal employees will be issued the new smart card tomorrow.

Officials at the Office of Management and Budget hope to see the cards roll out tomorrow in cities with large numbers of federal employees, such as Washington, Atlanta, Denver, Seattle and New York. OMB has asked agencies to send in a photocopy of a card they have issued, with appropriate privacy redactions, so that the White House knows they have put a smart-card program in place.

The General Services Administration and the Interior Department are issuing the smart cards on behalf of numerous agencies and departments. Some, such as Defense and the Social Security Administration, will run their own card programs.

The Social Security Administration said it issued a smart card to Jo Anne Barnhart , the agency's commissioner, last week, and plans to issue about 100,000 of the cards over the next two years.

The Defense Department issues about 10,000 ID cards every day. Matt Boehmer , director of the joint advertising market research and studies program at the Defense Human Resources Agency, has volunteered to take on the ceremonial role of first Defense recipient of the next-generation ID card, said Lynne Prince , acting director for the department's access card office.

Bush called for "secure and reliable forms of identification" to be developed for government workers as part of the administration's efforts to stop terrorists, criminals and unauthorized persons from getting into federal buildings and hacking into computer systems.

Employees receiving the smart card undergo a credit and criminal background check.

The process set up by the GSA, which is providing card services to 38 federal agencies and departments, takes a person's fingerprints, checks them against FBI records and enters them into a database, along with a photograph and other personal data.

The GSA had enrolled more than 70 people as of yesterday, an official said.

"We have assured our clients that one person from every participating agency will receive a credential on Friday. We probably will be issuing more than one, but that is our minimum target," said Michel Kareis , the GSA program manager.

Kareis said the GSA smart-card database will cover at least 400,000 people, and probably more because information on how many contractors will need the card is incomplete.

The GSA cards will cost the agencies $110 for each initial issuance and $52 annually for card and database maintenance. If more than 500,000 cards are issued, the GSA will be able to take advantage of the volume and lower prices, Kareis said.

She said the GSA plans to set up about 200 enrollment stations throughout the nation, starting next year, to get the new ID cards out to federal employees.

Fed Leaves Rates Alone For The Third Time (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve, holding interest rates steady Wednesday for the third consecutive meeting, says it expects economic growth to continue, despite the widespread slump in the housing market.

But the central bank cautioned that inflation remains a threat given the tight job market, even after the recent fall in energy prices.

"Economic growth has slowed over the course of the year, partly reflecting a cooling of the housing market," the Fed said in a statement at the conclusion of its two-day meeting. "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

The Fed kept its target for short-term interest rates steady at 5.25%, the highest in nearly six years. Although the Fed does not directly set mortgage or other private-sector loan rates, its short-term rate target is used as a benchmark when banks price consumer and business loans.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and other officials have said they expect inflation to gradually moderate as growth slows. However, they repeated their warning that incoming data will determine whether they need to raise rates again.

"We don't think there will be any more rate hikes," Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh told clients. Economists at the firm expect the Fed to cut rates next year, possibly as early as March.

More than half of 53 top economists surveyed by USA TODAY Oct. 13-18 expect the Fed to hold steady for months, then reduce rates in the first half of 2007. The economists, on average, expect one rate cut.

But some economists cautioned against complacency, pointing out that inflation was still too high. The core consumer price index, an inflation measure that excludes food and energy, is up 2.9% in the past 12 months, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort range.

"We continue to look for the next move from the Fed to be a hike in rates," John Ryding of Bear Stearns said in a note to clients, adding the timing of any move was unclear.

The central bank raised rates 17 times in quarter-point increments from June 2004 to June 2006. The effort was designed to remove excess stimulus from the economy and keep inflation under wraps.

The economy expanded at a brisk 5.6% annual rate in the first quarter of the year but slowed to a 2.6% pace in the second. The government will announce its third-quarter growth estimate on Friday. Behravesh expects growth to have cooled to a 1.5% annual rate, which he says would be the low before a moderate pickup.

Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker dissented for a third meeting, preferring a quarter-point rate increase to combat inflation. Lacker is the first Fed official to do so since 1998, Moody's Economy.com. says.

Fed Again Leaves Rates Unchanged (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Reserve held short-term interest rates steady for its third consecutive meeting as it continued to bet on a moderation of both inflation and economic growth.

Even as it left rates at 5.25% yesterday, the Fed again warned that it is worried about inflation.

Since Ben Bernanke became Fed chairman in February, he has faced, first, the threat of rising inflation and then a housing-led economic slowdown. The latest data, and the statement released by the Fed after its meeting yesterday, suggest that the central bank sees the risks on both sides diminishing. That makes it less likely that rates will change in either direction in coming months.

Both the rate action and statement were largely expected. Bond prices rallied and bond yields, which move in the opposite direction to prices, fell, apparently because investors had expected more hints of a possible rate increase.

Futures markets' expectations of Fed actions have swung sharply in the past month, from betting on several rate cuts starting as soon as December to seeing a small probability that the Fed might raise rates.

In its statement, the Fed said growth has slowed in part because of a "cooling" housing market. "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace," it said, a notable addition to its statement released after last month's meeting.

Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, remains "elevated" but inflation pressures are likely to moderate thanks to lower energy prices, "contained" inflation expectations, and the impact of previous rate increases, the Fed said.

"Some inflation risks remain," the Fed said, but whether rates would rise again depends on the outlook and "incoming information."

For the third straight meeting, Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker cast the lone dissent among the 11 voting members of the Federal Open Market Committee. He argued in favor of a quarter-percentage point rate increase in the target federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks. (One voting seat is empty and seven other members don't vote.)

Mr. Bernanke has faced shifting challenges since taking office. Core inflation has risen to 2.9% from 2.1%, the highest level in a decade. Although inflation by the Fed's preferred price index is lower, it, too, is above the 2% level many Fed officials have said they are comfortable with. That led the Fed to raise rates at its first three meetings under Mr. Bernanke.

Then later economic growth, under the weight of falling home and automobile sales, began to slow, to an estimated annual rate of about 2% in the third quarter. That would be the second-lowest level since 2003. The official growth figure will be reported tomorrow.

In recent weeks, though, both inflation and growth worries have eased. Energy prices have plunged, and the Fed expects the indirect impact of that drop to pull down core inflation in the coming year or so. Yesterday's Fed statement dropped a reference from the previous month to energy and commodity prices as a source of inflation pressure.

There is little sign the economy outside housing and cars has slowed much. Some economists said the housing market has shown tentative signs of hitting bottom.

Yesterday, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales fell 2% in September to an annual rate of 6.18 million, from August. The inventory of existing homes remained at about 7.3 months of sales for the third consecutive month.

"We might be having what some colleagues have described as a false landing rather than soft landing," said Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist at LaSalle Bank. He said growth could rebound to 3% in the current quarter as the housing correction ends and consumers benefit from a 25% to 40% drop in gasoline prices.

"The Fed must ask itself: Did things slow down long enough and far enough to reduce pressure on capacity? I think the next move [on rates] is probably up."

Rajeev Dhawan, director of the Economic Forecasting Center at Georgia State University, predicted the Fed would cut rates by January. With long-term rates well below short-term rates -- a relationship that in the past has foreshadowed recession -- "the risk factors are too high," he said.

The shifting momentum of growth from strong to weak and back to moderate reflects the remarkable stability the U.S. economy now enjoys, said John Makin, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "As has often been the case over the past five years, the slowdown itself has set into motion market adjustments that may mitigate or even reverse it," he wrote in a report.

For example, the Fed's decision to pause as the housing market weakened led investors to drive down long-term rates on bonds and mortgages. That, with a lag, has helped put a floor under housing.

Online lender Quicken Loans Inc.'s pipeline of mortgage applications has grown 20% to 25% since rates began to ease in late June, said the company's chief economist, Bob Walters. The increase has been driven mostly by refinancing applications, while the number of applications for new-home purchases remains steady. "Whether we've seen the bottom or not, remains to be seen," he said.

Fed Holds Key Rate Steady At 5.25% (WP)

By Nell Henderson

DOJ_NMG_0086824

Federal Reserve policymakers decided to hold short-term interest rates steady yesterday but left the door open to raising them in coming months if inflation stays too high.

The economy has lost steam this year, partly because of the sharp downturn in the housing market, the central bank's policymaking Federal Open Market Committee said in a statement after a two-day meeting.

That slowdown should eventually help ease inflation, but unemployment remains low and factories remain busy, which could fan price pressures in the shorter term.

"Some inflation risks remain," the central bankers said, making it clear they might move interest rates higher if inflation proves more stubborn than they forecast.

Even so, the committee had an upbeat outlook, saying it expects the economy to "expand at a moderate pace" -- a sign that it doesn't expect the housing slump to drag the rest of the economy into a recession.

"It seems like we have rising odds of a soft landing," said Elizabeth Weymouth, a global investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank. "The risk of a recession has faded dramatically, and inflation appears headed back down."

Stocks rose shortly after the Fed's announcement, as investors welcomed that message and concluded the central bank will leave interest rates on hold for a while.

The committee left its benchmark federal funds rate, the overnight rate charged on loans between banks, at 5.25 percent. The Fed has held the benchmark rate at that level since June, after raising it gradually from 1 percent over two years.

One of the committee's 11 voting members voted against the decision. Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, in his third dissent in as many Fed meetings, would have preferred to raise the funds rate to 5.5 percent.

"The longer inflation remains elevated, the more difficult it will be to bring it back down," Lacker said in a speech in Washington two weeks ago, explaining that he thinks another rate increase is needed to lower inflation more quickly.

Inflation surged earlier this year as oil prices peaked above $77 a barrel in July, and as prices climbed for education, medical care, rental housing and other items.

But inflation has fallen as fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August. The Labor Department's consumer price index declined 0.5 percent in September, and was up 2.1 percent in the 12 months ended in September.

However, economists also look for signs of underlying inflation by studying core measures that exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The core CPI rose 0.2 percent last month and 2.9 percent from September 2005 -- the highest 12-month increase in a decade.

The Fed expects inflation to fall over time because of lower fuel prices, slower economic growth and other factors, the statement said.

But some analysts were more skeptical, noting that falling gasoline prices have helped spur consumer spending, that the labor market remains tight and that wages have been rising -- all potential sources of inflationary pressure.

Fed policymakers "are betting on energy prices to basically do their work for them," said Drew Matus, a senior economist with Lehman Brothers Inc., which predicts the central bank will lift its benchmark rate once more to 5.5 percent before it is done.

"We expect the slowdown in growth will not be sufficient to pull down inflation on its own. You'll need a little extra boost" in interest rates," Matus said.

The Fed seeks to control inflation and encourage economic growth by adjusting interest rates. Tighter credit discourages consumers and businesses from borrowing and spending, which dampens growth and price pressures; easier credit does the opposite.

The Fed's benchmark rate directly influences other short-term rates, such as those charged on credit cards and home-equity loans. But it only indirectly influences long-term rates, which are determined more by global financial markets. Mortgage rates, for example, have declined in recent months.

The Fed spent some of its two-day meeting discussing its communication policies. Members of the group had agreed in August that they wanted to find better ways to inform the public about their economic goals. The Fed announced no changes yesterday on that issue.

Home Prices Keep Sliding; Buyers Sit Tight (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The air continues to seep out of the U.S. housing market, according to the latest data, and some economists are warning that prices will keep declining through much of 2007.

The National Association of Realtors yesterday reported the biggest drop in home prices since the trade group began compiling price data in 1968. Specifically, the association said the median price for home sales completed in September was

$220,000, down 2.2% from a year earlier. That matched a revised 2.2% decline in August. In addition to being the largest price drops in at least 38 years, the back-to-back declines are the first time median home prices have fallen since 1995.

Other data gathered by The Wall Street Journal show large inventories of unsold homes and declining price trends in most major metropolitan areas.

"Housing is still contracting," says Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks Inc. in Atlanta. "We haven't yet found the bottom." Mr. Miller doesn't expect house prices to resume their usual rising trend until 2008.

The latest report is likely to encourage many potential buyers to hold off in the hope of further price declines. "There's no rush," says Robert Cook, a procurement manager living in Whitehall, Pa., who is looking to buy a larger home for his family in Pennsylvania's Lehigh Valley.

Rather than slash their prices, some sellers are taking homes off the market until they see stronger demand. Audrey Heckaman, a pharmaceutical sales representative in Cleveland, bought a new condo in a golfing community in Naples, Fla., in 2004 for $221,000. Early this year, she put it on the market for $429,000. But she found that too many other units in the same development were on the market. After cutting her price to $384,000, she yanked the home from the market in June and found renters for part of the year. In the long run, she figures, demand from retiring baby boomers will drive prices back up.

For those who want to buy now, sellers are dangling lots of incentives. A developer in Dadeland, Fla., near Miami, is offering $5,000 of furniture as an inducement for buyers of new condominiums, says Ronald A. Shuffield, president of the brokerage firm Esslinger-Wooten-Maxwell Inc. Other developers offer to pay some of the fees and other costs usually borne by home purchasers.

Some people who are forced to sell quickly are suffering huge losses. At an auction in Naples last weekend, the highest bid for a three-bedroom lakefront house was $440,000, including commissions and auction fees. The house had sold in July 2005 for $690,000.

Despite the recent drop-off, house prices remain far above the levels of five years ago, and they continue to rise in some areas, including Seattle, Houston and Raleigh, N.C. But they are falling sharply in other places. In Massachusetts, the median price for single-family homes in September was down 8.3% from a year before, according to Warren Group Inc., a publisher and data collector in Boston. In Phoenix, the median price dropped 4.8% in September, the local Realtors association reported.

In some areas, prices are only just beginning to fall back toward realistic levels, says Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va. He believes that prices could fall more than 10% from their peak levels in markets such as Sacramento, Calif.; San Diego; Las Vegas; Reno, Nev.; Phoenix and parts of northern Virginia and Florida.

Nationwide, sales of previously occupied homes in September were at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.2 million, down 1.9% from August and 14% from a year earlier, the Realtors group reported.

In a mildly positive sign for home sellers, the number of homes listed for sale at the end of September declined 2.4% from a month earlier to 3.75 million. But that was smaller than the usual decline in September, when the resumption of school and the approach of the holidays typically begin to reduce the number of for-sale signs. Over the past decade, inventories of home sales have declined an average of 3.6% in September from the previous month.

Inventories in September were up about 35% from a year earlier. A surge in inventories, fueled partly by investors rushing for the exits, began chilling the housing market in mid-2005 after a five-year boom that more than doubled prices in many areas.

Despite the spreading weakness in house prices, few experts expect anything approaching a collapse. The economy continues to expand, though at a slower rate, and a recent drop in interest rates helps make mortgage costs more affordable.

To gauge residential real-estate prospects for 27 major metro areas, The Wall Street Journal gathered data on inventories of homes for sale at the end of the second quarter from a variety of local sources; pricing trends based on surveys of real-estate agents by Daniel Oppenheim, an analyst at Banc of America Securities in New York, a unit of Bank of America Corp.; and data on late mortgage payments and job-creation prospects from Moody's Economy.com, a research firm in West Chester, Pa. Employment trends tend to drive demand for housing.

Metropolitan areas with large increases in homes on the market and weak job-growth projections include Detroit, New York and Los Angeles. Inventories have more than doubled from a year earlier in the Miami, Orlando, Tampa and Phoenix metro areas, but strong job and population growth should help to soak up excess supply in the next few years.

Even within metro areas, price trends vary considerably depending on neighborhoods and types of housing. In northern New Jersey, for instance, prices for homes below about $400,000 may start rising again slightly by next spring if interest rates remain around current levels, says Jeffrey Otteau, president of Otteau Valuation Group Inc., an appraisal and research firm in East Brunswick, N.J. At that price level, "there's virtually zero construction," he says. But he says there is such a glut of luxury housing in the area that prices of such homes won't recover before 2008.

Tom Doyle, an agent at Naples Realty Services who compiles market data on his Web site (www.naplesinsider.com), estimates that prices for typical homes in the area are down 15% to 20% from their peak a year ago. Inventory has doubled during that time, but many of the homes on the market are priced so high that they have "only a lottery's chance of selling," he says. Looking ahead to this winter's selling season, Mr. Doyle says he expects prices to be flat to lower because of the large supply of homes for sale.

Seattle has been one of the strongest markets in recent months but is showing signs of losing some steam as inventories of unsold homes rise. In 17 counties of western and central Washington State covered by the Northwest Multiple Listing Service, the median price in September was up 9.4% from a year earlier, the first single-digit increase in two years.

Mike Skahen, owner of real-estate brokerage Lake & Co. in Seattle, says inventory is still lean in good neighborhoods near the area's biggest employers. But the overall market is slowing to a more normal pace as "buyers are feeling they can be more selective."

Houston's market is benefiting from job growth at energy and technology companies and draws newcomers because of its low home prices. The median price in the second quarter was $152,700, compared with a national median of $227,500, according to the National Association of Realtors.

In North Carolina, Charlotte, Raleigh and some other areas have been strong lately as moderate weather and relatively low housing costs attract employers and retirees. Pat Riley, president of Allen Tate Realtors in Charlotte, has noticed increasing numbers of people moving to North Carolina from Florida to flee congestion and high housing and insurance costs. One hitch: Some people moving to Charlotte are having trouble selling their homes elsewhere and so are delaying purchases.

The median price of new and previously occupied homes sold in the eight-county Charlotte region was $182,000 in the third quarter, up 6% from a year earlier, according to Market Opportunity Research Enterprises, a research firm in Rocky Mount, N.C. But the Charlotte market may be starting to cool a bit. The Charlotte Regional Realtors Association reported that home sales in September slipped 2% from a year earlier, while the average price edged down 0.2%.

The California Association of Realtors last week forecast that the median home price in the state will slip 2% to $550,000 in 2007, after rising 7% in 2006 and 16% in 2005. That would mark the first California-wide decline since 1996. California's last house-price slump lasted from 1992 through 1996.

Leslie Appleton-Young, the California Realtors' chief economist, says she doesn't expect the current downturn to be as severe as the one in the 1990s because she thinks the job market will be healthier this time. Many people don't need to sell and will withdraw their homes from the market until demand recovers, she says. Still, she adds, some investors who bought near the top and took on too much debt "are going to get into trouble."

Sellers Sing The Blues As Price Drop Sets Record (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Then: San Diego's housing market was so hot that the town house next to Jeff Cruce's was flipped from buyer to seller three times in three years. The owners, who never moved in, didn't even need to put up a “For Sale” sign.

Now: Since August, Cruce and seven of his neighbors have put their town houses on the market (that's nearly 20% of the units in the complex). All have cut their prices, including Cruce, who chopped his price last month by $30,000 to $559,000. Not one has received an offer yet. Each time one owner would lower the asking price, it put pressure on the others to follow, says Cruce, 38, a salesman who's moving to Atlanta.

That domino effect, rippling through neighborhoods across the country, pushed down the nation's median home price in September by the largest amount on record, the National Association of Realtors (NAR) said Wednesday.

The median price for a single-family home slipped 2.5% from September last year to $219,800, the sharpest annual drop since the NAR began tracking the data in 1969. The median-priced condominium fell 2.8% to $219,800, the fourth annual decline in a row.

At the same time, the volume of home sales fell for the sixth straight month, tumbling 14% in September compared with a year ago.

In the softest real estate markets, sellers are waking up to the harsh reality that they can't get anywhere near what their neighbors sold their homes for last year. So they're grudgingly reducing their asking prices and offering to pay closing costs.

At the same time, many buyers, emboldened by the transformed market, are low-balling sellers and getting deals they couldn't have imagined last year.

Just ask Sevan Derderian and Reggie Johnson.

In 2004, Derderian bought a house in Las Vegas as an investment for $281,000. He found tenants, but he kicked them out after 10 months because their rent was always late.

“I found that it's really hard to be a landlord from a state or two away,” says Derderian, 43, a salesman in Los Angeles. He held onto the property for another year, hoping prices would keep going up. Once the market turned south, though, he panicked.

He listed the house in the summer for $305,000. Having owned real estate only during boom years, he assumed it would sell in about a week. After a month, he cut the price to $289,900. Another week went by. He offered to pay nearly $9,000 toward a buyer's closing costs.

Then along came Johnson, a 38-year-old truck driver, who snapped up the house and boasts, “I got a great deal.”

Derderian, in the meantime, lost about $25,000 from paying the mortgage on an empty home.

That's a risk confronting sellers in 56 metro areas, including Las Vegas, San Diego, Phoenix, New York and Miami, that are expected to suffer annual price drops, according to a study this month by Moody's Economy.com.

Prices in a few markets, such as Las Vegas and Portland, Ore., won't bottom out until 2009, the study projected, and in many areas prices will stay flat through the end of the decade. (For a full list, see www.money.usatoday.com.)

“It was surprising just how quickly the market seemed to turn,” says Mark Zandi, chief economist for Economy.com. “It was like, boom, boom, bust. It was like, ‘What happened?' The psychology in the marketplace unraveled very rapidly.”

In fact, about half of American homeowners who thought of selling their homes in the past year have delayed putting their homes on the market, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup poll conducted this month.

And roughly one-third of those who had considered selling have abandoned the idea. (The poll of 1,007 adults has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.)

Of course, home prices aren't going to fall in every market. About one-third of the nation is expected to see moderate price growth for the rest of the year. Those areas include Dallas, Austin, Newark, Del., and Birmingham, Ala. — areas where prices didn't test the stratosphere during the boom.

Even in the once-sizzling markets, homeowners and investors who bought their properties more than two years ago should still see modest gains if they sell in the current market.

But it's clearly a buyer's market now. The number of homes for sale has bulged to a 7.3-month supply compared with 4.6 months last September. The backlog of homes for sale is thickest in the areas that witnessed the fastest price growth and investor activity.

“It's frustrating,” says Cindy Holliday, a high school math teacher who recently took a job in Chicago. “Homes were selling for so much more a few months ago, and now nothing's selling at all.”

Holliday and her husband were house hunting in Chicago in June when they put their home in Ocala, Fla., up for sale.

“Before we put our house on the market, houses were selling so fast we didn't think we'd have a problem selling our house at all,” says Holliday, 31.

“When we got back down there (to Ocala), just about every other house on our street was for sale. It was very depressing.”

Though their house probably would have fetched nearly $200,000 earlier this year, they listed it at $179,000. A couple of weeks ago, they trimmed the price to $174,500.

But it's no easier for sellers in Chicago, says Javier Diaz. He's made several profitable real estate investments, but the three-unit apartment building he bought in Chicago earlier this year wasn't one of them.

“I figured this year the property would go up 30 or 40 grand, but that didn't happen,” says Diaz, 28.

He put it up for sale in September, asking $415,000. He's already cut the price twice, to $375,000. That's less than he owes on his loan, which means that if Diaz sells at that price, he'll have to pull $5,000 out of his own pocket to pay the bank.

Being a mortgage broker, Diaz knows some investors who used their home equity like debit cards. He says of the quick decline in real estate, “It's coming like a culture shock to many.”

Vicki di Bernardo agrees. “It taught us a lesson,” she says of the downturn in Las Vegas. “It was a little risky, but we got caught up in it. Everyone was doing it. … (Now) everyone is very, very nervous here about the real estate market.”

She recalls buying a single-family home in the Las Vegas suburb of Summerlin as an investment in 2003.

“We were on a huge waiting list, and our names came up, and we had to go in with a check and give it to them within a couple of hours or they'd go to the next on the list.”

She rented the house out for two years. But when her tenants moved out in February, she put it on the market for $574,000.

“In the first three months, we didn't have one showing — not one,” says di Bernardo, 60, who works in human resources. At the end of May, she dropped the price to $519,000. Three weeks later, she came down to $499,000. Even then, only looky-loos came by.

“There was so much inventory” on the market, di Bernardo recalls. “So many builders had offered huge incentives, like no mortgage payments for 12 months or a swimming pool. We had it on the market for $479,000 when an offer came in at $460,000.”

She grabbed it. She still made $175,000, but that's about $100,000 less than she'd have made if she sold last year.

Builders, with no emotional attachment to their homes, have become one of the biggest financial threats to individual sellers. New-home sales are down 16% this year. Building permits for single-family homes are off by 20%. Faced with a huge number of cancellations, builders began trying to lure buyers with eye-catching deals, such as free vacations, media rooms and landscaping.

That's what's hurting Bryan Rauch. In January, he bought a home in Anthem, Ariz., where Pulte Homes is offering a slew of incentives, including advice from re-sale experts to help buyers fix up and sell their current homes.

“The plan was to renovate it and flip it,” says Rauch, 37, a nurse-turned-real-estate-investor.

He put the home back on the market in February, at $284,000, then lowered the price repeatedly until he hit $270,000. Still no buyers. After six months, he rented it out at a $500-a-month loss.

“The problem is the builder is giving away homes,” Rauch says. “Properties like this are now selling for the low $200s.”

But Rauch needs to cut his losses. So he's putting the home back on the market at $260,000 and crossing his fingers — like a lot of other sellers around the country.

A Record Drop In Home Prices (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

The price of existing homes last month fell 2.2 percent, the largest monthly decline in the almost four decades the number has been tracked, according to an industry report released yesterday.

Nationwide, the number of existing single-family homes sold fell 14.2 percent in September compared with September 2005, according to the report from the National Association of Realtors. The number of sales has fallen each month since March.

Prices fell everywhere in the country, with the Northeast and West most affected. Declines were more moderate in the South, which includes the Washington area.

The median price nationally of an existing single-family home in September was $220,000, down from $225,000 a year earlier. It was the largest monthly decline since the Realtors began monitoring prices monthly in 1968. It was the second month in a row that home prices fell compared with a year earlier. The median is the point at which half of the homes cost more and half cost less.

One reason prices are dropping is that sellers are having a harder time finding buyers.

Nazirahk Amen, 39, a natural medicine practitioner and acupuncturist, thought a buyer would snap up his three-bedroom, three-bath Cape Cod in Takoma Park. He was so confident that his organic garden and greenhouse would be a particularly strong lure in that community that he bought another house nearby and moved. For the past two months, he has been making two mortgage payments, and recently reduced the price $25,000 to attract a bidder.

"Of course it's frustrating," Amen said. "I'm looking for this to end. It's frustrating, to say the least."

Realtors' association officials blame the continuing slump on what Lawrence Yun, the group's senior economist, called "confidence issues." Yun said buyers are waiting until they think the market has hit bottom, particularly because high prices have made houses less affordable.

"Psychological factors have people on the sidelines," Yun said. "They are waiting to time the market."

Yun saw reason for optimism, and thinks an upturn is at hand. He said the September figures represent a "trough in the market," because for the past two months, the inventory of unsold homes has fallen slightly.

"Supply was artificially elevated" earlier in the year when real estate investors bailed out of the market, Yun said.

Thomas M. Stevens, a Vienna-based real estate broker who serves as president of the national trade group, said in a statement that he was heartened by the decline in properties coming onto the market, which he said would lead to a better "supply balance."

Charles W. McMillion, an economist and president of District-based MBG Information Services, said he saw little sign that the decline was ending. "I don't see stability when sales continue to decline sharply and price continued to decline sharply," McMillion said. "It's pretty hard to argue we've reached a sustainable level."

Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland, said reduced inventory of unsold houses may mean "frustrated buyers are removing their homes from the market." Morici said that major price adjustments will be needed to bring the market back into balance.

"The speculative frenzy of recent years is causing a major adjustment, and the happy talk of Realtors is prolonging the process," Morici said. "The absence of realistic analysis about the extent of overvaluation is characteristic in an industry that sees nothing but an upward progression for values, but houses like any other asset can be overpriced. . . . Things are likely to get worse before they get better."

According to yesterday's report, prices in the Northeast in September dropped 5.1 percent compared with a year earlier and those in the West dropped 4.3 percent. In the South, they were down 1.6 percent.

The federal government is scheduled to release figures today on sales of new homes, which have also been falling this year. That weakness has been reflected in the earnings reports of national home builders. This week, for instance, Dallas-based builder Centex Corp., which has 40 projects in the Washington area, reported that its earnings in the quarter ended Sept. 30 fell 59 percent. "We have been aggressively responding to deteriorating market conditions" by reducing land purchases and cutting staff, Timothy R. Eller, Centex's chairman and chief executive, said in a statement.

Dow Hits High After Fed Keeps Rates Steady (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial notched its third consecutive record Wednesday — its third such winning streak in three weeks — after the Federal Reserve did as expected and left interest rates unchanged (story, 1B).

The Dow rose 6.80 points to 12,134.68. While that was less than 0.1%, it was a new closing high and extended the Dow's 2006 gain to 13.2%. The Standard & Poor's 500 set another 2006 high as it rose 4.84 points to 1382.22 and stretched its gain for the year to 10.7%. The Nasdaq composite remained the laggard. It gained 11.75 points to 2356.59 for a 6.9% 2006 gain.

The Fed's Open Market Committee kept its benchmark rate unchanged at 5.25% for a third straight meeting, but it noted in its accompanying policy statement that recent readings on inflation have moved higher recently.

Stocks waffled after the Fed's decision was released as investors worried that inflation concerns could prompt the central bank to resume its rate increases in the future. There may also have been some disappointment because “It's not a sign that the Fed is going to be cutting rates anytime soon,” says Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Bros.

Highlights:

Amazon.com jumped $4.05, or 12%, to $37.68. Late Tuesday, the online retailer reported better-than-expected third-quarter results and gave bullish guidance for the current period.

·Adobe Systems added 85 cents to $38.94. The software company boosted its fourth-quarter earnings guidance based on a gain from the recent sale of an equity investment.

·Altria rose $2.28 to $82.10. The cigarette giant posted a small drop in third-quarter profit and said its board would announce in January plans for a possible divestiture of Kraft Foods. Kraft fell 2 cents to $35.34.

·GateHouse Media closed at $21.17, up 18% from the $18 at which the newspaper publisher went public.

·Yankee Candle climbed $5.01, or 17%, to $33.73 on news Madison Dearborn Partners is buying the retailer for $34.75 a share, or $1.4 billion in cash.

·LifeCell plunged $8.02, or 25%, to $23.82. The maker of products from human tissue for use in surgeries said third-quarter profit more than doubled but lowered its 2006 outlook.

·DaimlerChrysler climbed $2.35 to $54.68. The automaker posted 37% lower third-quarter profit but still beat estimates (story, 3B). General Motors fell $1.48 to $34.71. It posted a smaller loss in the third quarter (story, 1B).

Stocks Rise On Fed News But Crude Curbs Gains (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The stock market rallied on news that the Federal Reserve isn't raising rates but gains were held in check by a jump in crude-oil prices, which typically hurts stocks.

In its weekly report on U.S. stockpiles of various energy products like gasoline and heating oil, the Energy Department said crude storage was down nearly 1% to 332.3 million barrels for the period ended Friday, contrary to traders' expectations for a rise.

As a result, crude contracts for December delivery leapt $2.05, or 3.5%, to $61.40 a barrel. The rally pushed prices back into positive territory for the year, up 0.6% on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 6.80 points, or 0.1%, to 12134.68, up 13.2% for the year. Among the blue-chip measure's 30 component companies, Exxon Mobil rallied 1.6% because of crude's run-up. But weak third-quarter results at both Boeing and General Motors pushed their shares down more than 3% each.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.4%, or 4.84 points, to 1382.22, up 10.7% for the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 11.75 points, to 2356.59, up 6.9% for the year.

As expected, the Fed left its key rate target unchanged at 5.25%. In its statement, the Fed deleted its previous mention of energy prices and other commodities, which have generally fallen since policy makers met last month and identified them as a potential source of inflation. The Fed included a new sentence: "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

Elizabeth Weymouth, global investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, said the statement supported the growing sentiment on Wall Street this week that a rate cut is unlikely in the near future. She said it also bolstered investment advice that her firm has been touting to clients this week -- that economic growth should remain strong enough into early 2007 to support strong profit growth at big-name U.S. companies.

"We think this is a time for investors to add some risk to their portfolios," via stocks in the Russell 1000-stock index, said Ms. Weymouth.

In a recent report to clients, economists at Credit Suisse said the Fed is likely to maintain "a tightening bias" for some time. But that doesn't necessarily mean a rate boost is imminent, they said. Rather, central bankers could merely be discouraging traders from betting on a rate cut, or they could be leaving themselves leeway while they consider their next move, Credit Suisse economist Kathleen Stephansen said in an interview. "They may have some fine-tuning to do at some point, but you won't see a tightening cycle," including several increases in a row, she predicted.

In other news, sales of existing homes in the U.S. fell 1.9% in September. The median price of a single-family home slipped to $219,800, down 2.5% from a year ago, the biggest price drop on record, according to the National Association of Realtors.

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note gained 14/32 point, or $4.375 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.767%. The 30-year bond rose 28/32 to yield 4.888%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.02 yen, compared with 119.30 yen. The euro rose to $1.2610 from $1.2563.

Amtrak Careless In Managing Outside Counsel, Report Says (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Amtrak has been careless in managing law firms that have billed it millions in legal fees, according to a report released Wednesday by federal investigators.

The report, issued jointly by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General and the U.S. Department of Transportation Inspector General, said that the law department of the passenger railroad, for example, failed consistently to request and manage budgets for legal work. Also, law firms engaged in "block billing," in which firms lump tasks under one entry of an invoice rather than showing the costs of each task. The practice is prohibited by Amtrak's billing guidelines, the report says.

"About 30% of the billings were block billed, which is actually not allowed," says U.S. Rep. John Mica (R., Fla.), a member of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure who requested the probe.

Amtrak, which is federally subsidized, has been struggling to reverse years of losses and has faced Bush administration calls to sharply reduce its long-distance train service.

A letter addressed to Rep. Mica and released Wednesday from the chairman of Amtrak's board, David Laney, said Amtrak reduced annual legal fees by 26%, or $8 million, since 2003, and in the past five years, working with outside law firms, recovered $79 million in cash from legal settlements. "Still … the report should provide us with valuable guidance as we continue to improve Law Department operations," the letter said.

From 2002 to 2005, according to the report, Amtrak paid more than $100 million in legal fees -- $40 million of which went to 10 firms, which are listed in the report. The firms with the highest billings were Landman Corsi Ballaine & Ford P.C. ($11.6 million); Manatt, Phelps & Phillips LLP ($7.4 million) and DLA Piper LLP ($4.1 million). The firms did not immediately respond to requests for comment. (See the full list of firms, at the Law Blog4.)

While finding fault with Amtrak, the report did not criticize law firms by name. But all of the firms listed failed to follow at least some of Amtrak's guidelines, according to John Toothman, a professional legal-fee auditor who was hired by Amtrak's Office of Inspector General to assist it in its investigation of billing practices.

Americans Expect Major Changes If Dems Win Nov. 7 (USAT)

By Susan Page

DOJ_NMG_0086831

WASHINGTON — Most Americans predict Democrats will win control of the House of Representatives in the elections Nov. 7, and they expect big things to follow — some good, some not — if Democrats take over the Senate, too, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

If Democrats take over the House and Senate in January, more than 8 in 10 say, Congress would probably set a timetable to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, a step favored by nearly two-thirds.

Less popular: Nearly two-thirds expect a Democratic Congress would raise federal income taxes. Three-fourths disapprove of that.

Any such legislation would have to be signed by President Bush to take effect. Or Congress would need two-thirds majorities in both chambers to override any veto.

The survey of 1,002 adults Friday through Sunday underscores the high expectations and some trepidations around the prospect that Democrats could regain control of Congress for the first time since 1994. A 54% majority, including 1 in 4 Republicans, say a takeover of the House is likely.

If so, some analysts say, Democratic leaders would need to take care not to overreach.

"Key Democrats are acutely aware that when they got the White House in 1993, they went on a left-wing binge (with) Hillary's health care and … scared the devil out of the American people and caused them to lose their congressional majority" two years later, says former congressman Dick Armey, who became House majority leader when Republicans took over.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., in line to be the first female speaker if her party prevails, has outlined a plan for a Democratic-led House's first 100 hours. She promises Democrats would put in place rules to limit the influence of lobbyists, then enact all the recommendations made by the bipartisan commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks.

The next steps would be to raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, cut the interest rate on student loans in half and lift a ban that has prevented the government from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

She also would face the pent-up demands of partisan Democrats. Michigan Rep. John Conyers, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, has called for impeachment hearings against the president, which Pelosi has ruled out.

Party identification shapes attitudes toward what a Democratic Congress would probably do, the poll shows.

Democrats were twice as likely as Republicans to say a new Congress would implement the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. They also were more likely to say a Democratic Congress would provide health care to all who lack it.

Republicans surveyed were twice as likely as Democrats to predict the new Congress would cut back on anti-terrorism efforts, raise taxes and take steps to make same-sex marriage legal.

Candidates Matter Some Places, But Not Everywhere (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 26, 2006

Two factors have come together to enhance Democratic prospects for a major House sweep — and neither one has much to do with the quality of Democratic recruiting in the two dozen or so top-tier Democratic House opportunities.

First, a handful of Republican House nominees with considerable political baggage have created competitive races for Democrats in places they couldn't have anticipated. And second, even relatively weak second- and third-tier Democratic candidates are in competitive races because of the developing political wave.

If the GOP loses seats in places such as Idaho's 1st district, Colorado's 5th and Michigan's 7th, you are going to hear plenty of complaining by moderate and establishment Republicans about the Club for Growth.

The club, which supports anti-tax conservatives, helped Bill Sali win the Republican nomination in Idaho, Doug Lamborn win in Colorado and Tim Walberg topple incumbent Rep. Joe Schwarz (R) in Michigan — each in a district that should not be competitive in a normal general election. But 2006 isn't a normal year, and while all three GOP nominees could well win in November, the contests aren't slam dunks.

Sali, who seems to take pride in not being a team player, may well lose some Republican votes to attorney Larry Grant (D). Colorado conservative Lamborn hasn't been endorsed by outgoing Rep. Joel Hefley (R), who believes that the Republican nominee ran such an unseemly primary campaign that he isn't backing Lamborn over Democrat Jay Fawcett. And in Michigan, Walberg angered some Republicans when he ran against a sitting Congressman, though he certainly should be able to beat Sharon Renier, a fourth-tier Democrat who had raised less than $40,000 through Oct. 18.

Elsewhere, at least a couple of other Republicans who also should be headed for certain victory are suffering from self-inflicted wounds or serious political baggage.

In Florida's 13th district, Vern Buchanan, who made some enemies as a businessman and during the GOP Congressional primary, has yet to unify his party. And in Wyoming, the state's at-large Representative, Barbara Cubin, has done what she can to turn a laugher into a serious contest.

The "bigger candidate" problem for Republicans is that this cycle, candidate quality doesn't mean what it did in the past.

By traditional measures, Republicans have a long list of well-qualified, well-prepared Congressional candidates, many of them incumbents. Unfortunately for them, many voters don't seem to care much about credentials this year. They just want to send a message, and they don't care about the messenger as long as he or she has a "D" behind his or her name.

In 2002 and 2004, voters were concerned about terrorism and homeland security, and they seemed inclined to prefer political hopefuls with experience and proven accomplishments. Why take a chance on an amateur who had to make important decisions about the economy and the nation's security?

This year, many of the Democrats making a serious run at Republican incumbents and open seats never have held elective office and have no experience in a legislative body. By many measures, they are relatively weak.

Perhaps the starkest contrast in credentials can be seen in three GOP open seats in the Midwest — in Minnesota's 6th, Illinois' 6th and Wisconsin's 8th, where the three GOP nominees, Michele Bachmann, Peter Roskam and John Gard, are state legislators, while the Democrats in the three contests, Patty Wetterling, Tammy Duckworth and Steve Kagen, never have held elective office.

But that's just the tip of the iceberg. In California's 4th, Charlie Brown (D) is a 26-year veteran of the Air Force who served on the professional staff of the Roseville Police Department. His "elective" experience, according to his Web site, is limited to service chairing the "Supervisory Committee" of a credit union.

In California's 11th district, Democrat Jerry McNerney has been an engineer and energy consultant and is now CEO of a start-up company that manufactures wind turbines. In Washington's 8th district, Democratic nominee Darcy Burner was a former manager at Microsoft.

Heath Shuler (D) in North Carolina's 11th is a former football player and a real estate agent. Democrat Joe Donnelly, in Indiana's 2nd district, is an attorney and businessman who lost bids for the state Senate and for Congress; he never has held elective office. The same goes for businessman Jack Davis, the Democrat who's taking on GOP Rep. Tom Reynolds in New York's 26th district.

And I'm not done yet. Democrats Ellen Simon (Arizona's 1st), Charlie Stuart (Florida's 8th), Christine Jennings (Florida's 13th), Tim Walz (Minnesota's 1st), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Lois Murphy (Pennsylvania's 6th), Joe Sestak (Pennsylvania's 7th), Patrick Murphy (Pennsylvania's 8th) and Chris Carney (Pennsylvania's 10th) also never have held elective office. There are others, but you get the drift.

I'm certainly not suggesting that all of these Democrats lack qualifications to be in Congress. Many current Members held no previous elective office, and a background in politics or government doesn't guarantee success in Congress. Obviously, businessmen, lawyers and community activists can be — and have been — successful in legislative bodies.

But it is remarkable how similar this group of Democratic candidates is to the GOP class of 1994, when, by my count, 37 freshmen were elected without having held a previous elective office.

Some of those Republicans, including now-Sens. John Ensign (Nev.) and Richard Burr (N.C.), Rep. Sue Kelly (N.Y.) and former Rep. George Nethercutt (Wash.), developed into respected, successful legislators. But others, including former Reps. Wes Cooley (Ore.), Enid Greene Waldholtz (Utah) and Steve Stockman (Texas), were disasters.

Every cycle is different. Often, voters are looking for candidates with legislative experience and who are Washington, D.C., savvy. This year, those assets appear to be liabilities. And that's another reason why Republicans are finding the going tougher than expected in House races.

Democratic House Leader Under GOP Attack (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Republicans have found a strange new weapon as they fight to maintain control of Congress: Nancy Pelosi.

Mrs Pelosi, Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, is poised to become Speaker of the House – third in line for the presidency and the first woman to hold that post – if her party takes the majority in the midterm elections on November 7.

In the waning days of the campaign, Republicans have stepped up their attention to her, calling her a San Francisco liberal and warning about the wrong-headed policies of a "Perilous Pelosi Majority".

They have hammered away at what they say is her weak stance on security, highlighting comments she made last month that capturing Osama bin Laden would be "five years too late . . . even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer".

Dick Cheney, the vice-president, told an interviewer that Mrs Pelosi "is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people", and represents "that side of the Democratic party that has not been supportive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror".

Deborah Pryce, a Republican from Ohio embroiled in a tough re-election campaign, declared that a Democratic majority under Mrs Pelosi would "take us back to the failed economic policies of the past, including massive tax increases and wasteful government spending". A television advertisement for a Republican in Georgia declares that she will "reward illegal aliens with welfare, food-stamps, and free education".

Whether the Republican strategy will be effective is hard to gauge. A Newsweek poll this week found that 25 per cent had a favourable view of her and 26 per cent unfavourable. But another 26 per cent said they had never heard of her and 23 per cent were unsure.

Mrs Pelosi's office brushed aside the recent attacks. "Republicans' scare tactics and distortions are a sign of their desperation to keep their power," a spokeswoman said.

Elected to Congress in 1987, Ms Pelosi is the scion of a political family. Her father was a member of Congress and mayor of Baltimore, Maryland – a position also held by one of her brothers.

She has won high marks for keeping Democrats in line and is a frequent, and often harsh, critic of her Republican colleagues and the Bush White House. When reminded in a CBS interview this week that she had called Republicans "im-moral" and "corrupt", she replied: "Well, actually, when I called them those names, I was being gentle. There are much worse things I could've said about them." Despite that, she has vowed to return civility to the House, pledging to allow the minority party to offer amendments and participate in debates in ways that Republicans have not.

In the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority, she has vowed to rewrite House lobbying rules, increase the minimum wage, reduce interest rates on student loans, adopt the homeland security recommendations made by the bipartisan 9/11 Commission and give the government the power to negotiate with drugs companies for lower prices for the Medicare prescription drug programme.

And, despite pressure from some liberal activists, she has also ruled out the impeachment of President George W. Bush over Iraq. "Making them lame ducks is good enough for me."

Stakes Are High For Business Community In Nov. Elections (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — If Democrats pick up the 15 seats they need to gain a House majority on Nov. 7, liberal Charles Rangel of New York, an outspoken critic of President Bush's sweeping tax cuts, will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee, overseeing taxes, trade and Social Security.

So it's no surprise that Republicans from Bush on down warn that a Democratic victory would spell higher taxes and slower growth. A six-seat swing in the Senate would give Democrats a majority there.

"The last time they (Democrats) had control of Congress, in 1993, they passed a massive tax increase. They'll do it again if they can," Vice President Cheney told a recent fundraiser for Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., criticizing Rangel by name.

While the war in Iraq, congressional page and influence-peddling scandals and parochial concerns have been top issues this campaign season, the election could have big implications for the business agenda — taxes, trade, regulation and spending — which has been set in recent years by a GOP White House and Congress.

Republicans, lagging in some key House and Senate races, are making the case that a Democratic victory would endanger economic gains. Voters don't seem to agree; USA TODAY/Gallup and other surveys show Americans by a wide margin trust Democrats more to manage the economy.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, says a return to divided government could improve the outlook by forcing the White House and Congress to compromise on such issues as immigration and reducing budget deficits. David Rosenberg of Merrill Lynch, however, advises his clients that "protectionist, pro-labor populist policies favoring the proletariat at the expense of the capitalist" are in store if Democrats win.

Rangel calls the White House rhetoric overblown, saying he has no plans to retroactively alter the Bush tax cuts and wants cooperation, not confrontation. A first move as chairman, he says, would be to seek a meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and others to find common ground.

"The biggest mountain that I have to climb is getting credibility, getting something done in a bipartisan way," Rangel says, adding that "The atmosphere of cooperation to a large degree is going to be created by the president or not created by the president."

While trying not to be overconfident, House and Senate Democrats have laid out an agenda for their possible first days in power that includes: no congressional pay increases until the minimum wage is raised; ending some tax breaks for oil and gas firms; reopening the Medicare prescription drug law to negotiate lower prices with manufacturers; and offering college tuition tax breaks.

That differs from Bush's top priorities, which include extending individual and business tax cuts that expire in 2010 and pushing ahead on new trade deals. Bush has also said he would like to try again to create private accounts under Social Security.

"We have been able to do great things with our economy, despite some of the worst obstacles that we have ever faced," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview outlining the stakes of the election. "We need to recognize that and not change strategies … a change of strategy at this point would be a tax increase."

A Democratic victory in the Senate would give Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts the chairmanship of the Education and Labor Committee; Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance panel; and Chris Dodd of Connecticut could helm the Banking panel.

Respondents to an Oct. 6-8 USA TODAY/Gallup poll gave Democrats a 54% to 36% edge when asked which party could better handle the economy, and high marks on issues such as energy and health care. "Everything is going up but the wages," says Ellen Morel of Florida, a poll respondent who is supporting Democrats.

Still, some voters worry Democrats might not be up to the task, and Democrats acknowledge the numbers could erode before election day. An Oct. 20-22 USA TODAY/Gallup poll found 86% of voters would approve of Democratic efforts to raise the minimum wage, but only 23% would back an income tax increase. More than 60% expect Democrats to boost taxes.

"The first thing they (Democrats) will want to do is raise taxes," says Richard Bothwell of Longview, Texas, an independent. "I'm not saying Republicans have done a great job. … They've spent more, obviously. But you've got to consider they're fighting a war."

Michael Donohue of the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents small firms, predicts the most likely outcome of any regime change would be stalemate, as a lame-duck GOP president fights a more assertive Democratic party. Until July, when he vetoed legislation to expand federally supported stem cell research, Bush had never vetoed a bill.

To date, 69% of pharmaceutical and health care donations and 83% of oil and gas funds have gone to the GOP this election cycle, according to the non-profit Center for Responsive Politics. Insurance and banking interests are heavily supporting the GOP.

But Democrats, running about even with the GOP in the technology and securities industries, and ahead in the entertainment sector, say firms are hedging their bets.

"As the potential chairman of the Financial Services Committee, I have picked up a lot of new friends without being any nicer," says Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "It started in the spring, but it's picked up. It's better than a Dale Carnegie course."

Democratic gains could reshape the agenda on a host of issues

Minimum wage

Senate Democrats, with a core group of Republicans, this year mustered more than a 50-vote majority for an up-or-down vote on raising the minimum wage, which has been $5.15 an hour since 1997. Still, they were shy of the 60 votes needed to limit debate and allow passage.

This fall, pressured from their own ranks, Republicans offered an alternative plan pairing a minimum wage increase to $7.25 an hour with a bill to eliminate estate taxes on estates of up to $5 million or $10 million for married couples and to liberalize taxes on larger estates. Most House Democrats opposed the bill, which died in the Senate, calling the tax provisions a poison pill.

"We would expect we'd present a vote to increase the minimum wage very early in the session. That's not a mystery to anybody," says Rep. George Miller, a California Democrat in line to become chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce. "There are constraints, but we think there are huge opportunities … to get rid of some of the toxic poison in the system and reach across the aisle."

Current committee chairman Rep. Buck McKeon, R-Calif., says if his party retains power, future legislation would probably look like the previous minimum wage/estate tax package.

"We did vote to raise the minimum wage. … The feeling was that they (Democrats) would rather have the issue than to do the things that they talk about," McKeon says.

McKeon says Democratic colleagues pulled him aside before the House adjourned this fall, seeking favors for next year on the assumption they would continue in the minority. "Nothing is going to change," he says.

Trade

House Republicans last year extended the voting on the U.S.-Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) long after the standard 15 minutes had expired, twisting arms until they picked up enough GOP votes to eke out a 217-215 victory. Just 15 Democrats voted "yes" for the deal, which was opposed by labor unions.

Several trade votes are pending, including legislation to extend the administration's special authority to negotiate trade deals, as well as pacts with Peru, Malaysia and South Korea. Talks on a global trade deal are continuing.

"The trade environment is a difficult one, anyway," says Bill Miller of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Certainly, Republicans were the bulk of the votes in the House and the Senate to move the CAFTA bill."

Miller worries the election could result in punitive actions toward China, which has a huge trade surplus with the USA. Democrats and several Republicans want China to move faster on changing its currency policies. Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who would become chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is one of those seeking action against China and other nations he accuses of manipulating their currencies.

Rangel says he's willing to work with the White House and Republicans on trade initiatives, but acknowledges it could be tough to bring Democrats along, given partisan tensions of recent years.

"Most of the new members on the committee, Democrats and Republicans, have never worked together," Rangel says.

Budget and taxes

Since the 2000 election, Bush has won a broad array of business and personal tax cuts. His victories on the economic front also include legislation to overhaul the private pension system, trade deals, an overhaul of bankruptcy laws and reduced business regulation. The White House says those policies have led to low unemployment, steady expansion and record corporate profits.

Democrats paint a less rosy picture, pointing out that inflation-adjusted wages have been stagnant, while long-term unemployment remains high. The federal budget has moved from a $236 billion surplus in fiscal 2000 to years of consecutive deficits, including a $250 billion shortfall in 2006. The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office has projected that the 2007 deficit will be $286 billion.

Democrats have vowed to return to budget rules requiring new tax cuts or spending programs to be offset elsewhere in the budget. Rangel says he has no plans to go after the Bush tax cuts but warns that initiatives such as tax reform or eliminating the alternative minimum tax (which was designed to ensure the wealthy did not evade taxes, but is ensnaring middle-class taxpayers) have to be paid for.

"We did raise taxes on the wealthy (in the 1990s). … What happened as a result was the best economy in U.S. history. Democrats will not renew some of the tax cuts. … In some cases, we will provide more relief," says Frank, in line to chair the Financial Services Committee, which oversees banking.

Republicans say letting current tax cuts expire amounts to a tax increase.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, in a recent memo to Republicans, called the Democratic position on taxes the party's "biggest vulnerability" and said Republicans should "relentlessly hammer" at the issue.

"We must remind every American about the Democrats' tax hike agenda and its destructive consequences for our economy," Boehner said in the Oct. 16 memo.

Democrats could find it tough to live within their promised budget rules and fulfill their promises to increase funding for education, a technology initiative, select tax breaks and other proposals.

Other issues

Aside from the top priorities, Frank wants to get the government back into building affordable housing, based on a private/public model.

He would bring in Federal Reserve and World Bank officials for hearings on income inequality.

Other initiatives include energy legislation focused on conservation and alternative fuels, increased oversight of the Food and Drug Administration and Federal Communications Commission, and legislation to increase data privacy and mortgage lending.

Pharmaceutical companies are warning that Democratic plans to allow the government to negotiate prices under the Medicare drug plan would hurt the program.

"Price controls have never succeeded in keeping down costs or expanding access to needed medicines," the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association of America said this week.

Bush Calls Nov. 7 Referendum On Iraq, Taxes (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

DOJ_NMG_0086836

President Bush yesterday staked the Republican agenda for the final two years of his administration to tax cuts and Iraq, saying next month's election is a referendum on both, and chided Democrats for "dancing in the end zone" to celebrate victory prematurely.

"The two issues I see in the campaign can be boiled down to who best to protect this country and who best to keep taxes low. That's what the referendum's about," Mr. Bush said at a morning press conference at the White House.

He said he also will push the unfinished business of his second term -- reforming Social Security, overhauling the tax code and pushing for a broad immigration bill -- and is "more likely to achieve those three objectives with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate."

For a president who in 2003 famously said he doesn't read newspapers, Mr. Bush appears to have closely followed news reports this year and seemed amused at the amount of attention being paid to Democratic leaders who would hold top positions if power changed hands.

"We got some people dancing in the end zone here in Washington, D.C. They got them measuring their drapes," he said. "They're going over to the Capitol and saying, well, 'My new office looks beautiful. I think I'm going to have this size drape there or this color.' "

That was an apparent reference to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become the next speaker of the House, and who joked to the Associated Press recently that she could then have any office suite she wanted. Mr. Bush also seemed to take aim at Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, who recently earned a cover story in Time magazine titled "Why Barack Obama could be the next president."

"Magazines have got all kinds of new stars emerging when they haven't even won the votes yet," Mr. Bush said.

Mrs. Pelosi's office said Democrats are not overconfident.

"There's not a tape measure in sight," said spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. "We're not taking anything for granted."

She said this year's election for Democrats is a referendum on Iraq and the economy, but also on Mr. Bush's push to reform Social Security and on a broader quest for change at the top levels of government.

Democrats also tried to turned the tax attack back on Republicans, arguing that by leaving town without extending the college-tuition tax credit or sales-tax deductions the majority party has also fostered a tax increase.

Republicans had insisted on coupling those tax cuts with a broader package that included permanent elimination of the estate tax -- something Democrats refused to do.

Mr. Bush did little to dispel reports that he and his top advisers are confident about next month's outcome.

"We're organized," he said. "We've got a fantastic grass-roots organization to turn out the vote."

The president also said he does not resent those Republicans who are running by criticizing his Iraq policy, "nor am I resentful that a lot of Democrats are using my picture. All I ask is that they pick out a good one."

Wall Street Handicaps Stocks, Sectors As Voting Nears (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 26, 2006

NEW YORK — Democrats aren't big fans of Wal-Mart. Nor are they fond of Halliburton, due to the energy firm's activities in Iraq and ties to Vice President Cheney. Democrats aren't chummy with tobacco companies such as Altria, either.

That's why those companies' stocks might be hurt if Democrats sweep the upcoming midterm elections and seize control of the Senate and House of Representatives from Republicans, say UBS analysts in a report.

In every national election, there are winners and losers on Capitol Hill and Wall Street. The Nov. 7 congressional election is no exception. Wall Street analysts have been handicapping which stocks and industry sectors will go up and which will go down, depending on the outcome of the vote.

Ironically, even the scenario that will result in the biggest change — a Democratic sweep — is unlikely to result in the type of major policy changes that could seriously rattle financial markets, says Thomas Doerflinger, strategist at UBS.

The reason: If Democrats win, they will likely hold slim majorities and will avoid appearing too liberal to improve their chances of winning the presidential election in 2008, he adds.

What's more, “Faced with a Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush would utilize his veto pen a little more readily,” says Jerry Webman, chief economist at Oppenheimer Funds.

The likely result would be legislative “gridlock,” which historically has been bullish for stocks, notes Mark Riepe of the Schwab Center for Investment Research. His analysis of election years dating to 1953 shows that the average return of the Standard & Poor's 500 index was 14.1% per year in gridlock years, vs. a 10.4% gain when one party controlled the presidency and both chambers of Congress.

However, Riepe argues that elections have less impact on the stock market than people think. Politicians, he says, have little control over the key drivers of asset prices, such as interest rate policy, geopolitics and health of the economy.

Perhaps the biggest influence on stocks if Democrats win both chambers is the expected change in "tone" on Capitol Hill, UBS says. With Democrats likely to take control of influential committees, they will be able to shape the tenor of the political debate.

In a recent report, UBS said Democrats would likely exert pressure on Republicans by holding high-profile hearings on controversial topics, such as "global warming, Halliburton's activities in Iraq, Wal-Mart's employment practices and allegedly excessive pharmaceutical prices."

If "government by subpoena" occurs, it would create "headline risk" for a number of key industries and companies, says Jason Cole, federal affairs manager at UBS.

If the Democrats take over Congress, energy and health care stocks could be losers, given the possibility of new legislation to tax energy firms' "excess profits," and imposing "price controls" on health care, noted Schwab's director of sector analysis Brad Sorensen in a report titled "Do Elections Matter for the Market?"

On the flip side, if Republicans retain control of Congress, it boosts the chances that tax cuts set to expire in 2010 will be extended. That would be a plus for energy, technology, telecom and industrial companies, because it would make it easier for them to plan for the future, says Sorensen.

Another possible outcome is a split decision, with the Democrats taking the House but the Republicans hanging on to the Senate, says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America.

A wild card to how the U.S. market reacts once the polls close are foreign investors, Quinlan stresses.

A Democratic win, he says, could "unnerve foreign investors," who would likely view the results as a sign of growing U.S. protectionism and less support for globalization.

"None of this is supportive of the U.S. dollar and … U.S. securities," adds Quinlan. "Foreigners vote with their wallets. Given their hefty ownership of U.S. stocks and bonds," their vote counts.

Why Democrats Are Losing The Culture War (USAT)

By Amy Sullivan

USA Today, October 26, 2006

On the surface, solid majorities of Americans agree with Democratic Party values. They want universal health care, support increasing the minimum wage, believe stricter environmental regulations are needed and worth paying for, and think the best way to achieve peace is through diplomacy.

By contrast, only 12% say abortion and gay marriage are more important issues than poverty and universal health care, according to a recent survey by the Center for American Values in Public Life, a project funded by the liberal group People For the American Way. And a paltry 5% of Americans identified abortion and gay marriage as their top issues.

Based on these numbers, Democrats should be beating Republicans at the ballot box. But precisely the opposite has happened in the past few national elections.

One answer is that national security is still a major issue, generally favoring Republicans. But more important is the fact that abortion and gay marriage are proxies for deeply held cultural concerns. They tell voters something about the character of a candidate — or a party.

Most voters worry about escalating challenges to family stability and the losing battle to instill good values in their children instead of the materialism and coarseness peddled by popular culture. They fear that our society has developed a casualness about life, especially as science has made it easier to manipulate and create beings.

Banning gay marriage and outlawing abortion don't directly address those anxieties. But proposals like these at least acknowledge that the concerns exist and are valid. So while Republicans offer the wrong prescriptions, they get the diagnosis right. And they win because most of the time, Democrats won't admit that anything is wrong. In politics, as in most areas of life, something always beats nothing.

Despite the uproar over Janet Jackson's wardrobe malfunction a couple of years ago, most parents don't fret that the accidental sighting of a breast or hearing of a swear word will scar their children. They're more concerned about the unrealistic ideas kids get from popular culture about consumption and body image and violence as a way of handling conflict.

Sadly, too many liberals react to complaints about popular culture as if they're teenagers. They either jut out their chins and growl, "If you don't like it, don't watch it," or they stay silent for fear of looking like prudes. Given the ridicule that Tipper Gore faced for promoting warning labels for explicit music lyrics and the derision that followed Hillary Clinton's effort to keep violent video games away from kids, perhaps it's no surprise that most keep their mouths shut. That silence, however, hands conservatives a victory. As David Callahan points out in his book The Moral Center, "When the right complains about the media's descent into tawdriness, it puts them on the side of most Americans."

Even an issue on which Democrats seem to have the winning position can turn out to be a loser for the party in the long run. Most Americans now believe that research on stem cells should be allowed. But as Noam Scheiber recently pointed out in The New Republic magazine, the polls also suggest that they have serious concerns about the morality of unrestricted scientific research. They don't want to wake up tomorrow and discover that we're cloning humans without ever having a conversation as a society about the moral issues involved. By framing the debate as a choice between theology or science, Democrats essentially argued that anyone who has qualms about scientific progress is a troglodyte. That puts them on the losing side of the moral question, even as they win the specific policy debate.

There's promising evidence, though, that this moral tone-deafness of Democrats may be about to change. Abortion, perhaps the most contentious moral issue of them all, is also the one area in which Democrats are poised to move past the political debate and address the real concerns of Americans. Over the past two years, a growing number of Democrats in the House and Senate have gotten behind "abortion reduction" efforts that seek to prevent unwanted pregnancies and provide support to women who want to carry their pregnancies to term.

This new approach reduces abortions without putting women in jeopardy or jail. The average American doesn't want to overturn Roe v. Wade or start locking up doctors. But neither does she buy the liberal line that 1.3 million abortions per year are just the price you pay for living in a free and modern society.

Democrats are right when they argue that their party's position on issues such as poverty, health care and job creation reflect a powerful moral value — helping those who have less. But they're wrong to think that's enough to win back the cultural voters they've lost.

Abortion and gay marriage — and the deep-seated cultural anxieties they represent — are threshold issues for voters. If a candidate can show he understands voters' concerns about the culture, then they'll listen to what else he has to say. If he tells them instead that there's nothing to worry about and tries to change the subject, they've already tuned out.

The good news for Democrats is that if the party can just get past the threshold, it stands a much better chance of connecting with voters who already agree with them on the pressing issues that should decide elections.

Democrats Eyeing Upstate Races In Their Effort To Retake Congress (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

AUBURN, N.Y., Oct. 25 — Once pessimistic about making gains in the Republican bastion of upstate New York, Democrats have now made the region a focal point in their campaign to retake Congress, pouring money and troops into several districts where they believe the Republican incumbents are vulnerable.

With less than two weeks to go before the midterm election, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is financing hard-hitting advertisements in three districts that criticize the Republicans for ethical lapses, supporting the war in Iraq and advancing President Bush's agenda. It has spent $2 million in races in the state so far.

There are also extensive get-out-the-vote campaigns being organized in at least four Republican-held districts, with Democratic challengers receiving heavy support from national and state party operatives, as well as legions of volunteers and workers from unions, third parties and liberal advocacy groups like MoveOn.org.

And former President Bill Clinton, who has campaigned relentlessly for Democratic candidates locked in tight races elsewhere in the country, is scheduled to swing through New York on Thursday, when he will headline airport rallies for three Democratic candidates from Albany to Syracuse.

Republican congressmen in the upstate region have long benefited from being in districts that have been drawn to tilt in their favor. But in recent weeks, several Republicans — including Rep. Thomas Reynolds from Erie County, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House of Representatives — have found themselves on the defensive largely because of Mr. Bush's continued unpopularity, grim reports out of Iraq and the disclosure of sexually explicit e-mail messages between a Republican lawmaker and young male Congressional pages.

More than that, even some Republicans privately acknowledge that the overwhelming leads held by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton may dampen spirits among Republican voters and boost Democratic turnout across the state.

But while many Republicans say that they are worried about the political climate, they assert that the contests will be decided on local issues as well as on the personalities and reputation of the candidates.

The situation in New York appears to reflect a shift in the playing field that is occurring nationally as more once-safe Republican Congressional seats seem to be coming into play. The Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control of the House. The new push upstate reflects a shift of expectations by the Democrats. As the fall campaign season opened six weeks ago, the Democrats had all but given up hope of scoring major gains in New York after having predicted in the spring that they could pick up as many as five seats there.

Now, with evidence of Democratic strength reflected in fund-raising and in internal polls, Democratic leaders in Washington say they see an opportunity to provide additional momentum to candidates in New York who had once been considered long shots.

"The national climate is seen more clearly in a state like New York where opportunities have increased as voters have made it more and more clear that they're sick of the status quo in Washington," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Kevin Madden, a Republican strategist in Washington who was involved in New York politics for years, dismissed Democratic efforts in New York as little more than a political ruse intended to create the impression that there are more seats in play than there are. He predicted that this strategy would backfire.

"It's not a particularly wise head-fake because Democrats will end up wasting resources in New York that they could have spent in competitive races in Pennsylvania and Ohio," he said. "Fundamentally, these races in New York are contests between individuals."

Democrats feel that their best opportunity for taking a Republican seat is the race for New York's 24th Congressional District, which cuts a U-shaped swath through central New York south of Syracuse. The race pits State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican, against the Democrat, Michael A. Arcuri, the Oneida County district attorney, in a battle to succeed Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert, a moderate Republican who is retiring after 24 years in the House.

The contest is so fierce that the Democratic and Republican Congressional re-election committees have spent more than $2.4 million on advertising here. That is on top of the nearly $1.5 million that the Arcuri and Meier campaigns reported spending in their latest financial disclosure statements, at the end of September.

Another Republican incumbent who is high on the Democrats' list of targets is Mr. Reynolds, who is trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in recent polls after facing questions about whether he responded vigorously enough after learning about e-mail exchanges between Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, and a young Congressional page.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee recently began running an advertisement that, while never mentioning the scandal directly, accuses Mr. Reynolds of "bad judgment" for his refusal to vote for bonus pay for troops while voting to increase his own pay in Congress. Republican strategists to the Reynolds campaign said the advertisement is false and meant to deflect attention from the weakness of the Democrats' own candidate in the race.

In three other New York races, Democrats say that their chances are less certain, but still believe they are within striking range if there is a powerful Democratic tide on Election Day.

The Republican incumbents who are targets in these races are John Randy Kuhl Jr., who faces a challenge from Eric Massa in the 29th Congressional District in the Southern Tier region of the state; James T. Walsh who is battling Dan Maffei in the 25th District in the Syracuse region; and John E. Sweeney who is in a race against Kirsten Gillibrand in the 20th District outside Albany.

Though the 24th has roughly 40,000 more registered Republicans than Democrats, experts say the race is a tossup. Mr. Arcuri, attempting to tap voter dismay with the direction of the country, wants to present himself as a "Boehlert moderate" on issues like the environment and someone who opposes many of the policies of President Bush and his conservative allies on Capitol Hill.

"He is extremely conservative," Mr. Arcuri said of Mr. Meier in a recent interview.

Mr. Meier is running as a results-oriented politician with a long record of delivering state aid for the district, a strategy on display the other day when he was honored at a senior citizen center in Kirkland for $50,000 he secured in Albany for the center.

In an interview afterward, Mr. Meier acknowledged that it is a tough climate for Republicans, particularly given Mr. Bush's sagging approval ratings. But he argued that voters would ultimately judge him on his record. "People still view this as a local race," he said. "It's a choice between me and my opponent and not a referendum on anything else."

As for the renewed optimism Democrats have about their prospect in New York, perhaps the clearest example is the race in the neighboring district pitting Mr. Walsh, a Republican fixture in the Syracuse region, and Mr. Maffei, a former aide to Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan who is making his first run for public office.

Only a few weeks ago, Mr. Maffei was openly critical of party leaders in Washington for not investing enough money in his race. Now, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, closely eyeing his district, says it is set to spend tens of thousands of dollars on the race, and major party figures, including Mr. Spitzer and both Clintons, have been rushing to campaign with him.

Mike Whyland, a spokesman for Mr. Maffei, said he welcomed the support from Washington, though he added it would have been helpful if it had come earlier. “Why is the D.C.C.C. getting involved now?” he said. “They might have internal polling that shows what we already know — that this race is tight and getting tighter.”

Liberalism's Limits In Kentucky (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

FLORENCE, Ky. -- Democratic candidate Ken Lucas looked like he would rather be any place other than Kentucky's public television studios Monday night as he debated freshman Republican Rep. Geoff Davis. A moderate conservative, Lucas was not going deep into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) liberal playbook that is intended to nationalize midterm congressional elections.

Lucas had been coaxed out of political retirement at age 73 to run for the northern Kentucky congressional seat he held for three terms. That put Davis, a conservative 25 years Lucas's junior and highly regarded among House Republicans, on the endangered list, trailing in early polls. But Lucas showed Monday night that this has not been a happy campaign for him. While Democratic candidates nationwide pillory George W. Bush, Lucas did not mention the president's name and appeared uncomfortable with the DCCC attack litany.

Democrats must win seats such as this one to achieve a substantial working majority in the House. But Republicans have limited the election in Kentucky's 4th Congressional District to a "choice" between two candidates instead of a "referendum" on an unpopular Republican president and Congress. That demonstrates that the struggle for Congress is not really a national election but is about 50 hotly contested local ones.

Registered Democrats are still a majority in the 4th District, thanks to rural areas where voters maintain their ancestral political faith. But Cincinnati's burgeoning Kentucky suburbs are Catholic, Republican and conservative. They elected Republican Jim Bunning to six terms before he went to the Senate in 1998. Lucas, a popular local official, replaced him as one of the more conservative Democrats in the House -- with a 71 percent lifetime American Conservative Union (ACU) rating.

Lucas survived a surprisingly close call in 2002 against an underfunded Davis. Raised in Pittsburgh, Davis came to Kentucky in 1989 following graduation from West Point and 10 years as an Army officer. Lucas kept his pledge to leave after three terms, and Davis won in 2004 against radio personality Nick Clooney (father of actor George Clooney).

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the celebrated DCCC chairman, scored a recruiting coup the next year by getting Lucas to run. Returning the 4th District to Democratic hands was part of a national grand design. The problem was fitting Lucas's square conservative peg into the liberal hole of the DCCC game plan.

Lucas tried in Monday night's debate. He taunted Davis for voting the Republican line 96 percent of the time as "a pawn of your party" and attacked "a culture of corruption" (while never mentioning the Mark Foley scandal). Lucas missed the party line on Iraq, asserting: "We must win the war in Iraq. We have no other choice." Commenting on North Korea's dictator Kim Jong Il, Lucas said: "He seems to be very popular with his people."

Lucas in the debate twice derisively called attention to the use of big words by Davis. Indeed, Davis is a policy wonk, considered by colleagues on the conservative Republican Study Committee to be one of the best-informed members of Congress. As for being a pawn, Davis noted his opposition to President Bush's Social Security reform. But the ACU rated him at 88 percent, and he is a social conservative. Asked his views on abortion by a student at Pendleton County High School the day after the debate, Davis replied: "I'm 100 percent pro-life."

But Davis spends more time dispensing pork than preaching the conservative gospel. Traveling through nominally Democratic rural areas Tuesday, Davis stopped in Berry (population 310) for presentation of a $209,891 check from the federal government to establish broadband access there. The little town is 83 percent Democratic, but Davis figures to carry it. Gary Taylor, a local bank officer, told me he is a registered Democrat but is voting for Davis "because he has helped us, and we haven't heard from Ken Lucas."

With Kentucky returns coming early election night, the reports from the 4th District will be a harbinger. A victory by Lucas probably would be part of a Democratic wave and a Republican disaster. A win by Davis would entrench a Republican conservative in Congress far into the future. It would also mark the limits of nationalizing congressional elections.

A Hard Year To Be An Ohio Republican (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

One of an occasional series

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- Any other year, Rep. Deborah Pryce would have wrapped up her race for re-election months ago.

The fourth-ranking House Republican and self-proclaimed "moderate," Mrs. Pryce has cruised to victory in Ohio's 15th Congressional District the past six times with at least 60 percent of the vote, in a dead-heat district where President Bush and Sen. John Kerry just about split the vote in 2004.

But this year, with Mr. Bush sliding into disastrous levels in the polls and Republicans in Ohio imploding amid corruption charges and unpopular policies, she is struggling against a boilerplate Democratic candidate whose attacks are similar to those being used across the nation by Democratic challengers.

"This is a referendum on the policies of this current administration," says that candidate -- Mary Jo Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner from the left wing of the Democratic Party.

Defining moment

The battle for control of the U.S. House runs right through the Midwest, with Democrats making a major bid for two or three Republican-held House seats each in Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana. That means the fate of Republicans' House majority should be clear soon after 7:30 p.m. on Nov. 7, the closing time for Ohio's polls, the latest of those three states.

It promises to be a watershed election for Ohio. If Democrats do well, it means this state is the ultimate swing state. But the elections will cement Ohio's Republican credentials if the Democrats fail to capture any of the major prizes.

Every statewide constitutional office here is held by Republicans as are both U.S. Senate seats and 12 of the 18 U.S. House seats. They include national party leaders Mrs. Pryce, the House Republican Conference chairman, and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner. Republicans also have sizable majorities in both state legislative chambers.

This year, though, Democrats expect major victories up and down the Ohio ballot, leading off with Ted Strickland, a Democratic congressman who is on the verge of trouncing Republican Ken Blackwell in the governor's race.

Democrat Sherrod Brown also holds a lead in the U.S. Senate race against incumbent Republican Sen. Mike DeWine -- one of the seven races likely to determine control of the Senate.

Mr. Brown has attacked the Republican for lost jobs in the state and for his support of the Iraq war in Washington. Mr. DeWine argues that the Democrat has little to show for his seven terms in Congress. A Mason-Dixon poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Brown with a lead of eight percentage points.

All politics is local

Unlike other parts of the country, Republicans' problems in Ohio are not primarily the national mood or antipathy toward Mr. Bush, who polls above 40 percent in approval ratings, higher than his national average.

Instead, it is local -- a mixture of a faltering economy, state Republicans who pushed through huge tax increases, a school system that few voters seem pleased with, and Bob Taft, the departing Republican governor, who pleaded no contest last year to violating state ethics laws.

Adding to that, Rep. Bob Ney, a Republican, announced two months ago that he wouldn't seek re-election, forcing Republicans to scramble to fill his slot on the ballot. Then, two weeks ago, Ney pleaded guilty to corruption charges stemming from the investigation into lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"It's a combination of the state and the national mood. We have had our troubles here in Ohio -- our governor's numbers are very low, we've had our own set of scandals, and the same is true in Washington, so you have a fairly soured public and Rahm Emanuel just saw opportunity here," Mrs. Pryce said, referring to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman.

Still, those opportunities are less than they could have been.

Democrats had hoped to capture up to eight House seats here, but that list has been reduced. There are now three solid Democratic opportunities -- Mrs. Pryce's 15th district, Ney's 18th district and the 2nd Congressional District, where first-term Rep. Jean Schmidt won a special election last year.

They also have a longer shot at Rep. Steve Chabot, a Republican from Cincinnati.

Guilt by association

The race for Ney's seat is emblematic of Republican challenges.

The Democratic candidate, Zack Space, is running a clean-government campaign against national and state Republican leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0086842

That worked well when his opponent was Ney, and he is trying to adapt it to new Republican candidate Joy Padgett, accusing her of having ties to corrupt figures.

"From convicted Ohio Governor Bob Taft, to disgraced Congressman Bob Ney, to House Speaker Dennis Hastert now under fire for 'Foleygate' -- or most recently Karl Rove, who has agreed to host a $5,000 per PAC fundraiser in Washington D.C. -- Padgett refuses to break her ties to corruption," Mr. Space said on the day Ney pleaded guilty.

This district is the most reliably Republican in the state, having delivered 57 percent of its vote in 2004 to Mr. Bush, and in any other year, Mrs. Padgett would have a built-in advantage over Mr. Space.

But Mrs. Padgett, a state senator, only started running after winning a special primary election after Ney gave up his bid in August. Her red campaign yard signs -- which repeat her last name three times -- seem to capture her biggest challenge: building up name recognition.

She said she doesn't see voters penalizing her for Mr. Taft or Mr. Bush, but stresses that she has voted against Mr. Taft in the legislature and will be willing to buck Mr. Bush in Congress.

"The president is president, he's got his role. I'm not in his administration. I will be in Congress," she told reporters after accepting the U.S. Chamber of Commerce endorsement two weeks ago.

The bigger issues

As for Ney, it's not clear how much of a drag he will be, especially because the charges play differently on the ground in Ohio than they do among the politicos in Washington.

Dr. John Antalis, an ophthalmologist in Cambridge who usually all but ignores politics, said he would probably have voted for Ney because someone he trusts vouches for Ney.

But Dr. Antalis, watching his son's football practice one afternoon, said he's so angry about the Iraq war that he won't support any Republicans who support Mr. Bush.

"I'm going to vote against Republicans until there's a change in the House, just because of that one issue," he said.

Democrats have several ace cards this year, including a statewide ballot question on raising the minimum wage that will energize key labor voters.

And Democrats here are still energized by the 2004 presidential election results, which many think were tinkered with by Mr. Blackwell, the secretary of state.

Ohio became the pivotal state in those elections, when Democratic candidate Mr. Kerry refused to concede the race on election night because of the slim margin here and rumors of voting irregularities. Democrats' fury settled on Mr. Blackwell, one of the nation's most prominent black Republicans, who they argue worked overtime to complicate voting in 2004.

Getting personal

In Mrs. Pryce's district, though, the race is just a verbal slug-fest of names and labels.

The most recent barb was Mrs. Kilroy's ads, run on Christian radio, accusing Mrs. Pryce of failing to do enough to investigate former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned Sept. 29 amid charges that he had made inappropriate advances to teenagers who had been in the House page program.

Mrs. Pryce, who has called Mr. Foley a friend, said the charges did hurt her somewhat.

"We had a week of distraction. In close campaigns, you never need that. We had polling that showed it was significant," she said, although she said the debate two weeks ago helped to refocus the campaign.

Mrs. Kilroy's most consistent attack has been that Mrs. Pryce is "a right-wing apologist, and she's been serving a right-wing agenda" by supporting national Republicans on the war in Iraq, spending, tax cuts and Social Security reform.

For her part, Mrs. Pryce may be the only candidate anywhere -- Republican or Democrat -- eager to tie herself to Sen. Robert Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat who is reportedly under investigation for corruption.

Mrs. Pryce touted her work with him on health care legislation as an example of how she has bridged partisan divides.

She also puts herself in the camp of Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who lost his party's primary this year and is running as an independent, and tries to turn that back on Mrs. Kilroy.

"Her wing of her party drove him out, threw him out," she said.

The two women clearly don't care much for each other, and the tone of the race is harsh. Mrs. Pryce even felt the need to apologize to her mother when the two met at the Columbus Metropolitan Club debate, which aired on WOSU radio and television.

"My mother's mad at me, but I had no choice," she said, adding that she had to respond in kind after liberal interest groups sponsored attack ads and phone-bank calls.

"As soon as we recover, we'll be back on the positive," she said, prompting Mrs. Kilroy to note that Mrs. Pryce is "going to have negative ads for a long time, then."

In Old Textile District, The Free-Trade Issue Dominates (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

KANNAPOLIS, N.C., Oct. 23 — It has been three years since the old brick textile mill here shut down, throwing 4,800 people out of work. Yet the mill, which once made pillowcases and closed in part because of competition from imports, casts a shadow over the heated race for Congress in this once booming industrial enclave of North Carolina.

As if by chance, though probably not, both candidates are linked to the old mill. Charles Cannon, legendary founder of the Cannon textile empire and grandfather of Representative Robin Hayes, the Republican incumbent, built it in the 1920's, and Mr. Hayes worked summers there as a youth.

Larry Kissell, his Democratic opponent, worked there for 27 years before becoming a high school teacher in 2001, when, he says, he saw "the handwriting on the wall" about its future. Now his campaign is organized around the threat of foreign competition and Mr. Hayes's tiebreaking vote last year for a trade accord with Central America.

"The No. 1 issue voters care about this year is jobs," Mr. Kissell said Monday as he campaigned door to door in a neighborhood near the rubble-strewn field where the Kannapolis mill once stood. "We have lost 10,000 jobs in the textile industry here in the last several years. Free trade has not been good for this district."

By most accounts, Mr. Kissell has an uphill battle in trying to unseat Mr. Hayes, who has withstood challenges on the trade issue in the past. In 2001, he was put on the defensive for casting another tiebreaking vote for a trade measure, after a last-minute reversal accompanied by his weeping on the House floor.

But Mr. Kissell is one of a dozen Democratic candidates for the House, and a few for the Senate, who are making at least some headway in tapping voter anxiety about trade.

In Ohio, Senator Mike DeWine, a Republican in a race against Representative Sherrod Brown, is being hammered for his support of trade bills. In upstate New York, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, faces stiff opposition over the same issue.

If many pro-trade Republicans lose on Election Day, President Bush, who has had trouble winning approval of trade deals in the past, could face even tougher odds.

"If the Democrats do as well as it appears, you're going to see more resistance to trade agreements," said Mickey Kantor, a top trade negotiator under President Bill Clinton, who corralled a hundred or so Democrats for the trade deals of the 1990's.

By contrast, only a handful of Democrats voted for the deals negotiated by Mr. Bush, in an environment of Congressional economic populism that has led to other fights, including widespread criticism of China's economic practices and broad opposition to foreign purchases of American companies.

The antitrade climate has recently persuaded Republicans to avoid putting lawmakers like Mr. Hayes on the spot. In September, they pulled bills opening up trade with Vietnam, Peru and a number of poor countries. There is talk that especially if the Democrats win a majority in either chamber, Republicans may try to pass these bills in a lame-duck session before the new Congress arrives in January.

"At the very least, Democrats are going to demand new requirements on enforcement of labor, environmental and corruption problems with our trading partners," Mr. Kantor said. "I would welcome that."

Trade is not the only issue here in North Carolina's Eighth Congressional District, which spreads across the piedmont in the center of the state and encompasses old and new high-tech industries, farms, the prosperous banking corridors of Charlotte and people who work at Fort Bragg, where support for the Iraq war and for Republicans remains high.

Even some Democrats concede that Mr. Hayes has done well for many of his constituents, especially farmers and the defense industry. He also points with pride to his efforts in getting state and county financing for Castle & Cooke and the Dole Food Company to build a corporate research center on the site of the razed Kannapolis mill.

Further, his record on free trade is not easy to simplify. The Democratic campaign has focused on his last-minute decision to cast the deciding vote for the Central American Free Trade Agreement last year, when he yielded to blandishments from Republican leaders after vowing to vote no. Mr. Kissell says the vote was a "flip-flop" that broke faith with constituents, but Mr. Hayes argues that the late concessions he wrung from the Bush administration changed the nature of what he was voting for.

Among the promises, he says, was one that led to an agreement with China later in the year imposing American quotas on 36 types of textile imports. Another brought a clause in the Central America accord that requires that future clothing imports from Nicaragua include interior lining made in the remaining mills of his home state.

"I got commitments the length and breadth of which I had never seen for my district," Mr. Hayes said. "So it's not a flip-flop. I voted for a whole different piece of legislation than the one that had been discussed up to that point. It was a tremendous leap in the right direction for this district."

The congressman says his views on trade have evolved over the years from one of reflexive opposition to one of accepting some of the reality of global competition.

"When I first went to Congress," said Mr. Hayes, who is now concluding his fourth term, "my outlook was to vote no and stop these trade agreements. Well, obviously that wasn't working. Do you take something that's not working and hope for better results? I don't think so. Or do you slow down free trade and in the meantime bring additional opportunities to the district?"

To demonstrate, Mr. Hayes stumped the farm areas of his district on Monday with Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns to tell voters that the Central America agreement had cleared the way for more soybeans, cotton, hogs and chickens to be exported.

"It's awfully easy to denigrate free trade," Mr. Johanns told a farm group in Monroe, southeast of Kannapolis. "This agreement was very much in favor of the United States farmer."

Though Mr. Kissell's chances may not be great, Democrats say he could pull an upset, given his creative insurgent tactics. He got a lot of publicity, for example, from a stunt selling gasoline at $1.22 a gallon to remind voters of the price when his opponent first took office eight years ago.

And when news reports showed that Mr. Kissell had $88.94 in his campaign account, compared with $1 million for Mr. Hayes, he merrily announced that he was sorry it was not zero. An additional $150,000 quickly came in, along with promises of help from two popular North Carolina Democrats, former Senator John Edwards and former Gov. Jim Hunt.

In interviews, both candidates said national issues like the scandals in Congress and the Iraq war were not foremost in the minds of constituents. Mr. Kissell treads lightly on the war, and also takes a hard-line stance on immigration, opposing legalized status for any illegal immigrants.

Mr. Hayes looks confident, a man who can draw on his family's role here. Traveling across the area in a pickup truck, he loves to point out landmarks: the hometown of the country singer Randy Travis, a friend's agricultural processing plant, a new titanium factory.

"Welcome to Oakboro, where they have the biggest Fourth of July parade in the district," he said as the place whizzed by. "There's Stanly High School, where we just stood up an R.O.T.C. unit the other day."

Asked about the mood of the district, he said with a smile, "Well, they like their congressman."

In the 19th century the piedmont was a place of farming, and in the 20th a place of manufacturing. In the 21st century, he said, it will retool to new industries and businesses.

The campaign against him, he said, is out of a Democratic playbook.

" 'You got to attack Hayes on trade,' " he said. " 'That's the way to get him.' Whoever the candidate is, they latch on to that.

"Meanwhile, we continue doing the same thing. We're here, we talk to them, we listen. They don't necessarily think you'll solve their problems, but they want to know you're interested."

Fed Up With Everybody (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

South Bend, Indiana

In the campaign headquarters of Representative Chris Chocola, a Republican running for re-election in Indiana's bellwether Second Congressional District, there is a large photo of Ronald Reagan on the wall, but no picture of President Bush.

Mr. Bush, once such an asset for Republican candidates, has become a potentially devastating liability for campaigns like Mr. Chocola's.

"He's not as popular as he was," the congressman said in an interview, "but I would say he's still respected."

Mr. Chocola is in big political trouble and he knows that President Bush is much more the cause than the solution. Any mention of the Bush administration tends to turn local Republicans as chilly as the dusting of lake-effect snow that fell over South Bend the other night.

Lucy McKee, a 40-year-old part-time supermarket clerk, told me, "I voted for Bush twice. Now I just want him gone."

Mr. Bush has come into this northern Indiana district to raise money for the Chocola campaign but he has not been asked to appear with the congressman publicly to rally the dispirited troops.

"I don't know that it would help me," said Mr. Chocola. He candidly acknowledged that being seen as aligned with Mr. Bush "is not as much of a positive as it used to be."

With control of the House at stake, the G.O.P. can hardly afford to lose Mr. Chocola's seat. Two years ago he defeated his Democratic opponent, Joe Donnelly, by roughly nine percentage points. Mr. Donnelly is his opponent again this year, and a recent public poll showed him leading Mr. Chocola by about five points. Mr. Chocola said his own internal polls showed the race as a dead heat.

Democrats seem confident they will win control of the House on Nov. 7, and Mr. Chocola is not convinced they are wrong. “If you listen to the news every night,” he said, “it would be hard to say that’s not possible.”

His district, which has been hurt by the downturn in the auto industry, is more of a bellwether than most. “If I win,” said Mr. Chocola, “then I think there is a reasonable chance we will hold the House. If I don’t, I think there’s a reasonable chance we won’t.”

To win, Mr. Chocola and the G.O.P. will have to deal with the unhappiness of voters like Ms. McKee and like Jeri Niazi, a 60-year-old South Bend resident who works as a security monitor at the University of Notre Dame and describes herself as a “lifelong registered Republican.”

“What’s happening now is frightening to me,” she said. “The war. The deficit. The cronyism. I’m the kind of Republican who signed on for balanced budgets, minimal government and letting people go about their lives. I feel like somebody has thrown away that playbook.”

Ms. Niazi said she is pro-business but she “never dreamed” that corporate interests would achieve the kind of overwhelming and corrosive influence on the federal government that they have under President Bush.

“They are cleaning up,” she said, “while people here are having a tough time making ends meet.”

The overwhelming sense I took away from interviews with voters in and around South Bend was a feeling of disillusionment with government. Republicans and Democrats spoke sourly about the Bush administration, but no one expected dramatic changes if the Democrats gained control of one or both houses of Congress. “People say the Democrats are weak, and frankly, I think they are,” said Vernon DeWitt, who recently moved to Mishawaka from St. Louis. “I’m fed up with everybody.”

The big issue here, as in most of the country, is Iraq, which will have claimed close to 3,000 American lives by the end of this year, and which has lasted almost as long as the U.S. involvement in World War II.

“The war creates stress on the electorate,” said Congressman Chocola. “I think it wears people’s patience. They don’t see a clear light at the end of the tunnel. They see every night on the news the bad things going on, and they almost never see any of the good things going on.”

It’s understood that this is a very tough political environment for Republicans. People want change. But the lack of great enthusiasm for the Democrats is an indication that the system itself is not working well, and that would be a problem more serious than even Iraq.

There are only two major parties. Where do troubled voters turn if the country is in a serious fix and neither party is seen as having an adequate solution?

Schumer Upbeat On Democrats' Senate Odds (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, says he is just as surprised as anyone that Democrats have a legitimate shot at taking control of the Senate in the November election.

"Here we are, two weeks from Election Day, in a position we'd never thought we'd be in," the New York Democrat said yesterday during a National Press Club appearance with his Republican counterpart, North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole.

"In 2005, most people were predicting we'd be lucky just to keep our 45 [seats]," Mr. Schumer said. "And now, I'd be disappointed if we just hold."

Mrs. Dole, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, acknowledged the negative draw President Bush's Iraq policy is having on her party's candidates, but she asked what leaving Iraq now would accomplish and questioned the national security credentials of Democrats.

"If Democrats were to take over the Senate, you're going to see a weaker security situation," she said.

Mr. Schumer brushed off the national security criticism, saying Republicans were resorting to name-calling out of desperation.

"The Republican candidates have nowhere to run," he joked. "It's as if they are in a small room where all the exit doors are locked."

Mrs. Dole said her party's weak showing in pre-election polls was the typical byproduct of an incumbent presidency.

"A midterm is always tough," she said. "The incumbent party almost always loses a significant number of seats."

That trend was bucked by Democrats in 1998 and Republicans in 2002.

With Democrats targeting seven Republican incumbents, polling data suggests it is most likely that races in Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri will determine who controls the Senate. Most polls also show the Democrats leading in the Republican-held states of Montana, Ohio, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania.

Nonetheless, Mrs. Dole said that Republicans have a $14 million cash-on-hand fundraising advantage in those states and that Democrats must defend a few seats of their own in Maryland and New Jersey.

"I'm sure they never imagined they would be fighting to retain seats like these," she said. "We'll continue to fight for all of our incumbents."

Since 2002, Republicans have enjoyed a significant advantage in voter turnout, thanks to what party activists call the "72-hour strategy."

"We know that the Republicans have a very good turnout machine," Mr. Schumer said.

He said, however, that in addition to a more favorable political climate, Democrats have been upgrading their turnout plans.

"The gap is going to be considerably less," he said. "People are more open to the Democratic message."

This year, the DSCC has broken its annual fundraising losing streak to the NRSC, according to campaign-finance records.

Mr. Schumer said that's because voter trends are working in his party's favor.

"We're in a much stronger position heading into November than we thought we'd be," he said. Still, he was quick to add, "It's not a done deal. No one on our side is breaking out the champagne."

In Tight Race, Ad On Black Candidate Stirs Furor (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Oct. 25 — The Tennessee Senate race, one of the most competitive and potentially decisive battles of the midterm election, became even more unpredictable this week after a furor over a Republican television commercial that stood out even in a year of negative advertising.

The commercial, financed by the Republican National Committee, was aimed at Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the black Democrat from Memphis whose campaign for the Senate this year has kept the Republicans on the defensive in a state where they never expected to have trouble holding the seat.

The spot, which was first broadcast last week and was disappearing from the air on Wednesday, featured a series of people in mock man-on-the street interviews talking sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his stands on issues including the estate tax and national security.

The controversy erupted over one of the people featured: an attractive white woman, bare-shouldered, who declares that she met Mr. Ford at a “Playboy party,” and closes the commercial by looking into the camera and saying, with a wink, “Harold, call me.”

A spokeswoman for Mr. Ford, who is single, said he was one of 3,000 people who attended a Playboy party at the Super Bowl last year in Jacksonville, Fla.

Critics asserted that the advertisement was a clear effort to play to racial stereotypes and fears, essentially, playing the race card in an election where Mr. Ford is trying to break a century of history and become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Hilary Shelton, director of the N.A.A.C.P.’s Washington bureau, said the spot took aim at the sensitivities many Americans still have about interracial dating.

John Geer, a professor at Vanderbilt University and a specialist in political advertising, said that it “is playing to a lot of fears” and “frankly makes the Willie Horton ad look like child’s play.”

Professor Geer was alluding to the case of a convicted black murderer used in Republican commercials contending that the 1988 Democratic nominee for president, Michael S. Dukakis, was soft on crime.

Mr. Ford has been campaigning as an independent, new generation Democrat dedicated to changing the atmosphere in Washington; to putting more attention on the needs of the middle class and on bread and butter issues like health care and to bringing a fresh approach to the war in Iraq. He has strongly resisted Republican efforts to pigeonhole him as a liberal.

Bob Corker, the Republican candidate, offers himself as committed to Tennessee values, with a track record in business and public life of solving problems, in contrast to what he asserts is Mr. Ford’s “total life experience” in Washington politics and serving the Ford political dynasty in Memphis.

The debate over the spot was more impassioned on the campaign trail Wednesday, when Mr. Ford and his allies took their bus across a wide swath of eastern and middle Tennessee, campaigning in small towns and courthouse squares.

Representative Lincoln Davis, the conservative Democrat from the heavily rural district in the state’s midsection, introduced Mr. Ford at a rally in Crossville with a fierce attack on the advertisement.

“I’m ashamed at what I see Republicans putting out today,” Mr. Davis declared, as an overwhelmingly white audience of more than a hundred cheered on the small town square. “You tell Karl Rove that we don’t want this stuff on TV in Tennessee. We don’t want our kids seeing that.”

Mr. Ford told his audience here, and elsewhere in recent days, that the attacks were simply a sign of desperation, a sign the Republicans have nothing else to say. He added, "You know your opponent is scared when his main opposition against you is, 'My opponent likes girls.' " The audience erupted in laughter.

"You know it's a big problem if at the end of a race, if the best they can come up with is this sleaze they're putting up," he said.

In an interview, Mr. Ford demurred when asked if he thought the advertisement was injecting race into the campaign. "You need to ask those people over there what they tried to do with that ad," he said. "It's tasteless, but I've come to expect that from my opponent."

Mr. Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga, quickly tried to distance his campaign from the advertisement. The Corker campaign had been claiming momentum in recent days, citing a flurry of recent polls indicating the Republican had regained a slight lead after steadying its message and its campaign organization.

A spokesman for the Corker campaign, Todd Womack, said the campaign was pleased that the spot had been taken off the air. "It was tacky, over the top," Mr. Womack said. "Tennesseans deserve better."

The spot was paid for by the Republican National Committee but was produced by an independent expenditure group that is supposed to have an arm's length relationship with the actual campaigns. As a result, Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he did not see the spot before it was broadcast and did not have the power to order it removed.

Even so, Mr. Mehlman said he did not see a racial subtext to the ad. "I will tell you that when I looked at the ad, that was not my reaction," he said. "I hear and respect people who had a different reaction, and I hope they respect me, too."

Moreover, Republican spokesmen said they did not believe the advertisement had been taken off the air in response to the controversy, but had simply, in the words of one, "run its course."

The furor puts Mr. Mehlman in a difficult position. He has spent considerable time as the national chairman preaching the inclusiveness of the Republican Party and its openness to black candidates and black voters. He said in an interview Wednesday night that he did not believe that this would damage his Republican outreach efforts.

Officials with the Republican independent expenditure committee, who include longtime allies of the Bush political circle, did not respond to requests for comment.

The Senate race here is one of three, along with Missouri and Virginia, that are pivotal to control of the Senate, and all three are considered neck-and-neck. Mr. Ford and Mr. Corker are seeking the seat left vacant by the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, who is retiring.

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll published this week showed Mr. Corker leading Mr. Ford, 49 percent to 44 percent. The poll was conducted last Friday through Monday, and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

If he wins, the campaign Mr. Ford has been running here will be considered a roadmap for Democrats in conservative and rural areas. Mr. Davis invariably introduced him this week as a man who would never "take away your Bible or your gun," but would raise the minimum wage so people could afford them.

With just 13 days to go, Mr. Ford is generating an intense response on the campaign trail as elderly white women reach for his hand and tell him they are praying for him, and he is swamped by autograph hunters and picture takers.

At one point, Mr. Davis's eyes welled up as Mr. Ford worked his way through a crowd — largely friendly, although not entirely so — at a heavily Republican barbecue. "You're watching history," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Ford said later that he was not thinking history. "I'm trying to win a race," he said, before he jumped into his bus, whose destination sign read, "success express."

Contentious Race Republicans' Hold On The South Gets Test In Tennessee (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Nikhil Deogun

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. -- Race has long been a deciding factor in Southern politics, helping determine who is picked to represent the region in Washington. Now, parts of the upper South -- including Tennessee, Virginia and North Carolina -- are attracting significant numbers of people from other parts of the country who aren't steeped in the region's traditions but are drawn to good jobs, lower taxes, top-notch universities and affordable real estate.

This migratory shift is scrambling the region's electoral politics. It is raising Democratic hopes that some parts of the South may no longer be as monolithic in their support of the Republican Party and may be more accepting of African-American candidates.

That helps explain why Harold Ford Jr., a 36-year-old congressman and scion of a famed African-American political dynasty, is in a statistical dead heat with his Republican opponent in the race for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist. If Mr. Ford wins, he will become the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. One major factor may be an unheralded demographic shift.

Over lunch at The Tomato Head restaurant, local attorney Bert Ritchie, a 67-year-old who moved here from Chicago five years ago and voted twice for George W. Bush, says he plans to vote for Mr. Ford because he thinks Republicans "abused their ascendancy a little bit." His lunch-mate, Mark Heinz, is agonizing over his own decision. After voting for Mr. Ford's opponent, Bob Corker, in the Republican primary in August, Mr. Heinz, a 37-year-old Philadelphia native, is having second thoughts.

Messrs. Heinz and Ritchie, who are both white, say race isn't a factor, in part because they hail from cities that have had black mayors. "When I came here for college in 1988 I was really shocked at how racially divided it was," says Mr. Heinz, who attended the University of Tennessee. "But I think in the last 15 years or so, with transplants coming in, people are becoming more accepting."

Tennessee has the 16th-largest population among U.S. states but posted the 10th-fastest growth rate from 2004 to 2005. The percentage of native Tennesseans has dipped to 62%, down from 70% in 1990, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

Virginia and Tennessee are in "the midst of a non-Southern demographic makeover," says William Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution. Last year, the population of Tennessee included almost 20% who were born outside the South, versus 13.5% in 1990. "The tipping point may not be there yet in terms of making [Tennessee] from a red state to a blue state but it's moving in that direction."

The Tennessee race is considered an important test of how strong the Republican hold is on the South. In recent weeks, the campaign has become increasingly bitter as Democrats accuse Republicans of injecting race into a campaign that had been largely free of it. They allege that frequent references in campaign commercials to the Memphis political dynasty from which Mr. Ford hails and to his dating life are designed to play on racial fears.

Republicans deny the charge. "I've been doing this since 1974 and I've never gone there," says Tom Ingram, Mr. Corker's campaign manager.

How Mr. Ford does may well decide the fate of the Senate -- and it also may signal how seriously to take the prospect of Sen. Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat, as a viable presidential candidate.

"This becomes an indicator of how feasible it is for an African-American politician, or a Latino politician, to think in terms of appealing to a broader constituency," says Bruce Oppenheimer, a political science professor at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Signs of Acceptance

There are already signs of such acceptance. In Georgia, the attorney general for the past nine years has been a black Democrat, as is the labor commissioner. That state also elected a black Supreme Court chief justice. The northeast corner of Tennessee, known as Tri-Cities (for Kingsport, Bristol and Johnson City), is the archetypical GOP stronghold and 96% white, but its state representative is an African-American Democrat who is so popular that he faces no Republican opposition in November.

As more people move from elsewhere to Tennessee, "it has leavened and hybridized the society here," making a candidate's background less important, says Gov. Phil Bredesen, who grew up in upstate New York and graduated from Harvard University before moving to Tennessee in 1975.

In his earlier runs for office, a major hurdle was "being born and brought up on the wrong side of the Mason-Dixon Line," says Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat. This year, he is expected to cruise to re-election, and while "there are still people who won't vote for me because I'm a Yankee, and I'm sure there are people who would not vote for Ford because he is an African-American...it's not been an overwhelming issue."

Nowhere is the shift in population more visible than in Nashville, both the geographic and political center of the state. Wedged between the pillars of liberal, majority-black Memphis in the west and conservative, predominantly white Knoxville in the east, the capital city and its suburbs are experiencing the sort of dynamic change that transformed other southern cities, such as Atlanta and Charlotte, N.C. Loft apartments are being erected and trendy bars hum with activity. At Radius10, a new restaurant overlooking downtown, a customer favorite is the $18 foie gras appetizer.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Southern states became a magnet for auto companies and other manufacturers looking to set up plants in right-to-work states. Tennessee was among the first to benefit from this shift, when Nissan Motor Co. in 1981 opened a plant in Smyrna, Tenn. Today, the auto industry employs nearly 127,000 people in Tennessee. Workers at the area auto plants who followed their companies from Michigan and elsewhere in the Midwest fill the Gaylord Entertainment Center when the Nashville Predators hockey team hosts the Detroit Red Wings. Disapproving locals nicknamed those with divided loyalties "PredWings" fans.

These days, the city is benefiting from an influx of white-collar jobs. Nine company headquarters, bringing 4,635 jobs, have moved here in four years.

The latest is Nissan, which has relocated its North American headquarters from California to the Nashville area, bringing with it about 500 white-collar employees. The company has since added hundreds more employees. Until it builds its new headquarters in Franklin, Tenn., the company's temporary head office is in downtown Nashville in the BellSouth tower, a building affectionately called the "Bat" tower because of two giant spires that rise from the top of the structure in a shape resembling the cowl worn by Batman.

While it's impossible to know the politics of the new transplants, a number of them eagerly shook hands with Mr. Ford one day last month as they filed into work, with several of the women taking pictures on their cellphones and gushing about his good looks. (A bachelor, he was named a few years ago as one of People magazine's 50 most beautiful people.)

Mr. Ford, who was educated in a Washington prep school while his father served in Congress, is particularly adept at appealing to his liberal base while reaching out to conservative voters. He is a frequent guest on Fox News and Don Imus's television and syndicated radio show. He speaks often about loving Jesus and highlights his conservative position on some social issues -- such as banning gay marriage and supporting a constitutional amendment to outlaw flag-burning.

At a two-hour prayer breakfast last week at the Hilton hotel in downtown Nashville, Mr. Ford basked in the adulation as preacher after preacher exhorted the mostly African-American audience to vote for him.

An hour later, Mr. Ford was in front of a totally different audience: the Tennessee Sheriffs' Association. With the exception of a couple of black sheriffs, the audience was all white males, mostly middle-aged or older. Mr. Ford told his life story, frequently highlighting his conservative credentials, such as how he voted for the toughest anti-immigration measure brought before the House.

Sheriff Terry Ashe, of Lebanon, Tenn., later said he plans to support Mr. Ford because he believes it's important to have someone with Washington experience dealing with Iraq and other major issues. "He won't have a learning curve -- just give him a Snickers bar and a Coke, and he'll be at work tomorrow," said Sheriff Ashe, who voted for Presidents Reagan and Clinton.

Race, said Sheriff Ashe, who is white, is "a quiet issue" that could determine the election. "I just hope Tennessee has moved beyond those days."

Mr. Ford was happy with the reception he got from the sheriffs. "The perception that there are people here who wouldn't vote for me because of who I am -- I've never accepted that," Mr. Ford said in an interview after meeting with them. "I'm trying to win every county in the state. Take a look at those sheriffs. I think if they don't vote for us, I think they'll at least think long and hard and listen closely to the issues."

Unlike some African-American politicians, Mr. Ford rarely brings up race or talks about issues long championed by black politicians, such as affirmative action. "I don't focus" on race, he says. "I do know that on Saturday when we play Alabama and Erik Ainge throws that first pass, as long as the guy is wearing an orange jersey we won't care what color the guy is underneath the jersey," he adds, referring to the University of Tennessee quarterback, who is white. "When I get to the Senate, they'll introduce me as the senator from Tennessee and my job is to represent Tennesseans."

Indeed, some whites say they haven't voted for black candidates in past statewide contests because they weren't strong candidates or their positions on issues didn't align with their own. One reason Mr. Ford is attracting wide support, they say, is because he is moderate on social issues and has shown a willingness to challenge his own party.

By one demographic factor, Mr. Ford should be far behind in the polls. Tennessee has one of the lowest African-American populations in the South -- about 16%. Logically, that should put African-American candidates at a disadvantage for statewide office because they can't count on a massive bloc of votes to give them a head start in a statewide election. But political scientists say the reverse may be true: In states with smaller black populations, whites don't feel as threatened and the state isn't as polarized. For instance, African-Americans make up a very high percentage of Mississippi and Alabama -- 36.5% and 26%, respectively -- and black voters tend to vote Democrat while white voters go for Republicans. The "blacker" the state, the larger President Bush's margin of victory in 2004.

The Real Test

The real test will come on Nov. 7. Polls have often shown African-American candidates scoring well in the polls only to fail to clinch the election. In 1990, former Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young drew wide support from white business leaders in his run for Georgia governor but lost in the Democratic primary. The same year, former Charlotte Mayor Harvey Gantt challenged Sen. Jesse Helms -- one of the South's most vocal opponents of racial integration and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in the 1960s -- and was well ahead in the polls but nevertheless lost. Even former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who is the only black elected to a governorship in the U.S., won in 1989 by a much narrower margin -- half a percentage point -- than the 10% indicated in exit polls.

Some political scientists and strategists refer to it as the "15% lie" -- when whites, bowing to societal pressure, tell pollsters they intend to vote for a black candidate but fail to do so in the voting booths. Indeed, several political experts believe that despite Mr. Ford's strong showing in the polls, some whites may desert him at the last minute. "We'll get the non-surprise surprise when Ford doesn't get the vote," says Thomas F. Schaller, an associate professor of political science at the University of Maryland and author of a new book, "Whistling Past Dixie," which argues that most of the South is beyond Democrats' reach.

While race has been largely absent from the campaign, that's changed of late. A group called Tennesseans for Truth aired a radio ad in the town of Gallatin, which said that Mr. Ford and the other members of the Congressional Black Caucus "represent the interests of black people above all others" and secretly submit an annual federal budget "to fund aid to black Americans. Discrimination at its worst," the narrator says.

The Ford campaign contacted the Corker camp and urged the campaign to denounce the ad. Mr. Corker did so and asked the radio station to discontinue the ad.

Just yesterday, after mounting criticism, including from Mr. Corker himself, the Republican National Committee said that it will no longer run a television ad featuring a blonde woman baring her shoulders and saying, "I met Harold at a Playboy party." Democrats complained the ad was meant to invoke old taboos about interracial relationships. Mr. Ford has acknowledged attending a party sponsored by Playboy at the Super Bowl last year, telling reporters, "I like football and I like girls." The National Republican Senatorial Committee, meanwhile, has a Web site, www.fancyford.com4, which chronicles what it calls Mr. Ford's lavish lifestyle.

Another flashpoint has been references made by the Corker campaign and Republican groups to Mr. Ford's family, which helped run Memphis's political machine. Mr. Ford's father was acquitted of federal bank fraud, an uncle has been indicted for allegedly taking bribes -- charges he denies -- and an aunt's election to the state legislature was declared invalid after voting irregularities. "It's not personal about the members of the family. It's an issue about power and political greed and issues that everybody in the state is familiar with," says Mr. Ingram, from the Corker campaign.

Democrats worry that the Republican ad blitz will keep white voters away. Nathan Vaughn, the black Democrat who represents the conservative and overwhelmingly white Tri-Cities area in the state legislature and is campaigning for Mr. Ford, says he has received "good feedback" about the congressman's candidacy. "He's an intellect...but you have these campaign handlers who are basically throwing bombs into the crowd with these stereotypical terms like 'slick.' If you do that enough, people will think it's true if they don't hear anything to the contrary."

Ford Foundation (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. -- If Bob Corker's campaign has a favorite phrase these days, it's "clear choice." Warming up for a press conference, the Republican Senate candidate tells reporters that this race offers a "clear choice" between himself and Rep. Harold Ford, Jr., his Democratic opponent. Lamar Alexander shows up to note "a real choice" come November. "Yes," says Mr. Corker. "I would like to emphasize that there is a clear choice . . ."

Mr. Corker is clearly hoping that if he says it enough, voters might start to believe him. They haven't so far, which explains why Mr. Ford has the Republican Party worried. A year ago, nobody would have given the 36-year-old Democrat a chance. The South isn't exactly friendly territory for the left; Tennessee hasn't elected a Democrat to the Senate since 1990.

Long odds. Yet today Mr. Ford is dogging Mr. Corker at the polls, threatening an upset in a race that could determine the balance of power in the Senate. Over the past year the Democrat has run right on social issues and defense, neutralizing two areas that so often hurt Democrats. That has freed him up to run a more populist campaign on economic issues. The calculation is proving a winner, and offers some lessons to national Democrats still interested in again becoming viable in the South.

At least some of Mr. Ford's advantages are experience and luck. A political family scion, he's had 10 years in the House to develop a charisma that TV cameras love and plays well against his more buttoned-up opponent. The Democrat was basically unchallenged for the nomination, allowing him to pump out his message early while Mr. Corker was locked in a vicious three-way primary. And then there's the storm cloud raging around the GOP -- Mark Foley, the war, corruption -- which has discouraged Tennessee Republicans. Some are casting about for an alternative, some for a reason to vote at all.

Luck aside, good candidates take advantage of their environment -- and Mr. Ford is good. His big goal has been to firmly identify with this buckle of the Bible belt, talking up his faith and conservative views on social issues. He points to his recent votes for bans on partial birth abortion, flag desecration and gay marriage. A cofounder of the House Faith-Based Caucus, Mr. Ford filmed one of his campaign ads in a church. Mr. Ford tells me -- with a satisfied look that would surely make Howard Dean squirm -- that he even has the support of Mr. Corker's former rector.

Many Tennesseans -- including Republicans -- miss the part about how Mr. Ford's faith is also his justification for more liberal economic positions in the name of "social justice." Also lending credibility is the fact -- endlessly trumpeted -- that he has taken these conservative positions despite flack from his party, and despite representing the most liberal district in Tennessee, urban Memphis.

On trickier issues, Mr. Ford has perfected the art of Third Way-ism, presenting himself as an "independent" thinker on issues such as the Iraq war. He knows many Republicans are uncomfortable with the current situation, but that they also won't get behind a cut-and-run Democrat. He's been generally supportive of the war, but also highly critical of the strategy, for which he suggests a new approach: partition of the country. There's nothing new about the idea of dividing Iraq; but Mr. Ford's votes for the war in Congress, and his willingness to talk about the need for it, has certainly resonated better than have the "credentials" of the many war vets Democrats recruited to run elsewhere. "[Mr. Corker] can't name a single issue where I'm a liberal," Mr. Ford says. "They've had a hard time putting me in a box. That's been very frustrating for Republicans."

No more so than Mr. Corker, who has struggled to put daylight between himself and his rival -- on the war, immigration, social issues. His job is all the harder given that he doesn't have a record that allows him to gain traction on issues where Mr. Ford is vulnerable. Taxes are a good example, as Mr. Ford is on record as saying he'd raise them on the rich, and has voted against key Bush tax cuts. His line that his pro-tax votes were in the name of balanced budgets isn't one that always washes with voters.

Yet Mr. Corker hasn't wanted to talk about taxes, lest the past be revived. He was state finance czar under Gov. Don Sundquist, who earned voters' ire for pushing a new income tax. As Chattanooga mayor, Mr. Corker himself raised property taxes. While the Republican has carved out key policy differences in areas such as health care or education reform, they've figured little in the debate.

Tom Ingram, Mr. Corker's campaign manger, admits drawing a liberal-conservative comparison didn't work: "It's tough to pin labels on either of these guys," he says. "The message we've got now is that on the one hand we have an experienced, accomplished Tennessean, and on the other hand a Washington politician who is perpetuating the Ford political dynasty." In other words, biography, usually the last refuge of the desperate -- though Mr. Corker may win despite this. His campaign will get a big infusion of cash now the national party is focused on a Tennessee victory.

More important, Republicans are catching on to Mr. Ford's weakness -- voters' suspicion that he isn't as conservative as he says. You hear "closet liberal" intimations that his votes in recent years were planned with an eye for a Senate run, as well as examples of flip-floppery on issues like partial birth abortion (he voted against a ban in 1997) and the Kelo property rights decision. Tennesseans have seen this before, and are wary: They elected Jim Sasser as a conservative Democrat and watched him vote liberal. Ditto Al Gore.

Overcoming these fears is Mr. Ford's challenge, though what matters is that he is trying to do just that -- and making headway. The Democratic Party has been aware of its weaknesses on social issues and national defense for years, but with Howard Dean and Nancy Pelosi in charge, it has refused to budge from a liberal stance that resonates mainly in New York and California. Mr. Ford has shown that voters elsewhere will respond to Democrats who aren't afraid to really talk with them -- and vote with them -- on God and guns.

A Right Kind Of Democrat (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

He is pro-business and antiabortion. He is an evangelical Christian and an avid hunter. But, unexpectedly, Heath Shuler is a Democrat, and he is running for Congress in North Carolina.

Shuler is part of a phalanx of unusually conservative Democratic candidates who may deliver crucial victories over GOP incumbents and help their party win control of the House.

Republicans are ringing alarms about what the House would be like if the GOP lost control: a throwback to the unreconstructed liberalism of big-government activism, tax increases and a weak-kneed defense policy. They point with Halloween-season horror to the likely lineup of Democratic committee chairs, including Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) and other liberal old-timers.

But, like Shuler, many of the Democratic candidates most likely to be elected are cut from a different cloth. Sixteen of them have been endorsed by the Blue Dogs, a coalition of conservative Democrats. Several used to be Republicans. Shuler was recruited to run as a Republican a few years ago but opted not to.

In the waning days of the election campaign, candidates are increasingly debating what a Democratic-controlled Congress would be like: Would the tone and agenda be set by the Heath Shulers of the party, or its Henry Waxmans?

With so many conservative-leaning candidates at the forefront of the Democratic effort, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has, at least for now, stuck to a minimalist agenda that steers clear of grand, liberal ambitions. Instead, Democratic leaders are focusing — and almost all serious Democratic candidates are campaigning on — a more limited, six-point agenda that includes raising the minimum wage, repealing tax breaks for oil companies, restoring college tuition tax breaks, cutting Medicare drug costs and other plans they believe could draw bipartisan support.

The limited agenda has won endorsements even from Democrats as conservative as candidate Ken Lucas of Kentucky — a former House member who, before he left Congress in 2004, voted "present" rather than vote for Pelosi in the traditional party-line vote for House speaker.

Republicans charge that the apparent moderation in Democratic candidates is a smokescreen meant to obscure their support for a party steered by liberals and initiatives such as tax increases.

"They claim to be pro-life, pro-gun and anti-tax, yet their first vote in Congress would be to elect the most liberal speaker in American history," said Jonathan Collegio, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which aims to enlarge the GOP majority in the House. "In the first hundred hours they will roll back tax cuts and open investigations into the administration."

Even some centrist Democrats privately fret that the chairmen-in-waiting may be harboring pent-up desires for a robust liberal agenda and partisan investigations that could hurt the party. "There's a desperate need for fresh blood, a general changing of the guard," said one moderate Democrat who asked not to be named.

An influx of new blood from the party's right wing could test party leaders' ability to maintain the remarkable unity they have forged during their years in the minority. Among the party's House challengers, 33 are conservative enough to be endorsed by either the Blue Dogs or the political arm of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Nearly all are on the Cook Political Report's latest list of Democrats most likely to win seats now held by Republicans. The party needs to pick up 15 seats to win a majority in the House.

With more conservative Democrats in the House, President Bush could have a new opening to reach across the aisle. But so far, he shows no signs of preparing to do so. One of the few issues he cites as a priority for next year is his plan to overhaul Social Security — a nonstarter among Democrats of all political stripes.

Bush's senior advisors have been meeting to plan next year's agenda, but apparently none of those discussions have focused on contingency planning for a Congress led by Democrats.

"I believe I'll be working with a Republican-controlled Congress and a Republican-controlled Senate," Bush said at a Wednesday news conference.

If they won a majority in the House, Democrats would be severely limited in what they could accomplish legislatively without control of the Senate and with Bush in office. Still, even a slim majority would give committee chairmen power to conduct investigations and issue subpoenas — tools they want to use to scrutinize Bush's policy on Iraq and other issues they believe the GOP bypassed.

In line to assume those powers is a cadre of unapologetic liberals of an older generation. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), first elected to the House in 1955, is poised to return to the Energy and Commerce chairmanship he held before Republicans won the House in 1994. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) would return as Appropriations chairman. Waxman is in line to be chairman of the Government Reform Committee, an important venue for investigations.

In addition, minority-group members would gain great power in a Democratic House. African Americans are in line to become chairmen of the committees on taxation (Charles B. Rangel of New York), the judiciary (John Conyers Jr. of Michigan) and intelligence (Alcee L. Hastings of Florida).

Republicans are spotlighting that lineup, portraying it as extremist. They jumped on Conyers for calling for impeachment hearings against Bush, an idea Pelosi flatly dismisses. Republicans delight in pointing out that Hastings, before becoming a House member, was impeached as a federal judge.

Democrats say they believe such tactics are designed to mobilize conservatives and will not eclipse their efforts to present a more moderate face to swing voters. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee last year made a point of recruiting conservative candidates and even some former Republicans for this year's midterm election, in some cases muscling out more-liberal contenders who seemed likely to lose in Republican-leaning territory.

"The Democrats are going to retake the House of Representatives by electing conservative and moderate Democrats," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), a member of the Blue Dog Coalition. "We're going to move our party back to the middle."

Republicans, in ads and elsewhere, have tried to discredit Democrats' conservative credentials — mostly by linking them to Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0086853

In Indiana, GOP Rep. John Hostettler is running behind Democrat Brad Ellsworth, a sheriff who opposes abortion rights and same-sex marriage. But a new Hostettler radio ad says a vote for Ellsworth would be a vote for Pelosi.

"Pelosi will then put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda," the ad says.

In Kentucky, ads by GOP Rep. Ron Lewis call attention to the fact that his Democratic opponent, retired Army Col. Mike Weaver, has accepted donations from Pelosi. "He is not a certified conservative," Lewis said.

But Weaver, a state representative, is against abortion, gun control and same-sex marriage. He founded a conservative group in the state Legislature to push his party to the right.

In North Carolina, Shuler, who is running against GOP Rep. Charles H. Taylor, turned down encouragement to run for the House in 2002 as a Republican, despite his conservative views.

Shuler, a former quarterback for the Washington Redskins and New Orleans Saints, stuck with the Democratic Party, his spokesman said, because he wanted to "help those who cannot help themselves — and that's the Democratic Party."

But Shuler dodges the question of whether he would support Pelosi as speaker, saying he wants to interview all candidates for that post.

Celebrities Face Off On Stem Cell Issue In Mo. (USAT)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

Opponents of a Missouri ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to allow research using embryonic stem cells have produced a star-studded TV ad to press their cause. The ad features former St. Louis Rams quarterback and Super Bowl hero Kurt Warner, St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan, Kansas City Royals baseball player Mike Sweeney, Everybody Loves Raymond actress Patricia Heaton and The Passion of the Christ star James Caviezel.

Supporters of the measure have been running ads featuring singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native. And Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill's campaign is airing ads featuring a quivering Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, urging voters to elect her because of her support for stem cell research. Conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh criticized the ad and suggested Fox was either off his medication or acting. Limbaugh later apologized.

The ballot measure has been a major issue in McCaskill's too-close-to-call battle to unseat GOP Sen. Jim Talent, who opposes the measure.

Schumer, Dole at odds on fate of Senate

New York Sen. Charles Schumer, head of the Democrats' Senate campaign committee, said his party is “on the edge” of taking control of the chamber in elections Nov. 7. His GOP counterpart, North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole, countered him at a National Press Club lunch, saying the GOP will hold its majority. Dole said a poll Wednesday shows GOP candidate Michael Steele has closed to within 3 percentage points of Democrat Ben Cardin in Maryland. She rejected Schumer's claim that Republicans are running from foreign policy issues. If Democrats control the Senate, “you're going to see a weaker security system,” she said.

Schumer said GOP attacks on Democrats aren't working because voters are unhappy with President Bush and “they don't want a rubber-stamp Congress.” — Jill Lawrence

Pa. senator shifts TV ads to cable channels

GOP Sen. Rick Santorum's re-election campaign in Pennsylvania has moved most of its TV ads from broadcast TV to cable channels such as CNN, A&E and the Discovery Channel, Santorum media consultant John Brabender said. He said the move is a strategic one as the race against Democrat Bob Casey, who leads in polls, heads to the final days. “We're buying as heavily on cable as we can,” he said. “This is about reaching undecided voters.” G. Terry Madonna, a political science professor at Franklin & Marshall College, said it sounded more like a cash-saving move: “Why would you give up commercial TV if you can afford it?”

Political Pitches At The World Series (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

A political ad featuring actor Michael J. Fox — his body jerking uncontrollably from Parkinson's disease — has touched off an unusual war of celebrity sound bites against the backdrop of the World Series.

St. Louis Cardinals fans watching the first game of the baseball championship last week saw Fox, racked with tremors, urging them to vote for Missouri's Democratic candidate for Senate, Claire McCaskill, who backs a ballot measure to protect embryonic stem cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0086854

In response, opponents of the measure rushed to assemble their own celebrity commercial. The 60-second spot, due to air during Game 4 of the World Series, features the Cardinals' starting pitcher, Jeff Suppan. (The game was postponed Wednesday due to rain and is now scheduled for tonight.)

Athletes and actors have long lent their star power to political campaigns. Days after leading the Boston Red Sox to a World Series title in 2004, pitcher Curt Schilling began stumping for President Bush, endorsing him in recorded phone calls to New England voters and appearing by his side at rallies.

Hollywood came out in force for Democratic challenger Sen. John F. Kerry: Danny DeVito drove voters to the polls in Florida, Sharon Stone rallied crowds in Maine and Leonardo DiCaprio hit the campaign trail in Ohio.

But national celebrities don't often take the leap of filming ads for candidates or political causes.

"They give money. They attend fundraisers. But for the most part, they tend not to lend their likeness to political spots," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of TMS Media Intelligence/Campaign Media Analysis Group, an Arlington, Va., firm that tracks political ads.

Fox has been an exception. He filmed ads for Kerry and for the successful California campaign for a ballot initiative promoting stem cell research. (The California campaign also featured a commercial made by paralyzed actor Christopher Reeve just days before his death in October 2004.)

This year's spot has drawn more attention than the 2004 ads because Fox looks so debilitated. His body jerks so violently in the 30-second spot that conservative talk show host Rush Limbaugh mockingly mimicked the tremors and suggested that Fox was exaggerating his symptoms. Limbaugh later apologized, but the uproar over his remarks made the Fox ad the talk of the political world — and prompted thousands of people to view it online.

Some scientists believe that embryonic stem cell research could produce treatments for diseases such as Parkinson's, a progressive disorder that affects nerve cells in the brain, impairing motor control. Missouri's ballot measure would enshrine the right to conduct such research in the state constitution.

Opponents in Missouri and on the federal level have sought to block research on embryos because they consider the cluster of cells a human being and recoil at the idea of destroying that nascent life in scientific experiments. Opponents also argue that the research is exploitative because scientists sometimes pay women to donate their eggs.

The Missouri committee opposing the stem cell ballot initiative has emphasized the exploitation argument and has asserted that the measure would open the door to human cloning.

Even before the Fox ad aired, the group had been working with actor James Caviezel, who played Jesus in the film "The Passion of the Christ," to identify celebrities who supported their cause. The Fox spot spurred them to hurry their efforts. On Tuesday, they picked up footage from Suppan, who was so eager to help that he videotaped his own remarks, said Austin Ruse, a spokesman for Missourians Against Human Cloning.

Arizona Cardinals quarterback Kurt Warner, who led the St. Louis Rams to the Super Bowl in 2000, also joined the effort.

The ad was scheduled to air twice on Missouri TV stations during Game 4. It's a coveted slot for a political ad. But political analyst Tobe Berkovitz said he wasn't sure it would be nearly as effective as the Fox pitch, which tugged at viewers' hearts.

"What you do in Missouri matters to millions of Americans — Americans like me," said Fox, who has suffered from Parkinson's for 15 years. He has made similar commercials for Democratic candidates in Maryland and Wisconsin.

The ad opposing the ballot initiative is much less emotional. Suppan, Warner, Caviezel and others look directly into the camera and assert that the measure is a fraud that will open the door to human cloning. "Don't be deceived," says Suppan, who is not wearing his baseball uniform.

"For every celebrity ad that works, there are probably three that don't, because voters don't connect the celebrity to the cause," said Berkovitz, interim dean of the College of Communication at Boston University. The latest polls show the measure to protect stem cell research winning handily in Missouri. McCaskill is locked in a tight race with incumbent Jim Talent, a Republican who opposes the ballot measure.

Jesus' Words Used Vs. Stem-cell Initiative (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

The actor who played Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ" is drawing on his knowledge of that film's Aramaic language and his image as Christ for his latest role -- using Jesus' words to ask Missouri voters to oppose a stem-cell research measure on the Nov. 7 ballot.

Actor Jim Caviezel opens the political ad with a brief statement in Aramaic, the common tongue of biblical-era Palestine and the language of Mel Gibson's blockbuster movie, saying: "Le-bar nash be-neshak."

DOJ_NMG_0086855

Bill Fulco, the Loyola Marymount professor who translated Mr. Gibson's script for "Passion" and coached the actors on the ancient language, told The Washington Times yesterday the phrase means: "You betray the Son of Man with a kiss," a reference to Judas' betraying Christ and a phrase used in the Greek of Luke's Gospel.

Cathy Cleaver Ruse, a spokeswoman for Missourians Against Human Cloning, which produced the ad, said the group had Mr. Caviezel say the Aramaic phrase in a contemporary setting but without subtitles "to make the ad a little more intriguing."

When presented with Mr. Fulco's translation, which was confirmed by several other Aramaic scholars, the group agreed to release the exact translation exclusively to The Times.

"It means 'You betray me with a kiss,' which means Amendment Two is a betrayal because it is deceptive," Ms. Ruse said. "It promises one thing and delivers another."

Tom Schreiner, a professor of New Testament interpretation at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, said yesterday Mr. Caviezel is implying the amendment may seem "loving and kind" to its supporters, but when read closely, it is "actually a betrayal."

Nathan Jastram, a biblical scholar from Concordia University in Wisconsin, agreed, saying it implies "murder is being planned under the guise of compassion."

"Just as Judas betrayed Jesus to death while testifying with a kiss that he was his friend, so stem-cell researchers are causing the death of embryos while testifying to the public that they are searching for ways to promote life," he said.

The 60-second ad, scheduled for airing during the World Series game between the St. Louis Cardinals and the Detroit Tigers last night, also features Cardinals pitcher Jeff Suppan and former St. Louis Rams quarterback Kurt Warner. It has been played more than 160,000 times on YouTube.com since its release Tuesday night to the media.

Mr. Suppan and Mr. Warner say voters shouldn't be "tricked." Mr. Caviezel finishes out the ad, this time in English: "You know now. Don't do it. Vote No on Two."

Mr. Suppan and Mr. Caviezel are both Roman Catholics; Mr. Warner is an evangelical.

The ad was produced in response to Michael J. Fox, the Parkinson's-afflicted actor who asks voters in a television ad to choose pro-stem cell research candidate Democrat Claire McCaskill on Nov. 7.

"What you do in Missouri matters to millions of Americans. Americans like me," Mr. Fox says in the ad, which has been played more than 1 million times on YouTube.

Conservative radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh suggested Mr. Fox was deliberately not taking his medication to enhance his symptoms for the benefit of the camera, something Mr. Fox has acknowledged doing in the past. Mr. Limbaugh has since apologized, but he is standing by his criticism of the Fox ad as misleading.

The celebrity back-and-forth on Missouri's stem-cell measure is the latest chapter in what has been a long debate involving Mrs. McCaskill and incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who opposes the ballot initiative.

Most polls show the ballot measure, which needs a simple majority to pass, with a strong lead. Ms. Ruse said the ad will run statewide with an aim to educate the many undecided voters in the final 12 days before the election.

Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of the National Synagogue in Washington said he finds the Caviezel ad "distasteful."

"There's another religious approach that embraces research on stem cells because it saves lives," he said. "There should be a discussion about that."

Republicans Intensify Push In New Jersey (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — National Republican campaign strategists are beginning an intensive last-minute offensive in New Jersey, seizing on the tight race between Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat, and his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Officials with the National Republican Senatorial Committee said they were putting $3.5 million into the race in its final 12 days to pay for television advertisements attacking Mr. Menendez that were expected to be on major stations by Thursday morning.

Brian Nick, a spokesman for the committee, said Mr. Kean had remained at least competitive with Mr. Menendez — though trailing in two recent polls — despite being outspent. Mr. Nick said the committee believed that the new advertising, produced by a quasi-independent arm of the committee created under federal campaign finance law, had the potential to change the dynamic of the race.

“We’re coming in with financial resources to help get parity in spending,” Mr. Nick said. “And when that happens, Kean will win.”

DOJ_NMG_0086856

Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said the party would provide an extra push for Mr. Kean with an aggressive drive to get out the vote.

"We feel that there's a real opportunity in New Jersey," Mr. Jones said.

The $3.5 million advertising outlay is a major investment in two of the most expensive media markets in the nation, New York and Philadelphia, both of which transmit into New Jersey.

Mr. Kean had spent $2.5 million through Sept. 30, with $3.2 million left on hand for his final push, according to campaign finance records. Mr. Menendez had spent $6.5 million and had $5.5 million left as of Sept. 30, according to the filings.

The new push in New Jersey reflects the state's status as the Republicans' great hope this year. Mr. Menendez's Senate seat is the only one now held by a Democrat that Republicans in Washington believe they can steal away this year.

Democrats need to gain six seats to win control of the Senate next year, a goal that several polls show to be within the realm of possibility.

Though New Jersey tends to vote Democratic, it has a history of selecting moderate Republicans like Mr. Kean, a state senator whose father was New Jersey governor and more recently was a chairman of the Sept. 11 commission.

Mr. Kean has run an extremely tough race, despite the advantages that Mr. Menendez has as an incumbent and prominent fund-raiser for his party. The race has been so competitive that Democratic leaders, who have managed to keep Republican Senate candidates on the run elsewhere, acknowledge that this is the one Democratic-held Senate seat that is vulnerable.

Mr. Kean has sought to portray Mr. Menendez as an unethical politician who has his roots in the notorious Hudson County political machine. He has, for example, pointed to a nonprofit agency that paid more than $320,000 to lease a building in Union City from Mr. Menendez for nearly a decade while he helped the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, secure millions of dollars in federal grants. Mr. Menendez has said that the rent was comparable to market rates at the time and that he has done nothing wrong.

Mr. Menendez has sought to tie Mr. Kean to the policies of President Bush, whose popularity polls show is unpopular in New Jersey. He has also tried linking Mr. Kean to a jailed Hudson County Democrat whom Mr. Kean's campaign had contacted in hopes of undercutting Mr. Menendez.

Mr. Kean has attempted to distance himself from the Bush administration, recently calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Democrats had not expected to find themselves playing defense this year in New Jersey, a solidly Democratic state in recent statewide elections. State voters have not elected a Republican to the United States Senate since 1972 .

Last year, Jon S. Corzine, who was the senior senator at the time, left office after being elected governor. He chose Mr. Menendez, a United States representative for Hudson County at the time, to complete the remainder of his term.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said his committee had spent $7.5 million on the race in New Jersey, and had a $4 million advertising campaign running now.

And he suggested that the Republican push in New Jersey represented a bluff. "They've got no place else to go," he said.

Matt Miller, a spokesman for Mr. Menendez, said his campaign was not concerned, as it has millions more dollars in the bank than Mr. Kean does. And he said several recent polls showed Mr. Menendez ahead in the race, including a Gannett poll showing Mr. Menendez up by nine percentage points.

But a Los Angeles Times poll released on Tuesday showed Mr. Menendez just four percentage points ahead of Mr. Kean.

Cardin, Steele Play Gotcha In Three-way Debate (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, October 26, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. -- In the most tempestuous encounter to date of Maryland's U.S. Senate contest, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin played a heated game of gotcha during a televised debate Wednesday, with Steele pressed into offering his clear support for the war in Iraq and Cardin stumbling when queried about the location of a planned Metro line in the vote-rich Washington suburbs.

The candidates sparred for an hour, talking over each other from the start and bickering about their views on embryonic stem cell research, health care and the Iraq conflict. Each contender claimed he could better bring change to Washington and that his opponent is beholden to party bosses.

"George Bush helped finance his campaign for the United States Senate," Cardin, a 10-term congressman, said of Steele. "The lieutenant governor agrees with George Bush's agenda on Social Security, on health care, the war in Iraq."

Steele snapped back: "This gentleman, this congressman has been running against George Bush for over a year. Haven't you noticed, sir, he's not represented on this stage."

"You were hand-picked by Congressman Steny Hoyer to get in this race," Steele continued, referring to the House minority leader who represents Southern Maryland and who has campaigned extensively for Cardin. "If you weren't, Kweisi Mfume should be sitting here," referring to Cardin's Democratic primary opponent

Kevin Zeese, the third-party candidate who joined Steele and Cardin for the debate taped at the News Channel 8 studio and broadcast Wednesday night on Maryland Public Television, said both men are products of a broken political system.

"I'm the only one not in bed with the special interests," said Zeese, who is the nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

Debate moderator Bruce DePuyt said at the outset that the debate would have no rules, and though the candidates sat next to each other in armchairs instead of behind podiums, what ensued was a conversation in which they could barely conceal their personal disdain for each other. One exchange between Cardin and Steele about the Iraq war showed that tensions are high with less than two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election.

"I just wish the congressman would get off his talking points and listen to what I'm saying and listen to what I've said on this issue and stop trying to drill home a dead point that doesn't reflect my reality," Steele said, when Cardin tried to tie Steele's support for the war to President Bush's policy of maintaining military presence in Iraq. "I know the words that come out of my mouth," Cardin interrupted Steele. "It's a very simple question, very simple question, very simple question," he said.

"What is the question?" Steele responded.

"Should we have gone into Iraq?" Cardin asked.

"Yes, we should have, to deal with the terror that was there," Steele said.

Cardin voted against the 2002 Iraq war resolution but has supported subsequent funding initiatives to provide the troops with the equipment and gear they need to get the job done. During the Senate campaign he has called for 10,000 troops to be sent home monthly from the region. Steele said Wednesday that the government needs to "put in place the mechanisms for our troops to come home," but he called Cardin's original vote against the war "wrong-headed."

"You guys are both wrong on the war, I tell you," Zeese said, adding that the U.S. needs "to get out of Iraq rapidly and responsibly."

The Maryland Senate contest made national news this week when actor Michael J. Fox, who starred in the sitcoms Family Ties and Spin City, cut a television ad for Cardin. Fox has Parkinson's disease, a degenerative ailment that many scientists believe could benefit from treatments derived from embryonic stem cell research. Cardin supports federal funding for such efforts. Steele does not.

During Wednesday's debate, Steele said, "I am four square for stem cell research, absolutely we should be funding stem cell research and accelerating that funding certainly with respect to cord blood and adult stem cells. Where I draw the line is when it comes to embryonic stem cell research. I do not support measures that would destroy that embryo because I respect the life that that embryo represents and is."

Cardin said embryonic stem cell research "holds out tremendous promise" for those suffering.

"Mr. Steele and I have a fundamental disagreement," Cardin said. "I'm in favor of moving forward with embryonic stem cell research; he opposes it."

This week, conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh criticized the Fox ad, saying about Fox, whose head and body jerk about during the spot: "Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting." Limbaugh later apologized. Fox appears in similar spots for Democrats running in Missouri and New Jersey.

DePuyt asked Steele how he felt about Limbaugh's characterization. Steele said at first that he had not heard Limbaugh's full comments so DePuyt replayed them for the lieutenant governor. Steele then called the radio personality "more than over the line." On that count the leading Senate candidates agreed. Cardin called Limbaugh's remarks "outrageous."

Cardin and Steele butted heads when Steele brought up a planned Metro route in the Washington suburbs called the Purple line, which would link a 14-mile stretch between New Carrollton and Bethesda.

"Sir, with all due respect could you tell me where the Purple Line is planning to run,?" Steele, a Prince George's resident, asked Cardin. "Could you tell me about the plan to build out the Metro system in the metropolitan region. Where do we plan to take it?"

"I'm very familiar with the Purple Line," Cardin said before stammering and stalling and mentioning something about Chevy Chase before realizing he was under no obligation to answer to Steele.

"I'm not going to answer your question," Cardin barked.

Steele pounced. "This gentleman has no clue about metro traffic congestion in this region," Steele said, calling for Cardin's plan to deal with the issue.

The debate marked the second time the candidates have met on the same stage at the same time. They are tentatively scheduled to face off Thursday in a forum hosted by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Charles County and again Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press with Tim Russert.

Steele rushed out of the lobby of the Arlington high-rise without taking questions from reporters, saying only that the debate was "fun." Cardin told reporters that Steele's political allegiance is obvious. "He clearly aligned himself with George Bush on the war in Iraq," Cardin said.

Zeese declared himself the winner.

Cardin, Steele Face Off In Contentious Debate (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate Benjamin Cardin (D) appeared caught off guard during a freewheeling debate on News Channel 8 this afternoon when his opponent, Republican Michael S. Steele tried to quiz him on the route of the proposed Metro rail Purple Line.

After starting to hazard a guess, sputtering out "Chevy Chase," Cardin snapped, "I'm not going to answer your question," and pushed back at Steele, asking him about national health insurance.

Later, Cardin was asked repeatedly by reporters if he knew the Purple Line route and while he insisted that he did, he refused to risk an answer. "I support the Purple Line," he said, then added, "I'm not sure they've settled on specific sites."

For the record, the line is proposed to run from Bethesda to the New Carrollton Metro Station. The unanswered question, Steele said, was a pointed illustration of how little the Baltimore area congressman knows about suburban Washington issues.

"I appreciate Ben finally locating where Prince George's County is . . . and finally using the words Purple Line," Steele said.

The hour-long debate, which ranged over subjects including stem cell research to the war in Iraq to health insurance reform, at times seemed more of a shouting match. There were no rules, and through much of the sparring, Bruce DePuyt, who hosts the WJLA program "News Talk Live," sat back and let it unfold.

The debate is one of three this week that will pit Cardin against Steele and independent candidate Kevin Zeese. The campaign for Maryland's open Senate seat, which is in its final two week stretch, appears to remain a close contest, with polls showing Cardin leading Steele.

In one segment of the debate, Cardin pressed Steele on his initial support for the Iraq war.

Steele responded by calling it "heartening to see the president move to where the American people have been for some time."

"How would you have voted in Congress if you'd had the chance?" Cardin pressed, adding that he believes Steele would have supported the president.

"Do not disrespect me and tell me what I would have done at the time," Steele replied. He then acknowledged he did support going into Iraq.

DePuyt asked Steele about a recent flap over actor Michael J. Fox's appearance in a campaign ad, in which he urges people to back Cardin because of his support for embryonic stem cell research.

In the spot, Fox showed startling signs of Parkinson's disease, contorting as he spoke.

The host asked Steele what he thought of conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh's suggestion that Fox was "acting" and exaggerating the symptoms of his disease.

Steele called the talk show host's remarks "a little bit over the line," but said he really didn't hear Limbaugh's comments. DePuyt then played the remarks for viewers.

"That's a little more than over the line," Steele said.

Senate Hopefuls Squabble, Call Each Other 'Handpicked' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin yesterday wrangled over the origins of their U.S. Senate campaigns, with each accusing the other of being "handpicked" by their parties' leaders.

"The lieutenant governor was recruited by George Bush," said Mr. Cardin, a Democrat. "George Bush helped finance his campaign."

Mr. Steele, 48, said that Mr. Cardin "has been running against George Bush for a year and a half. ..."

"You talk about handpicked," Mr. Steele, a Republican, told Mr. Cardin. "You were handpicked by [House Democratic Whip] Steny Hoyer to get in this race. ..."

DOJ_NMG_0086859

"If you weren't [handpicked], Kweisi Mfume should've been sitting here," he added, referring to the past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who lost the Democratic primary to Mr. Cardin last month.

A visibly flustered Mr. Cardin said, "I won a competitive primary. ... Kweisi Mfume is supporting me."

The debate at NewsChannel 8 studios in Rosslyn, which included Green Party nominee Kevin Zeese, was the first of three between Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin that will culminate Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The war in Iraq, embryonic stem-cell research and mass transit were other dominant issues in the debate.

When pressed, Mr. Steele said that U.S. forces should have invaded Iraq in 2003 "to deal with the terrorist threat."

Mr. Cardin, 63, voted against sending troops to Iraq, but Mr. Zeese attacked Mr. Cardin for voting several times to finance the war.

"After your first vote, you have been wrong, wrong, wrong," Mr. Zeese said.

Mr. Cardin also appeared unaware of exactly where Metro plans to begin and end the Purple Line, which Mr. Steele used to portray him as out of touch.

Mr. Steele reiterated his support for stem-cell research using adult stem cells and his opposition to embryonic research, which he considers abortion. Mr. Cardin said he supports embryonic research.

After the debate, Mr. Cardin complained that the open format allowed too many interruptions.

At one point, Mr. Steele, sitting next to Mr. Cardin, said the 10-term congressman had failed as a leader. "For 20 years, sir, you have sat in the [congressional] seat and wasted the opportunity to lead," he said.

Mr. Steele, who is black, is hoping for support from black voters, especially in Prince George's County and Baltimore.

Though Mr. Cardin, who is white, won the overall primary, Mr. Mfume bested him in those two jurisdictions. According to the State Board of Elections, Mr. Mfume won 74,637 votes, and Mr. Cardin 19,824 in Prince George's County. In Baltimore, Mr. Mfume won 52,335 votes and Mr. Cardin 25,051.

Since then, Mr. Mfume has made only one appearance in support of Mr. Cardin, during which he noted the lack of diversity in the Maryland Democratic ticket.

During the primary season, Mr. Mfume accused Mr. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., both of whom are white, of trying to force him out of the contest.

The Senate nominees are scheduled to debate today in Charles County, where five white men in 2004 set fire to more than two dozen homes owned mostly by black families in the state's biggest residential arson case.

"I specifically asked for [the debate] to be there," Mr. Steele told reporters and editors at The Washington Times on Monday.

Meanwhile, two polls yesterday provided different pictures of the race.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee released a poll showing the race to be a dead heat. Mr. Cardin had 41.3 percent of the vote, and Mr. Steele 38.7 percent.

The poll of 602 likely voters was conducted by Houston-based Voter Consumer Research and has a margin of error of 3.9 percentage points.

A poll by the District-based Garin-Hart-Yang Research Group showed Mr. Cardin with 52 percent of the vote and Mr. Steele with 40 percent.

Iraq, Stem Cell Research Topics At Second Senate Debate (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. -- Maryland's Senate candidates debated for a second time Wednesday afternoon, and the war in Iraq and stem cell research were the main topics of conversation.

Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin said he supported embryonic stem cell research. His campaign has put out a televised endorsement from actor Michael J. Fox on the matter.

Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele said he did not approve of destroying embryos in the name of research. But, he added that he thinks the government should fund other types of stem cell research.

The candidates sparred on Iraq as well.

Steele at first said he "applauded" Cardin for voting against the war. When the moderator expressed surprise, Steele then said it was "wrong-headed."

The Republican said he would have voted for the war initially but called for a new approach to the conflict now.

The debate also included third-party candidate Kevin Zeese, who said both Steele and Cardin cannot be independent senators because they've taken contributions from business interests.

The debate will be replayed statewide Wednesday night on public television.

The candidates will also debate Thursday in Charles County and Sunday on NBC's "Meet The Press."

Black Democrats Pull Punches In Maryland Race (WT)

By Brian Debose And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Local black Democratic leaders will not attack Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in his U.S. Senate race, even as they campaign and appear in ads for his opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a fellow Democrat.

"I think that is a tactical decision," said Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative. "If [Mr. Steele] has a large or fairly large black vote, why or how could you alienate that vote by going after him doing personal attacks? There is just no way."

Former Prince George's County Executive Wayne K. Curry, who has not yet endorsed anyone in the Senate race, said it is wise for black politicians to avoid criticizing Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland.

"Obviously, that would make good sense because Michael is not disdained among African-Americans," said Mr. Curry, who has attended a campaign event for Mr. Steele but not for Mr. Cardin.

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings supported Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in the Democratic primary for the Senate. He said there is no need to pillory Mr. Steele because his positions on various issues are unappealing among most black voters.

"I don't think you have to attack Steele," said Mr. Cummings, of Baltimore. "All you have to do is ask him where he is on issues like the Iraq war, universal health care, stem-cell research, college-tuition assistance, and who are going to be our judges, and on President Bush's policies."

Race has been prominent in the Maryland Senate contest, as Democrats have tried to blunt Mr. Steele's appeal among blacks, their most loyal -- and, some say, neglected -- voting bloc.

Early in the campaign season, pollster Cornell Belcher identified an "emerging black swing vote" and advised Democrats in a memo to portray Mr. Steele as a "typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

A key battleground in the Maryland Senate race will be Prince George's County, which has the highest concentration of blacks and registered Democrats in the state.

At The Washington Times on Monday, Mr. Steele -- who was raised in Petworth -- said that he supports full congressional voting rights for the District.

Mrs. Norton, who is working with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, on a bill that would give the District a vote in the House, noted the significance of Mr. Steele's support for the effort.

"We gave Maryland its black middle class, and they completely and totally identify with and understand that D.C. has no voting rights," she said, "and so what Steele has done is identify himself with a traditional African-American political issue."

But Mr. Curry said that Mr. Steele's commercials have not addressed black voters' concerns on issues such as education and that the lieutenant governor still has some work to do to "galvanize" black voters.

"For one, he's got to prove to people he wouldn't be another Clarence Thomas," Mr. Curry said, referring to the U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Meanwhile, black Democratic leaders' support for Mr. Cardin has appeared muted, at best.

Mr. Mfume, whom Mr. Cardin defeated in last month's primary, has made only one appearance in support of the nominee, during which he noted the lack of diversity in the state party's ticket by saying it "looks like the Democratic ticket for state office in 1956."

He has since been out of sight and contact, but his son, Michael, has endorsed Mr. Steele.

Mrs. Norton said that she has not been contacted to record an ad for Mr. Cardin but added that she hopes someone from the region has, "because many of his people are our people."

Rep. Albert R. Wynn of Prince George's County said he recorded a radio ad weeks ago for Mr. Cardin but was not sure when it would run.

Mr. Cardin yesterday said he was not aware of the Wynn ad.

Allen, Webb Stake Out Positions On 'No Child' (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

In a state skeptical of federal intrusion in local school affairs, Virginia Sen. George Allen and challenger James Webb each say they support the goals of No Child Left Behind but quarrel with how the federal law has played out.

DOJ_NMG_0086861

The Democratic challenger says schools need more federal funding to fulfill mandates to test students and narrow achievement gaps. The Republican incumbent, who voted for the landmark legislation five years ago, now argues that states need more flexibility in how they grade schools. But neither candidate supports an outright repeal of the law.

Whoever wins Nov. 7 will have a vote when Congress debates whether to renew the controversial law, which aims to push students in a range of grades to attain near-universal proficiency in reading and math by 2014. The law requires testing for all students from grades 3 through 8 and once during high school, and it requires schools to show that students in racial, ethnic and other groups are making adequate progress. Schools that fall short can face sanctions up to the threat of state intervention.

As Virginia governor in the mid-1990s, Allen was chief architect of the school accountability program that measures progress using the Standards of Learning tests. Since voting for No Child Left Behind, he has become critical of the federal initiative. State officials in that time have also complained about aspects of the law.

In a speech at Patrick Henry College in Purcellville this month, Allen told students that the federal law is "forcing Virginia schools to dumb down our curriculum." He later said that whereas the federal law focuses on reading and math, Virginia's testing system is "more comprehensive" and includes science and social studies.

Allen has proposed to amend the law by allowing states that have accountability programs to be granted waivers from certain federal requirements. His bill also would require states to expand testing to include U.S. history and civics.

In an interview this month with Washington Post reporters and editors, Webb said that the "intentions" of the No Child law are good but that Washington has not provided enough money. Congressional Democrats charge that the Bush administration and Republican-led Congress have delivered tens of billions of dollars less than the law authorized in education aid.

"You have federal requirements that are being put into place without the full amount of funding so that local jurisdictions are having to make up the difference, which is taking money away from other things they could be doing," Webb said. He also said the law places too much focus on teaching "toward standards" instead of teaching students to "think and adapt."

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for Webb, said he hasn't decided whether he would vote to renew the law. "In terms of a vote for reauthorization," she said, "he's going to have to take a look at it and make sure the funds are dedicated."

The law has popped up as a campaign issue in various states. In Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate, alluded to No Child Left Behind in a television advertisement that said his party "built a system that teaches to a test." Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Steele's Democratic opponent, voted for the law in the House in 2001 but now -- like Webb -- says it has been underfunded.

Analysts said education does not appear to be a driving issue in a Virginia Senate race dominated by debate over taxes, the war in Iraq and questions of character.

"The differences between the candidates appear quite subtle to most voters and not substantial enough to make any real difference except perhaps with a small number of committed educational professionals," said Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University.

"It's the lost issue in this campaign," said Robert D. Holsworth, a political scientist at Virginia Commonwealth University.

On his campaign Web site, Webb, a former Navy secretary, devotes 11 paragraphs to the Iraq war and two to education.

In a recent TV ad, Allen's wife, Susan, said the senator is a "father first" and has worked "hard to raise academic standards." But the spot did not mention his concerns about the law.

Holsworth said he was surprised that Allen hasn't used his critique of the law to demonstrate independence from President Bush.

"It's an area where he can easily deflect the argument that he's attached at the hip to the president," Holsworth said.

The candidates are split on another educational controversy: school vouchers. Webb's spokeswoman said the Democrat opposes public funding to help pay private school tuition -- a position that helped him win the endorsement of the Virginia Education Association, a teachers union that is an affiliate of the National Education Association. Allen voted in 2004 for a spending bill that launched an experimental voucher program in the District. "There should not be a federal prohibition" on vouchers, he said.

On higher education, Webb's spokeswoman said one of his priorities would be to help U.S. troops involved in fighting terrorism attend college after leaving the military. Denny Todd said Webb envisions a plan modeled after the post-World War II G.I. Bill. She said Webb would seek government funding for tuition and other expenses.

Allen, who often talks about the need for more engineers and scientists, has touted his support of proposals to provide $250 million in technology grants for historically black colleges, tribal colleges and other institutions that serve minority students.

Allen, Webb Tour Va.; Wilder Backs Webb (WP)

By Tim Craig And Lisa Rein

DOJ_NMG_0086862

Democratic U.S. Senate candidate James Webb campaigned yesterday in Northern Virginia with the state's current governor at his side, and hours later he picked up a key endorsement from a former governor in Richmond.

Webb, joined by Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), appealed to retirees and students at stops in Fairfax and Prince William counties before heading to Richmond to appear with former Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, now the mayor of Richmond and a popular figure among African American voters.

Webb's opponent, incumbent Sen. George Allen (R), stumped through southwestern Virginia yesterday with Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R), the majority whip. The Allen campaign also released a radio commercial featuring Allen's most prominent black supporter, state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond).

Allen and Webb had courted Wilder for his support. Wilder, a Democrat, is independent-minded and likes to build suspense for his endorsements by waiting until late in a campaign to announce his choices. His support isn't always guaranteed; in 1997, he declined to endorse Democrat Donald S. Beyer Jr. for governor.

Two years ago, he stood with Allen to condemn then-Gov. Mark R. Warner's proposed tax increases and urged the Democratic governor to put the idea to a vote of the people. Later that year, Wilder was the keynote speaker at a retreat for the state GOP.

But yesterday, he said voters should choose Webb to send the message that they are opposed to the war in Iraq and Republican economic policies. He said he would do all he could, including campaign events and TV ads, to support Webb.

"I think the time is now to take the action necessary to help turn around the ill-fated direction the country has taken," said Wilder, who was governor from 1990 to 1994. "For that reason, I will support an individual who served in combat for his nation . . . and will fight to represent the needs of the common man . . . to put this country back on course."

Allen and Webb have been vying for votes from African Americans in a campaign marred by accusations of racism. Allen has been dogged by questions about his racial sensitivity, and Webb has been put on the defensive over a magazine article he wrote in 1979 opposing women in combat, which some have said was demeaning to women.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which is spending millions to bolster Webb, has been running radio ads on black stations highlighting Allen's fondness as a young man for Confederate heritage and allegations that he used racial slurs in college. The Allen campaign and the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee responded yesterday with Lambert's ad, which will air on several African American radio stations.

Lambert urges listeners to discount charges about Allen's past and focus on his support for historically black colleges, black farmers and the Voting Rights Act.

"I have fought racism all my life, and I've learned to judge people by what they do now, not what they have done 30 years ago," Lambert said.

McConnell, in an interview, said that Virginians would see a large tax increase if Webb is elected, referring to past statements by Webb that he would let some of President Bush's tax cuts expire. "You cannot let the tax cuts expire without having a rather large increase," McConnell said.

But Wilder said yesterday that Bush's economic policies have benefited the rich while doing little for the poor and middle class.

"We need someone who will look out for individuals in all walks of life," Wilder said.

Wilder said he considers Allen a "close friend" but cannot support him because he is a reliable vote for GOP leaders in Congress. Wilder called Allen yesterday morning.

"I said to Senator Allen, I do not want to see two more years of absolute control by Republicans owning both houses [of Congress], because it will send the wrong message to the president that he is doing right, and what he is doing, in my judgment, is wrong," Wilder said.

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, said that the senator understood.

"I don't think it is a big surprise that the Democratic mayor of Richmond would endorse the Democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate," Wadhams said. "But Senator Allen still respects Mayor Wilder and looks forward to working with him on issues as he had in the past."

Kaine and Warner have also cleared their schedules for the race's closing days to stump for Webb.

"This is a person who probably never thought about running for political office," Kaine told about 100 senior citizens gathered yesterday at the Fairfax, a community for retired military officers near Fort Belvoir. "But the times compelled him to step forward."

The retirees at the Fairfax were a mix of Democrats and Republicans, but they spoke Webb's language. The former Marine who led a platoon in Vietnam and was Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan was introduced as "Mr. Secretary." When Webb said he had lived in "33 different houses" by the time he graduated from high school, many nodded.

Virginia Mayor Endorses Senator's Opponent (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Oct. 25 (AP) — Mayor L. Douglas Wilder on Wednesday endorsed Jim Webb and his challenge of Senator George Allen.

Mr. Wilder, the Virginia governor from 1990 to 1994, promised to help Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with voter turnout in the weeks leading to the Nov. 7 election. He said Mr. Webb could beat Mr. Allen, a Republican, if he got a large voter turnout in Hampton Roads and Richmond.

"Those are the battlegrounds," Mr. Wilder said. "A lot will depend on the turnout in those areas."

Mr. Allen's campaign has been plagued by controversy. He has been accused of using racially insensitive language and has appeared to bristle at the recent revelation that his mother was born Jewish.

Mr. Webb said he had sought Mr. Wilder's counsel in the campaign. "There is no living American who understands the demographics of Virginia like Douglas Wilder," he said.

Mr. Wilder, who remains the nation's first and only elected black governor, said he was angry at the way President Bush had handled the Iraq war. "I think the Iraq war has been wrong from the beginning," Mr. Wilder said. "We've been in this terrible quagmire for four years. The American people have been sold a bill of goods."

Mr. Wilder remains an influential figure among Virginia's minority voters. In 2004, he was elected mayor with 80 percent of the vote in the majority black capital city.

Denise Elder, a Richmond resident, said she thought Mr. Allen's "macaca" comment, an obscure racial slur directed toward a Webb volunteer of Indian descent at a campaign rally in August, would have more of an impact on minority voters than Mr. Wilder's endorsement.

"With the name-calling, people were already ready to vote" against Mr. Allen, Ms. Elder said.

Though a Democrat, Mr. Wilder has an unpredictable, often conservative streak that means Democrats can never take his backing for granted.

Wilder Backs Webb In Race (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, a former governor whose endorsement has had significant impact in several elections, yesterday said fellow Democrat James H. Webb Jr. is the best choice for Virginians because he is independent-minded and will fight for "the common man."

"I think Jim Webb is the right man for Virginia at this time. I think he can win and will win," said Mr. Wilder, who became the nation's first black governor in 1990.

Mr. Wilder's endorsement comes at a crucial time for Mr. Webb, with most polls showing that he still trails Sen. George Allen, a Republican. A Mason-Dixon poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Allen pulling away from Mr. Webb after a previous poll had shown them in a dead heat.

Mr. Wilder said he is endorsing Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, because he will fight against the "pattern of inefficiency, ineptitude and scandal" in the Republican-controlled Congress.

"The direction of the war is wrong, the direction of the economy is wrong, the divide is too deep between the haves and have-nots," Mr. Wilder told reporters in Richmond yesterday. "We need to reinvest our resources in the American people, and I think this is the man to do it."

Mr. Webb said that Mr. Wilder, a grandson of slaves, is "a historical figure in our country for his own professional journey," including his service as a soldier in the Korean War.

"This endorsement is much more than an endorsement directed at the African-American community," said Mr. Webb, a former Republican. "This is an individual who has tremendous respect all across the different ethnic and regional groups in Virginia. It's a very important endorsement for me."

The Allen campaign said the endorsement was no surprise. They noted their radio ad featuring state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a black Richmond Democrat who has endorsed Mr. Allen. In the ad, Mr. Lambert notes Mr. Allen's support for black farmers and the Voting Rights Act.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams brushed aside the relevance of the Wilder endorsement. He said it came "apparently reluctantly" since the mayor waited until the final 13 days of the campaign.

"Mayor Wilder is a Democrat, and it would be expected that he would support the Democratic nominee for Senate," Mr. Wadhams said.

Mr. Wilder is well-known for withholding his endorsement for the final weeks of a race, elevating its importance.

Last fall, Mr. Wilder endorsed Timothy M. Kaine less than a week before the Democrat won the governor's race.

"It's huge," Mr. Kaine said yesterday of the endorsement. "He is a person who retains a high degree of popularity, and Virginians have great affection for him. ... It's a boost."

Mr. Wilder has not always supported his party's nominee or elected leader. In 2004, he criticized Gov. Mark Warner for proposing a tax increase. Mr. Wilder had said he never would have endorsed Mr. Warner had he known the Democrat would raise taxes.

Last fall, Mr. Wilder declined to make an endorsement in the attorney general's race, which Democratic state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds, after a recount, lost by a scant 323 votes.

Black voters could be key on Nov. 7. Twenty percent of Virginia's population is black, a 2004 census shows.

Mr. Allen won 20 percent of the black vote when elected in 1993 to succeed Mr. Wilder as governor, and 17 percent in his 2000 race when he unseated Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb, whom Mr. Wilder endorsed.

This time, Mr. Allen has been dogged by accusations of racism since he was taped calling an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca" at a campaign stop in August.

Some former University of Virginia classmates claimed they recalled Mr. Allen frequently using the "N-word." Mr. Allen denies the racial slur was ever part of his vocabulary.

Mr. Allen, who has been scrutinized for years for his past affection for the Confederate battle flag and for once displaying a hangman's noose in his law office, has been endorsed by several black pastors and by a black Richmond newspaper.

Mr. Webb also has faced criticism over comments he made that affirmative action should be scaled back for just blacks or opened up to poor whites. He has since tempered his comments and recently received the endorsement of the state's Legislative Black Caucus.

Mr. Wilder said both men should be judged on where they stand on the issues and who they are today. "Many of us evolve," he said.

Also yesterday, the Webb campaign said actor Michael J. Fox will appear with the Democrat Nov. 2 in Arlington. Mr. Fox, who is afflicted with Parkinson's disease, has supported Democrats who favor embryonic stem-cell research.

An Ascent Shadowed By Questions On Race (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

In February 2004, Sen. George Allen was on a bus taking him from Birmingham to Selma, Ala. On a video screen in front of him was "Eyes on the Prize," the acclaimed documentary chronicling the civil rights movement.

Allen "knew very little" about the history of that struggle, according to his seatmate, Paul Gillis, former president of the Virginia NAACP. But Gillis, once a bitter critic and now one of his few prominent black supporters, was impressed with Allen's willingness to take a three-day pilgrimage, sponsored by the nonpartisan Faith & Politics Institute, to visit the battlegrounds of that era and listen to the testimony of those who spilled their blood.

It was many miles from the sun-splashed Los Angeles suburbs, where some classmates at Palos Verdes High School recall a lone tobacco-chewing teenage cowboy who was disliked, even feared.

"George was not what I would call mainstream," said Don Gause, a wide receiver who caught Allen's passes for the Sea Kings. One reason, Gause said, was that Allen used anti-black epithets and "ran with a group of guys off the football field" who used the same language.

"George took some hard lines in that area," said Gause, a real estate executive in Orange County, Calif. His sense, though, was that it was more for attention than out of any racial animus.

"He was immature, like most of us," Gause said. "He was looking for who he was."

Who George Allen was, and who he is today after 23 years in politics, remains an issue as the Virginia Republican seeks reelection. Supporters say the pilgrimage was one leg of a journey that has led to genuine maturation for Allen, 54, whose style melds Ronald Reagan's optimism with George W. Bush's Texas swagger.

Popular as a governor and a senator, with a genial presence on the campaign trail, Allen has considered running for president. But a series of events have revived lingering questions about his attitudes on race and have helped turn what was expected to be an easy path to reelection into a fight for his political career.

At an August rally in southwest Virginia, Allen interrupted a routine stump speech and pointed to a man of Indian descent who was videotaping the event for his Democratic opponent, James Webb, and called the aide "macaca," a genus of monkey.

Some of Allen's former football teammates at the University of Virginia came forward later to say that he routinely used racist language. Asked at a debate last month about reports of his Jewish roots, he denounced the accounts as "aspersions" before confirming them a day later.

The episodes unraveled an effort by Allen to mend a reputation for racial insensitivity that has pursued him through his steady rise from Palos Verdes to college athlete, lawyer, state legislator, governor and, in 2000, U.S. senator. Allen has, for example, had to explain his fondness for the Confederate flag and the presence of a hangman's noose in his Charlottesville law office.

In his first Senate term, he has taken three civil rights pilgrimages, co-sponsored a resolution apologizing to lynching victims and their descendants, and proposed allocating a half-billion dollars to historically black colleges.

But "macaca" raises a question: Has Allen really evolved, or did his true nature slip into public view?

Allen, who denies using racist language, declined requests for an interview, asking instead for written questions. By yesterday, his campaign had not provided answers.

Those closest to him say that Allen is no bigot and that partisan enemies have seized on murky 30-year-old anecdotes and meaningless lapses in political correctness to damage him.

"Politics has become more of a contact sport than football," said Allen's brother Bruce, general manager of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. "I know the person. I know the man."

Others from Allen's past said they saw a distressingly familiar, coldly taunting hatred when they viewed the macaca tape.

"So let's give a welcome to macaca here," Allen said, pointing a finger. "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia." Allen later said he didn't know what the word meant and apologized to the Webb volunteer, S.R. Sidarth.

"I saw how he looked, that attitude of condescension and superiority," said Ed Sabornie, a former Virginia player and now a professor of special education at North Carolina State University.

"That rang a bell for me."'Greasers, Surfers, Crew-Cutters'

There was darkness on the edges of the world of privilege and glamour in which Allen grew up.

His father, George Allen, was the milk-chugging NFL Hall of Famer who took the Washington Redskins to their first Super Bowl in 1973. He compiled a 116-47-5 record over 12 seasons as a coach with the Los Angeles Rams and the Redskins but made room for little else in his life.

"If a man is going to succeed in anything, he must neglect everything else, whether it is his wife, his children or himself," he told an interviewer in 1970.

Even when he took his sons to the Rams' summer training camp, they spent most of their time with Allen's assistants and friendly players such as Deacon Jones, said Gause, who accompanied the younger Allen one year.

When the coach was at their Mediterranean-style home on a cul-de-sac with jaw-dropping views of the Pacific Ocean, the family's spirits rose and fell with the fortunes of the team.

After a painful 1968 loss, George and his brother Gregory elected to go home with neighbors rather than face their father's black mood. In her vivid family memoir, "Fifth Quarter," his sister Jennifer Allen described violence at home, including her father breaking Gregory's nose in a fight at the dinner table after a 1969 playoff loss.

Neither Jennifer nor Gregory Allen responded to requests for interviews. Bruce Allen, who said he doesn't remember the incident, said his sister's book was written "from a little girl's eyes" and should not be taken literally.

Allen's mother, Henrietta, known as Etty, is a gracious woman with a bitter and sometimes fiercely vindictive side, especially when it comes to protecting her husband's reputation. She effectively raised the Allen children on her own.

"Etty ran the show," said Melvin Durslag, a columnist for the now-defunct Los Angeles Herald Examiner and a longtime family friend.

She also carried the pain of her own turbulent childhood. Born in Tunis to French-Jewish parents, Etty Lumbroso endured the 1942-43 Nazi occupation and Allied bombing that destroyed her home. She watched her father, Felix, a wine importer, taken to a labor camp by the Germans. She met Allen in 1950 while visiting friends in Sioux City, Iowa, where he was coaching at Morningside College. They married a year later.

On summer evenings when the coach and the boys were at training camp, Jennifer Allen wrote, Etty would sip wine and lament the death in a motorcycle accident of a French fiancÃ© she called "the love of my life."

Etty told The Washington Post last month that her husband, who died in 1990, asked her to conceal her Jewish identity from his family and that she and Allen wanted to protect their children from the fear she experienced during the war. It remained a secret between her and her husband, she said, until a dinner conversation with George in August.

There was a price to pay for the long years of keeping the secret. Her daughter hints at the private pain in the form of boxes from Tunis and France, stacked in the garage in Palos Verdes. Etty told Jennifer she would never unpack them. Jennifer wrote that she always looked at her mother's life before she met her father as "an unopened box."

Young George and his two brothers filled the gaps at home with friends Jennifer described as "greasers, surfers, crew-cutters" who were "toughs."

"My brothers led each pack," she said. As the oldest, George was sometimes the enforcer. When Jennifer refused to go to bed, he dragged her upstairs by her hair.

One of Allen's friends, Deke Applegate, said Allen's crowd was rough-and-tumble but disputes Gause's recollection of racism. "That's not the guy I hung out with," said Applegate, a Las Vegas businessman.

Allen and Applegate did share an affinity for the Confederate flag. Yearbook pictures show them with pins on their collars. Applegate said it was a "symbol of rebellion against the establishment," nothing more.

Others say Allen acted out at school. Tim Good, a classmate, said he had to confront the 6-foot-plus Allen after his younger brother reported that Allen had stolen his bicycle.

"George Allen was a big bully," said Good, now an accountant in Torrance, Calif. Allen denied stealing the bike, but Good said it reappeared at school the next day.

One morning, students arrived to see workers removing graffiti spray-painted on an outside wall. It was the day of a basketball game with the lone majority-black school in Palos Verdes's athletic conference, Morningside High in Inglewood.

The graffiti included the phrase "Kill Whitey," said Good, who added that former students have said that Allen was responsible. In a 2000 interview with The Post, Allen said there was an incident at school but declined to discuss the details. "I did something wrong when I was young that I regret," he said.

After a year at the University of California at Los Angeles, Allen followed his family east in 1971, when his father was named coach of the Redskins. His football teammates at the University of Virginia said they found some of the same racial insensitivity.

"People gave him a wide berth," said Ken Shelton, one of three former Cavaliers who told Salon magazine in September that Allen regularly used racial slurs for blacks.

Shelton, a North Carolina radiologist, said in an interview that in Newcomb Hall, the student center, Allen would spit tobacco juice "anywhere -- on the walls, on the floors, in the elevators" and habitually shouldered people aside as he walked by.

Change was beginning to stir in Charlottesville, long a clubby redoubt for the sons of Virginia's white establishment. Blacks and women had started to shake up the campus culture. The football team included the first four African Americans to receive full athletic scholarships.

It was a challenging environment for the athletes. Harrison Davis, the Cavaliers' first black starter at quarterback, who regularly received hate mail, said he never heard Allen use racial slurs. Nor did Stanley Land, a defensive tackle. But Land, a Houston chemical executive, said he was offended by the Confederate flags he saw in Allen's van and his campus apartment, especially when some of his teammates were under such pressure.

"To me, that showed a lack of real respect for his African American teammates," Land said.

'Not the Man He Once Was'

In 1979, Roy Parks's land-use and design firm in Charlottesville needed more room. He spoke to George Allen about renting space in the building he owned on Market Street, where he'd set up his law practice. As the negotiations came to naught, Parks said, their conversations drifted to politics.

Allen, getting ready to make his first run for the state legislature, allowed that he had supported a Democrat, Edward Lane, for state attorney general in 1977. Lane had been a segregationist in the 1950s, an architect of Virginia's "massive resistance" movement in which communities closed schools rather than comply with court orders to integrate. He lost to Republican J. Marshall Coleman.

"When I questioned George further, he said that Lane, like him, was an advocate for states' rights and was only a man of his time," said Parks, who was stunned by Allen's admission.

Lane, now 82 and ill with Parkinson's disease, was unable to comment. His wife, Jean, said she has no memory of Allen's support.

As a state legislator in 1984, Allen was one of 27 members of the House of Delegates to oppose a holiday honoring Martin Luther King Jr. During his 1993 gubernatorial campaign, he acknowledged displaying the Confederate flag in his living room, calling it part of a flag collection. A hangman's noose, which he said was part of a Western memorabilia collection, hung in his law office.

As governor, Allen appointed one black cabinet member, Kay Coles James, as secretary of health and human resources, and a Latino, Transportation Secretary Robert E. Martinez. Midway through his term, the number of African Americans in senior posts had declined by half from the tenure of L. Douglas Wilder, the state's first black governor, according to an audit by a state watchdog agency. For three years, he incensed black leaders with an annual Confederate History Month proclamation that failed to mention slavery.

Allen had an active term as governor. He abolished the state's parole system, replacing it with a "truth in sentencing" law that requires those convicted of crimes to serve the bulk of their sentence. He pushed through changes in welfare and education policy and signed a measure requiring parental notification for minors seeking abortions.

As he launched his 2000 Senate campaign, Allen began some attempts to mend racial fences. He backed Gov. James S. Gilmore's proposal for an MLK holiday in Virginia. After defeating Charles S. Robb, his first floor speech was in support of the appointment of Richmond lawyer Roger Gregory, an African American, to the 4th Circuit federal appeals court. Then came the 2004 pilgrimage, the first of three that he took.

"None of us can presume to know what the motivation is" for Allen's civil rights trips, said the Rev. Douglas Tanner, who recently retired as president and chief executive of the Faith & Politics Institute. "For someone in politics, it's always likely to be a mixture of genuine interest and whatever the political advantage is."

Gillis, who has supported other Republicans, said that he doesn't know whether Allen used racist language but that, in the end, it's not that important. "I've had white friends who've used those words in the heat of passion," he said. "It's a time past. He's not the man he once was."

Allen remains an opponent of affirmative action. In 2005, the NAACP said he supported legislation deemed to be in its interest 15 percent of the time.

More often, his advocacy is in initiatives such as his co-sponsorship of the resolution apologizing to lynching victims and their descendants. In other areas, he has co-authored legislation blocking federal taxes on Internet access and online sales. He also collaborated on the National Nanotechnology Initiative, which invests $3.7 billion in research.

His appearances before black audiences are a delicate dance. At the NAACP state conference in Hampton on Friday night, he got no questions about "macaca" or other recent revelations.

When the moderator presented Allen with an application for a lifetime membership, he happily took the opportunity for a positive gesture.

Later, answering a question about racial profiling, Allen explained that he opposed the practice. When someone in the audience said "Amen," Allen was briefly startled.

"Did I say that right?" he asked.

GOP Sees Hope In Michigan Race (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

Republicans are turning to Michigan in the final days of the campaign in search of a major upset that would protect their majority in the U.S. Senate.

Mike Bouchard, the popular Republican sheriff of Michigan's second-largest county, trails Democratic incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow. But recent polls suggest that Mr. Bouchard may be closing the gap, with two surveys indicating a single-digit difference.

"In many of our states, we're battling a national climate that is quite difficult," Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), said yesterday. "The climate in Michigan makes it an opportunity unlike any other state in the country."

Across the country, polls show a deep anti-incumbent resentment among voters exhausted from six years of Republican dominance in Washington and tired of the war in Iraq.

In Michigan, voters are more concerned about finding jobs. The economy there, inexorably linked to the ailing auto industry, is sputtering with an unemployment rate of nearly twice the national average. And it's Democrats who hold the governor's mansion and both Senate seats.

That's not to say Mr. Bouchard has an easy task ahead of him. While two polls show him trailing by seven points or less, others show the gap as much as 18 percent.

But this year, that's enough for hope among Republicans in this state. Many view Mrs. Stabenow as vulnerable and are pleased with Mr. Bouchard's campaign.

Republican heavy-hitters, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney have been to the state to campaign for Mr. Bouchard. President Bush travels there today.

The Bouchard campaign also has been the beneficiary of a national fundraising effort. The NRSC spent $1 million on the campaign's behalf, one of only three states where the national Republicans have gone on the offense. Also, members of the conservative group Club for Growth donated more than $250,000.

All this national attention cuts both ways, said Stabenow spokesman Brett Colburn, referring to Mr. Bush's visit today.

"Asking George Bush to campaign for you right now is like asking the captain of the Titanic to take your boat out for a spin," he said. "If the Republicans actually think Michigan is one of their best bets for a win in the Senate, they really are headed for an ugly Election Day."

Despite Mr. Bush's low poll numbers, Bouchard campaign spokesman David All said the campaign welcomes the national attention and Mr. Bush's visit, especially because it's slated for just hours after the president signs a bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"As a 20-year lawman, Sheriff Bouchard is pleased to see a measure signed into law, which will help secure the border," Mr. All said.

Races In Mich. Explore Economy's Electoral Impact (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 26, 2006

SOUTH LYON, Mich. — Tanya Nevitt sits in the back of the Java House Café as Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos makes his standard pitch for change. She doesn't need much convincing.

"It's been a rough few years," says Nevitt, 32, the mother of three young children. She now buys their clothes at Target and Wal-Mart rather than The Gap. "Regardless of who is in charge right now, I am prone to vote for a challenger."

A few miles away in Novi, just outside Detroit, a group of women facing the same economic malaise sit around a table at the Picasso Café with Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm. They don't blame her for the state's 7.1% jobless rate. It's more the fault of President Bush and Republican policies in Washington, they say.

"I don't believe in tax cut, tax cut, tax cut, tax cut," says Gwen Markham, 53, a piano teacher. "I have a 19-year-old and a 15-year-old who are going to pay for that."

In an election dominated by the war in Iraq, the impact of an economy recovering from recession is less clear. Democrats note that wages have not kept up with some prices, particularly for health care and college tuition. That, they say, should help their party. Others cite three years of job creation, a 4.6% national unemployment rate, declining gas prices and high stock prices as evidence the country is on the right course — a plus for Republicans.

President Bush, who arrives in the Detroit suburbs today to raise money for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, has spent much of the week highlighting the economy as a strong point for Republican candidates. Beyond the war on terrorism, he said Wednesday, the key issue in next month's elections should be "Who best to keep taxes low?" He said Tuesday in Sarasota, Fla., that Democrats "are genetically disposed to raise your taxes."

Yet even if the economy works to the benefit of Republicans, it may not do so in Michigan. Granholm is struggling with a difficult state economy — only Mississippi, wracked by Hurricane Katrina, has a higher jobless rate (7.2%) — but she is leading narrowly in recent polls, and incumbent Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow enjoys a bigger lead over Bouchard.

"It's not the unemployment rate," Granholm says. "It's the fact that people's personal income has dropped. We're seeing it play out here in spades."

Both parties in Washington believe the economy will help them at the polls Nov. 7.

Americans, Democrats say, can't pay for college tuition or health insurance, much less save enough for retirement. "Most Americans have been treading water economically," says Rep. Sandy Levin, D-Mich., whose district Bush visits today.

Unions and others aligned with Democrats have been seeking to highlight that. Communities United to Strengthen America, an outgrowth of the labor movement, has reached out to 800,000 households in 11 congressional districts from Connecticut to Colorado that Democrats hope to capture next month. "People are still faced with stagnating wages and rising living costs," spokesman Harrison Schmitt says.

That's not the economy that White House budget director Rob Portman sees when he travels on behalf of GOP candidates, even in his native Ohio and the struggling Midwest. "There's a lot of good news out there," Portman says. The question for voters, he says, is "do you want to put this at risk by increasing taxes at this time?"

David Littmann, senior economist at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Michigan, says all the economic signs are positive for Republicans. Wages are outpacing inflation; interest rates remain low; the federal deficit is declining.

"There's a lot of fiction out there," he says. "The majority are much better off than they were two to three years ago."

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken last weekend shows 44% of Americans rate the economy good or excellent, the highest percentage since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in 2001. Fifty-five percent rate it fair or poor.

DeVos calls attention to the economy wherever he goes. The Amway heir, who has pumped $14 million of his own money into the governor's race, is spending the last two weeks in a customized bus emblazoned with phrases such as "Michigan is the ONLY state losing jobs" and "Personal bankruptcy rates are at an all-time high." He campaigns as an economic Mr. Fix-It. "I'm not a talker," he says. "I'm just a doer."

Granholm has maintained a slight lead in polls by campaigning at a frenetic pace, often in a GM Suburban dressed up like an ear of corn and powered by ethanol. Pelted with questions on the economy, health care, education and other pocketbook concerns, she ticks off a list of initiatives designed to diversify the state's auto-dominated economy.

With a Republican president and a Democratic governor, residents of the hard-hit state have a choice of whom to blame. Some, such as Al Rasegan, 64, a General Motors retiree, say it's not Bush's fault. Without the tax cuts, he says, things would have been worse. "I think Bush ought to get credit for turning the economy around," he says.

Others say that while Granholm remains under fire here, Republicans who have controlled Washington for longer than she's been in Lansing are equally at fault.

"There's a sense of disappointment with both the White House and Congress," says Rich Studley, executive vice president of the Michigan Chamber of Commerce. "Conservatives in Congress are as much a part of the problem as anyone else."

For many, the problem isn't with Democrats or Republicans but their refusal to work together.

"I think there needs to be more cooperation," says Ottilie Nott, 88, of Walled Lake, wearing a Detroit Tigers pennant fever T-shirt at her Milford senior center. "They need to work better together."

Michigan's Messy DeVos (WSJ)

By Shikha Dalmia

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

DETROIT -- Besides the Tigers, the main thing on the minds of Michigan residents is the state's tanking economy. So when the state's most prominent Republican businessman entered the gubernatorial fray promising to turn things around, it should have been a home run. Instead, 10 days before the election, Dick DeVos has lost his 15-point summer lead over Jennifer Granholm, the Democratic incumbent, and is now trailing by more than eight points in most polls. The fault is not in his stars but in himself: At a time when Michigan needs economic leadership, he has so far shown little charisma, creativity -- or courage of convictions.

That Michigan has become the Mississippi of the Midwest is no secret (actually, Mississippi is doing better than Michigan right now). While the rest of the country is experiencing real overall growth of 3.2%, Michigan is in a single-state recession. Its unemployment rate, at 7.1%, is twice the national average; it was the only state last year not hit by a hurricane to lose jobs. Personal per capita income is 7% below the national average. Home foreclosure rates have doubled this year. And over the last four years, 200,000 economic refugees have left the state, a trend that will only accelerate as the ongoing downsizing of the Big Three forces other auto-related industries to lay off workers.

Ms. Granholm's chief strategy for dealing with Michigan's grim economic situation, comically enough, is to blame Mr. DeVos, even though the last -- and only -- time he held elected office was as a member of the State Board of Education a decade ago. She has lambasted Amway, his company, which does business in 90 countries, for opening offices in China and "outsourcing" Michigan jobs. She has accused him of personally "allowing" the sexual abuse of mentally ill elder citizens because he had a 1% stake in a publicly traded nursing home chain where some incidents were recently discovered. And just when one thought this Hollywood-starlet-turned-Harvard-lawyer couldn't get any nastier, she did another hit job in their last debate, accusing him of tax evasion for incorporating some of Amway's overseas subsidiaries in Bermuda. "I have never seen a sitting governor run so many negative attacks against an opponent," notes Bill Ballenger, publisher of the respected non-partisan political newsletter Inside Michigan Politics. "She has few accomplishments to list so she knows that if she allows this election to become a referendum on her, she'll lose."

Although Mr. DeVos, who has spent $30 million of his own money on the campaign, has recovered from his initial shell-shock and become better at deflecting such attacks, he has done little to challenge her on economic fundamentals -- her big vulnerability given that two-thirds of Michigan voters believe that the state has been going in the wrong economic direction under her. No one expects a candidate in a union state to win as a free trader. But Mr. DeVos has granted Ms. Granholm's protectionist premises. He has countered her attacks against his company's overseas operations by accusing her of not doing enough to convince Honda officials to locate in Michigan -- as if it were a governor's job to negotiate business deals. Worse, instead of staying focused on creating an attractive business climate by cutting taxes and government, his plan to make Michigan globally competitive involves opening offices in 10 countries to promote trade and tourism.

The fundamental reason why not a single non-U.S. auto maker has ever opened a major plant in Michigan -- notes David L. Littmann, a senior economist at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy -- is not a lack of these offices, but that it costs too much to generate wealth in this state. Thanks to the strong union presence, Michigan's labor costs relative to productivity are the second-highest in the nation. Normally, an economy might adapt to such realities by "diversifying" -- to use a buzz word that both candidates bandy -- into non-unionized service industries. But Michigan's onerous combination of redistributive regulations and high taxes has prevented even this from happening, making it more vulnerable to the imploding auto industry.

It is not surprising that a big-government careerist like Ms. Granholm has few ideas for addressing these issues beyond an old industrial policy of accelerating infrastructure-rebuilding -- "Every orange cone means a job," she beams into the TV camera! -- and issuing bonds to invest in government-picked start-ups. But for someone whose main campaign theme is that as a businessman he understands the challenges facing Michigan's businesses, Mr. DeVos's proposals, so far, are disappointing, to say the least.

He recently endorsed a law raising the minimum wage, disregarding that it will contribute to growing unemployment while making it harder for small businesses to remain profitable. He does insist -- correctly -- that lowering Michigan's tax burden, which is much above the national average on a per capita basis, ought to be priority No. 1. But apart from calling for the repeal of an already repealed Single Business Tax that assessed businesses on their payrolls as opposed to profits, his only other suggestion so far is scrapping the Personal Property Tax. This tax discourages businesses from making capital investments by taxing new machines, equipment and furniture. But the problem is that it is one item in a laundry list of petty programs -- not embedded in any consistent policy vision.

While Mr. DeVos's failure to enunciate such a vision is likely calculated to position him as a moderate, in reality it is only making him less believable to independent voters. Meanwhile, his conservative base is dispirited because he has diluted his commitment to school choice and is opposing a ballot proposal banning the government from using racial preferences. "He has to stop playing safe and take bolder positions," warns Tim Shields, a GOP political consultant. "Otherwise, his base might well decide that it does not make a difference who gets elected and stay home."

But articulating a vision is not just about attracting voters, it is also about obtaining a mandate to govern successfully. A vision will give him the clout and clarity, should he squeeze out a late-inning comeback, to resist the inevitable calls by Democrats to replace the business tax cuts with new taxes, and to insist, instead, on spending restraint to unshackle Michigan's economy.

Connecticut Crucible For A War Debate (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

When the three candidates in Connecticut's celebrated Senate race met for their final debate on Monday night in New London, only one of them appeared to be having a good time.

It was not Ned Lamont, the tense and fidgety businessman who had captured the Democratic nomination as an opponent of the Iraq war. It was certainly not Joseph Lieberman, the three-term Democratic senator who had lost the primary to Lamont because of his support of that war and is running as an independent. Lieberman looked exhausted and exasperated by his situation, even though polls show him to be in front.

No, the only person who was relaxed, good-humored and reveling in the moment was Alan Schlesinger, the bulky Republican nominee whom no one gives a chance of winning. He jabbed humorously and effectively at both his opponents, noting how ironic it was that "a Greenwich multimillionaire" such as Lamont was running as a Democrat, while Lieberman, whose long list of liberal positions Schlesinger cited, was "masquerading as a Republican."

When a raucous bunch of zealots in the theater audience interrupted Lieberman's closing statement, and the feeble shushing of the senator and moderator George Stephanopoulos failed to silence them, it was Schlesinger who stepped to the edge of the stage and, with his size and commanding voice, ordered them to pipe down -- receiving thanks from Lieberman for his intervention.

It is not clear what the performance by the underfinanced Schlesinger, who has been officially abandoned as a candidate by the state and national GOP organizations, will do to the race. Lamont strategists hope he will attract more voters from the Republican base and thereby deprive Lieberman of support he might get from Republicans grateful for his sticking with President Bush on the war.

Lamont has no appeal to those Republicans and is also losing to Lieberman among independents, who respond to the senator's claim that he follows his conscience on national policy and delivers for the state. Polls also show that Lieberman has been taking more than one-third of the Democratic vote from Lamont. Reducing that percentage has become the chief objective for the Lamont campaign.

Schlesinger threw down a challenge to both his opponents by taking a question about morality and foreign policy as an opportunity to unload on the topic of illegal immigration. Stephanopoulos tried to steer him back to the subject matter of the question, but Schlesinger was not to be deterred from joining the chorus of Republicans in other states, including embattled Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, decrying Bush's policies and demanding that the border be closed.

Neither Lieberman nor Lamont took the bait, preferring to continue their own debate on Iraq.

The outcome of their fight is important nationally for the meaning that will be attached. While other states such as Missouri, Tennessee, Ohio and Virginia will decide whether Republicans or Democrats control the Senate, this Connecticut race constitutes perhaps the nation's clearest test on the Iraq war.

Lieberman insists he is not wholly in the Bush camp but still argues that a victory in Iraq is possible and essential for American security -- whatever that may mean. "I'm not ready to give up on the Muslim world," he said, adding that a democratic Iraq could serve as a model for the Middle East. His winning and returning to the Senate and its Democratic caucus would slow, if not reverse, growing pressure from the Democrats for an early pullout of U.S. forces.

On the other hand, should Lamont repeat his primary win over Lieberman and capture the seat, it would add immeasurably to the momentum of the antiwar forces. He says that he is running in order to end the nightmare of "140,000 of our brave troops stuck in the middle of a bloody civil war."

Lamont himself is not a strong figure or a compelling politician; he looks like a juvenile in a drawing room comedy, and he is competitive mainly because he has sunk much of his fortune into this race. Lieberman is an exhausted veteran, barely able to conceal his irritation at having to fight for a seat he feels that he owns. When challenged on his record, he turns testy.

Their weaknesses were exposed by Schlesinger's good humor. But theirs is the fight that counts -- and it counts a lot.

A New Campaign Tactic: Manipulating Google Data (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

If things go as planned for liberal bloggers in the next few weeks, searching Google for “Jon Kyl,” the Republican senator from Arizona now running for re-election, will produce high among the returns a link to an April 13 article from The Phoenix New Times, an alternative weekly.

Mr. Kyl “has spent his time in Washington kowtowing to the Bush administration and the radical right,” the article suggests, “very often to the detriment of Arizonans.”

Searching Google for “Peter King,” the Republican congressman from Long Island, would bring up a link to a Newsday article headlined “King Endorses Ethnic Profiling.”

Fifty or so other Republican candidates have also been made targets in a sophisticated “Google bombing” campaign intended to game the search engine’s ranking algorithms. By flooding the Web with references to the candidates and repeatedly cross-linking to specific articles and sites on the Web, it is possible to take advantage of Google’s formula and force those articles to the top of the list of search results.

The project was originally aimed at 70 Republican candidates but was scaled back to roughly 50 because Chris Bowers, who conceived it, thought some of the negative articles too partisan.

The articles to be used “had to come from news sources that would be widely trusted in the given district,” said Mr. Bowers, a contributor at MyDD.com (Direct Democracy), a liberal group blog. “We wanted actual news reports so it would be clear that we weren’t making anything up.”

Each name is associated with one article. Those articles are embedded in hyperlinks that are now being distributed widely among the left-leaning blogosphere. In an entry at MyDD.com this week, Mr. Bowers said: “When you discuss any of these races in the future, please, use the same embedded hyperlink when reprinting the Republican’s name. Then, I suppose, we will see what happens.”

An accompanying part of the project is intended to buy up Google Adwords, so that searches for the candidates’ names will bring up advertisements that point to the articles as well. But Mr. Bowers said his hopes for this were fading, because he was very busy.

The ability to manipulate the search engine’s results has been demonstrated in the past. Searching for “miserable failure,” for example, produces the official Web site of President Bush.

But it is far from clear whether this particular campaign will be successful. Much depends on the extent of political discussion already tied to a particular candidate’s name.

It will be harder to manipulate results for searches of the name of a candidate who has already been widely covered in the news and widely discussed in the blogosphere, because so many links and so many pages already refer to that particular name. Search results on lesser-known candidates, with a smaller body of references and links, may be easier to change.

"We don't condone the practice of Google bombing, or any other action that seeks to affect the integrity of our search results," said Ricardo Reyes, a Google spokesman. "A site's ranking in Google's search results is automatically determined by computer algorithms using thousands of factors to calculate a page's relevance to a given query."

The company's faith in its system has produced a hands-off policy when it comes to correcting for the effects of Google bombs in the past. Over all, Google says, the integrity of the search product remains intact.

Writing in the company's blog last year, Marissa Mayer, Google's director of consumer Web products, suggested that pranks might be "distracting to some, but they don't affect the overall quality of our search service, whose objectivity, as always, remains the core of our mission."

Still, some conservative blogs have condemned Mr. Bowers's tactic. These include Outside the Beltway, which has called him "unscrupulous," and Hot Air, which declared the effort "fascinatingly evil."

But Mr. Bowers suggested that he was acting with complete transparency and said he hoped political campaigns would take up the tactic, which he called "search engine optimization," as a standard part of their arsenal.

"I did this out in the open using my real name, using my own Web site," he said. "There's no hidden agenda. One of the reasons for this is to show that campaigns should be doing this on their own."

Indeed, if all campaigns were doing it, the playing field might well be leveled.

Mr. Bowers said he did not believe the practice would actually deceive most Internet users.

"I think Internet users are very smart and most are aware of what a Google bomb is," he said, "and they will be aware that results can be massaged a bit."

Arab Americans Trending Democratic In Swing States (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

A new poll of Arab Americans in four battleground states shows a large shift in voter preferences that now favors Democratic candidates. If true, it represents a major shift from as recently as the 2000 presidential election, when then-Gov. George Bush won nearly 50 percent of Arab Americans' votes.

The survey, conducted by Zogby International for the Arab American Institute (AAI), of likely voters in Ohio, Florida and Pennsylvania found that Arab Americans are supporting Democrat gubernatorial and Senate candidates by close to 3-1 margins.

"This first started in early 2002," said AAI President James Zogby. "It enlarged in 2004, and now, in 2006, has grown to very large majorities." And with a number of close races potentially shifting the control of Congress, the major shift of even a small ethnic bloc could give one side the edge.

According to the AAI, the Arab American community is projected to cast a likely turnout of 510,000 voters who represent "up to" 5 percent of all voters in Michigan, 2 percent in Ohio and Florida and more than 1.5 percent in Pennsylvania.

Among those half-million voters, 45 percent self-identify as Democrats, while 31 percent call themselves Republicans. In all four states, the Democrats are leading among Arab Americans by large margins, with Florida's gubernatorial race being the exception.

"Clearly, there is a trend in the Democrats' direction," Mr. Zogby said. "Clearly, there is a vote for change."

Gov. Edward G. Rendell, Pennsylvania Democrat, leads his Republican opponent Lynn Swann 67 percent to 22 percent, according to the poll. Similarly, in Ohio, Democrat gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland leads Republican J. Kenneth Blackwell 60 percent to 21 percent.

This is also true in Michigan, even though the Republican Senate candidate, Michael Bouchard, is the grandson of Lebanese immigrants. The Zogby poll showed Mr. Bouchard trailing among Arab American voters to Democrat Sen. Debbie Stabenow 54 percent to 31 percent.

The numbers are a far cry from as recently as 2000, when Mr. Zogby says President Bush won the support of 46 percent of Arab Americans, compared with 38 percent who went for Al Gore. Independent candidate Ralph Nader, who is Lebanese, received 13 percent of the vote.

Pollster John Zogby, James Zogby's brother, said that his initial data on Arab-American voting trends, conducted between 1981 and 1984, showed "a fairly even balance" in voter identification between Democrats, Republicans and independents. For the most part, that trend continued through the late 1990s.

"In 1996, that parity was present," Mr. Zogby said. There has been a 12-point shift away from the Republicans over the past decade, he said.

However, Mr. Zogby said the shift toward Democrats was not necessarily a permanent one. "I'm not convinced those numbers are locked in place," he said. "John Kerry got 3-to-1 over George Bush, and he didn't earn it."

DOJ_NMG_0086873

Mr. Zogby said the door could be open for a 2008 Republican presidential candidate who offers "a dramatic shift in policy" from the current administration. Democrats are benefiting mostly from being the opposition party. "In Ohio, it's because [Senate candidate Rep.] Sherrod Brown is not the Republican," he said.

Election May Turn On What Happened In Vegas (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, October 26, 2006

A Las Vegas cocktail waitress said Wednesday she was offered money to recant allegations that a Republican congressman running for Nevada governor assaulted and propositioned her.

Less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election, the alleged bribery attempt that Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, described at a news conference reignited a sex-tinged controversy that Rep. Jim Gibbons says could influence his tight contest with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus.

Gibbon's lawyer, Don Campbell, later at a news conference called Mazzeo “an exceedingly troubled young woman” with a “troubled past,” who was making “wild and reckless allegations.”

Gibbons, 61, who is married, has denied the allegations.

Mazzeo, who is raising a 3-year-old daughter alone, made three 911 calls on Oct. 13, then told police that Gibbons grabbed her arms in a parking garage, pushed her against a wall and pressured her for sex after drinking with her and four companions in a restaurant.

A police report quotes Gibbons as saying he had grabbed the arm of the woman, who “might have been tipsy,” to catch her from tripping and falling as he was helping her find her truck. Police reports say Gibbons and Mazzeo said they had been drinking wine.

Mazzeo told police Oct. 14 she didn't want to “go up against” Gibbons. She declined to press criminal charges but did not retract her allegations.

After accounts of the alleged incident appeared in local news media, Gibbons strongly denied the allegations publicly.

Clark County Sheriff Bill Young, a political supporter of Gibbons, urged voters to consider possible political motivations for the sexual misconduct allegations so close to the election.

Mazzeo's lawyer, Richard Wright, said Wednesday that Gibbons had thrown the woman's credibility into question. “I want all the truth to come out,” Mazzeo said.

Wright said a friend of Mazzeo had offered her money to sign a statement for Gibbons saying that nothing untoward had happened.

Wright said he wants the Clark County district attorney's office to conduct an independent investigation.

Wednesday night, county District Attorney David Roger told KLAS-TV in Las Vegas that he is willing to pursue an investigation provided he has full cooperation from Mazzeo. Wright has said Mazzeo would cooperate and has offered to take a polygraph test.

Gibbons told the Reno Gazette-Journal on Monday that the incident “is going to have an impact on our campaign,” but he said he would win.

The most recent public poll, conducted by Zogby International for The Wall Street Journal and released Friday, showed Gibbons leading Titus by 5 percentage points. The poll had a margin of error of +/-4 percentage points.

“If the public sees it as a reflection of bad judgment (by Gibbons), it can't help but have an impact on the campaign,” Titus told the Reno newspaper Tuesday. “I have not commented, because I think it speaks for itself. It points to bad judgment, regardless of what happened.”

Candidates Show Strain Of Tough Election Season (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — With the finish line looming in one of the most intense Congressional election seasons in years, candidates are moving into take-no-prisoners mode. Some might consider taking a deep breath instead.

Fighting for their jobs in an increasingly frenzied political environment, several candidates are showing signs of strain, uttering words they later wish they could take back, running last-ditch advertisements that push the envelope and taking other actions that are out of the political ordinary. The gaffes can have real consequences, coming when voters are paying the closest attention.

Representative Barbara Cubin, a Wyoming Republican facing a strong challenge in what should be a safe seat, this week told an opponent who uses a wheelchair that she would slap him were he not disabled.

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, normally a low-key moderate, portrayed the treatment of Iraqis at the Abu Ghraib prison as the product of a sex ring rather than of abuse. Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House, accused a black Senate candidate of "slavishly" supporting Republican policies and later apologized for a poor choice of words.

Senator Conrad Burns, a Republican fighting for his seat in Montana, hinted that there was a secret party plan for the war in Iraq. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee used his campaign bus to interrupt a news conference of his opponent in the Senate race. Representative John Hostetler, an embattled Indiana Republican, broadcast a radio advertisement accusing the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi, of harboring a radical homosexual agenda.

John Raese, a businessman running against Senator Robert C. Byrd, a West Virginia Democrat who is 88, disparaged Mr. Byrd's physical condition. Mr. Byrd had suggested earlier that his opponent's late father would be ashamed of his son's candidacy.

"Thank God there are only 13 days left," said Tom Gavin, a spokesman for Mr. Byrd.

Political veterans say they are not surprised that some candidates are losing their cool.

"It is definitely the funny season," said Ed Rollins, a longtime Republican strategist. "When everybody thinks they are in jeopardy, whether they are or not, there is real panic. All these Republicans who thought they were in safe seats have seen their numbers drop dramatically. They are freaked."

Mr. Rollins and others attributed some of the missteps to the exhaustion of candidates who are running on fumes, the pressure of facing real competition for the first time in years, a desire to leave no stone unturned and a surly attitude that can overtake difficult campaigns in their final days.

"You hate your opponent, the press and the local politicos," said James Carville, an adviser to former President Bill Clinton and other candidates. "The combination of fatigue and pressure and everything causes people to do ridiculous things." Mr. Carville said that campaign operatives tended to overschedule late in the game. "Oftentimes," he said, "the campaigns and candidates would say, 'What do you think I should do?' And my answer is one word: less."

After a debate on Sunday night in Casper, Wyo., Ms. Cubin approached the libertarian candidate, Thomas Rankin, who had questioned her on taking campaign aid from Tom DeLay, the former majority leader, and suggested that if Mr. Rankin, who has multiple sclerosis, did not use a wheelchair, "I'd slap you across the face."

Recounting the exchange Wednesday, Mr. Rankin said, "I feel that she is very worried about losing percentage points in the polls." He noted that the race included a third candidate, a Democrat, nipping at Ms. Cubin's heels.

Ms. Cubin's campaign did not respond to a request for comment on Wednesday, but she has offered an apology in local news interviews and attributed the remark to the stress and frustration of the campaign.

Mr. Shays, locked in a very difficult re-election campaign, also later backed away from his characterization this month of the Abu Ghraib scandal as the result of a sex ring among the military jailers.

But he has not retracted another remark that has drawn attention. Defending Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the Mark Foley Congressional page scandal, Mr. Shays said that Mr. Hastert "did not drive over a bridge and leave a young person in the water," a reference to a 1969 car accident involving Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, in which a female passenger died. Mr. Kennedy had campaigned for Mr. Shays's opponent, Diane Farrell.

Many considered the acid comments by Mr. Shays to be out of character. "The pressure, I think, was getting to him," said John Orman, a politics professor at Fairfield University and a former Congressional candidate.

Mr. Burns, the outspoken Montana senator who has been involved in a series of verbal dust-ups this year, drew comparisons this month to Richard M. Nixon during the Vietnam War when he chided his Democratic opponent, Jon Tester, over Iraq and said Mr. Bush had a plan for victory he was not sharing with Democrats. Mr. Burns later acknowledged that he occasionally spoke without thinking.

Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, agreed with him on that point on Wednesday.

"Now, you know, occasionally he may say something that he shouldn't say," Mrs. Dole said during an appearance at the National Press Club. "He's an honest guy, and so that may happen."

With time running out and their seats in jeopardy, candidates are also reaching for their toughest advertisements. The one-minute radio spot being broadcast by Mr. Hostetler in Indiana warns that a Democratic victory will allow Ms. Pelosi to move forward with a radical homosexual agenda, assisted by Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts, an openly gay member who was reprimanded by the House in 1990 for ethical breaches involving his relationship with a male prostitute.

Mr. Hostetler's campaign did not respond to a request to discuss the advertisement, but Ms. Pelosi's office did.

"It reeks of desperation," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the Democratic leader. "It is just the time of year when people go crazy and do crazy things, but it is not going to help them."

DOJ_NMG_0086875

In West Virginia, Mr. Raese, who had previously avoided the subject of Mr. Byrd's advancing years and his occasional reliance on two canes, on Monday asked the editorial board of The Charleston Daily Mail, "Would you hire Robert Byrd if he came in and asked for a job?"

Gary Abernathy, a spokesman for Mr. Raese, said the comment reflected the candidate's frank style. "We have not made Senator Byrd's age or faculties part of the campaign rhetoric," he said. "But John feels it is obviously a factor that is a legitimate question when are you are discussing this race."

Mr. Gavin, the spokesman for Mr. Byrd, said the senator was not all that offended by the gibe. "Thankfully, Senator Byrd is not looking to take a job with Mr. Raese's companies," he said. "He will have a job for six more years."

Hillary Clinton Wins Minds But Not Yet Hearts (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Hillary Clinton summoned a patient laugh. Having just been asked whether she had ever undergone plastic surgery, she replied: "You can look at these wrinkles – they're real."

John Spencer, the Republican whose senatorial campaign against Mrs Clinton looks more like a kamikaze mission each day, had suggested as much to one of New York's tabloids.

"You seen pictures of her back then? Phew," said Mr Spencer. "I don't know why Bill married her."

Some suggest his real goal is to serve the larger Republican interest by ensuring that Mrs Clinton's victory next month is so emphatic she will gather unstoppable momentum to become the Democratic presidential candidate for 2008.

But there are reasons to believe the Republicans might be too sanguine about how easy it would be for their candidate to defeat Mrs Clinton in 2008, regardless of which party wins the mid-term congressional elections on November 7. A recent opinion poll in Time magazine put Mrs Clinton neck and neck with John McCain, the most likely Republican contender in the 2008 election, at 47 per cent apiece.

Watching Mrs Clinton, who turns 59 today, on the campaign trail in Long Island explains why many people who used to be hostile to her have become more open-minded.

Six years ago, when the then First Lady was selected as the Democratic candidate for New York, many saw her move as a brief stopover en route to a larger prize.

But Mrs Clinton has worked assiduously to win federal contracts and funding for communities in her state. For example, she successfully prevented the closure of a military base at Niagara and clinched $20bn (€15.5bn, £10.5bn) of immediate funding for New York after the September 11 2001 attacks.

Now she campaigns tirelessly to get better treatment for the fire and police employees who were affected by the dust at Ground Zero.

"Six years ago this room was not exactly a hothouse of support for me," said Mrs Clinton at the Suffolk Benevolent Association, a police station in suburban Long Island. Flanked by the type of hard-faced cops who would not give the time of day to a liberal, she was evidently among supporters.

"We are endorsing Mrs Clinton for the Senate because she understands us and stands up for our interests," said the local police spokesman.

At an event to rename a federal post office after a local Navy Special Forces officer killed last year fighting the Taliban in Afghanistan, Mrs Clinton spoke convincingly about military valour to hundreds of Long Island veterans.

Her speech betrayed years of diligent activity on the Senate armed services committee – Mrs Clinton's favourite platform on Capitol Hill.

"I have to admire her intelligence," said Thomas Tarragon, a retired major who said he was viscerally opposed to Mrs Clinton because she had allegedly "lied" to protect the then president Bill Clinton from the consequences of his infidelities in the White House. "The speech she gave today could have been given word-for-word by George Bush. The difference is that Mr Bush would have meant it."

In spite of her evident crowd-pulling abilities, doubts about her authenticity are unlikely to fade.

During the two senatorial debates and at press conferences on the campaign trail, Mrs Clinton has been dogged by two recurring questions.

Will she still be a senator six years from now when her term elapses? And how can she criticise Mr Bush for invading Iraq when she supported the congressional resolution which authorised it?

Mrs Clinton evades both with lawyerly consistency. "I have made no decision [about 2008]," says Mrs Clinton, although the fact she has raised close to $50m – far more than any other Democrat – for a senatorial race she could win for free keeps doubts simmering.

On Iraq, she says she thought the October 2002 resolution authorising force meant that it would never have to be used – an interpretation few others shared at the time. "I regret the way the president has used his authority," she says.

Meanwhile, Mrs Clinton's large staff, who jokingly refer to themselves as "Hillaryland", permit only homoeopathic doses of unscripted exposure.

Given the harsh tabloid scrutiny that Mrs Clinton has faced – barely a day passes without someone criticising what she is wearing or hinting at something about her husband – such protectiveness is understandable.

But even some of the veterans Mrs Clinton has won over say that her "message discipline" might become a liability during a presidential campaign.

"Nobody really knows what she believes," said one bemedalled veteran, who was nevertheless happy that Mrs Clinton's speech had hit all the right notes about sacrifice on the battlefield.

US Faces 'bigger Skills Gap' Than India (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera, Richard Waters And Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Azim Premji, chairman of Wipro, the Indian outsourcing group, has warned that the US faces a more acute skills shortage in information technology than India, blaming failings in America's education system and restrictive immigration policies.

The comments will bolster arguments by US companies such as Microsoft, General Electric, Google and Intel, which have urged Washington to act to reverse the steady erosion in the stock of domestic IT talent.

"There is a scarcity of IT professionals in the US," Mr Premji told the Financial Times. "Engineering is not growing talent, and that is a cause of concern."

He said Indian groups would confound expectations of a looming skills shortage in the country and continue to draw on lower-cost, highly trained graduates to retain their technological edge.

However, he said Wipro would also continue to expand outside India to serve non-English speaking countries and could open a base in Russia within 18 months.

Mr Premji, a Stanford University graduate, said the US education system was not doing enough to attract mathematics and science teachers or to steer students towards those subjects.

"Math is not considered as important, and students are not getting a premium when they graduate as engineers," he said. The US produces about 70,000 engineering graduates a year, a fraction of India's 400,000, though that number is boosted by holders of three-year diplomas.

Willard Daggett, president of the International Center for Leadership in Education, said: "The problem is not that our schools aren't what they used to be; the problem is that our schools are what they used to be."

Mr Premji said US skill shortages have been made more acute by visa rules that have cut the number of science students and professionals allowed into the US. He said the curbs made it difficult for outsourcing companies to serve US-based customers and warned that the powerful Indian IT industry could lobby the Indian government to impose retaliatory measures on the US.

Bill Gates, Microsoft's founder, has been warning about the evaporation of interest in computer science at US universities for more than two years.

Jeffrey Immelt, GE's chief, told a Washington audience in January that the US was on its way to becoming "the massage capital of the world", with more students graduating in sports sciences than electrical engineering.

The Era Of What's Next (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

Wooster, Ohio

Sometimes liberalism is dominant and sometimes conservatism is dominant, but sometimes there is no dominant ideology.

Between 1932 and 1968, liberalism dominated American politics. The big accomplishments were liberal accomplishments — Social Security, Medicare, the civil rights movement. Even if Republicans sometimes held the White House, the general drift of things was still to the left.

Between 1980 and 2006, conservatism was dominant. The big accomplishments were conservative accomplishments — the defeat of communism, the reinvigoration of the economy through deregulation, tax reform and monetarism, the rebalancing of the culture to emphasize family, work and individual responsibility. Even if Democrats sometimes held the White House, the general drift of things was to the right.

But in some eras there is no dominant political tendency. The 1970's were such a period. That decade was marked not by a change in political winds so much as by disillusionment and a scrambling of political categories. People who once had been liberals drifted away. Voters became cynical about politics itself. The pendulum swung not only from left to right but from politics to antipolitics. Jimmy Carter promised a break from the normal methods of political life.

We're about to enter another of those periods without a dominant ideology. It's clear that this election will mark the end of conservative dominance. This election is a period, not a comma in political history.

That's clear not only because Republicans could lose their majorities, but for several other reasons. First, conservatives have exhausted their agenda. They have little new left to propose and have lost their edge on issues like fiscal discipline and foreign policy. Second, conservatives are beset by scandals, the kind of institutional decay that afflicts movements at the end of their political lives. Third, the Reagan coalition is splintering, with the factions going off in wildly different directions.

Fourth, there is no viable orthodox conservative candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. Orthodox conservatives like Allen, Frist and Santorum are fading, and only heterodox figures like McCain, Giuliani and Romney are rising.

If you look at the political landscape, identification with the Republican Party is falling but identification with the Democratic Party is not rising. Instead, there is a spike in the number of people who do not identify with either. People correctly perceive that neither party has a coherent agenda this year.

In the near term, the candidates who thrive will be those who offer a new way of politics. This might be the maverick independence of McCain, or the ostentatiously deliberative style of Obama, or it could be the manner of somebody whom none of us are even thinking about. Candidates who seem conventional will have a tough time. This includes Hillary Clinton.

Process issues will come to the fore, issues that have to do with the way politics is conducted. So will issues of character and decision-making style. George Bush's secretive and declarative method will soon seem archaic — like the silent picture acting style in the age of sound. Instead, voters will look for candidates as interactive as the technology around them.

The center of political gravity will shift. In the liberal era, the urban Northeast dominated the landscape. In the conservative era, it was in the South and in bedroom communities like those in Southern California. In the coming era, the center of gravity will move to the West and the Midwestern plains, and to the pragmatic, untethered office park suburbs sprouting up there.

The people who will be most important are those who can most precisely identify the new era's defining problems. The first is the continuing rise of Islamic fundamentalism. It's clear the categories of the nation-state era — rollback and containment — are not working to reverse extremism, but what will? The second big problem is entitlement spending and the stultification of government.

The third challenge is the emergence of China and India — seizing the opportunities afforded by those new workers, mitigating the pain associated with tougher competition and managing the fiscal imbalances. The fourth is the growing importance of cognitive skills and cultural capital, the need to surround people, especially children, with stable relationships if they are to flourish.

One party will become distracted by passing squalls, but the other will focus on those issues. Then, a new period of dominance will begin.

Special Treatment For Air America (WT)

By John R. Lott Jr. And Bradley A. Smith

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

When is a campaign donation not a campaign donation? Apparently if you spend the money to run a radio program instead of paying for campaign ads that run on that same program. Just look at Air America. With $41 million in losses since 2004, and $9.8 million owed just to Robert Glaser, RealNetworks chairman, Democrats who bankrolled this "company" weren't so much investors as campaign contributors. The losses are seen as simple business ineptitude,but Air America effectively, and perhaps intentionally, cleverly avoided the campaign finance limits which Democrats had worked so hard to pass.

With McCain-Feingold's "hard money" donation limits of $2,000 per candidate and "soft money" limits to party campaign committees of $57,500, there is no way that Mr. Glaser or other wealthy Democratic donors could have legally given such large sums directly to Democrats. But Air America provided a vehicle for their multimillion-dollar political campaigns.

Take Al Franken's show last Friday, the very day the network was declaring bankruptcy. The program devoted two-and-a-half hours to "Meet the Democrats," where five U.S. House and Senate candidates explained why they were the people for the job. Two-and-a-half hours straight of candidates talking is hardly stirring radio, but it is the Democrats' version of religious radio. Hardly meant to make a profit, but there to inspire the troops. After all, when the network started in 2004, Al Franken announced that: "I'm doing this because I want to use my energies to get Bush unelected."

Since Air America started, successful radio entrepreneurs — most notably Rush Limbaugh — have argued that Air America never had a business model that made sense. But perhaps it had a model that made political sense.

It's hardly a coincidence that Air America debuted in time for the 2004 presidential campaign or that the bankruptcy filing was put off long enough so that creditors actions won't stop broadcasts before the Nov. 7 election. As if the willingness to lose money weren't already obvious, over a year ago the network started asking listeners to donate money to keep the programs on the air.

Air America merely follows a grand tradition of circumvention by the very people who have supported campaign-finance regulation. George Soros donated millions to help pass McCain-Feingold, but was quick to work around it so that his big dollars could keep flowing. During the 2004 presidential campaign,Mr. Soros was prohibited from giving money directly to his preferred candidate, Howard Dean, so he gave $15 million to MoveOn.org so that it could raise the money for Mr. Dean.

The big innovation for Air America was using the bankruptcy laws to turn non-Democrats into involuntary campaign donors. Not only are Democratic "investors" out in the cold, but landlords, limo services, law firms, stations that sold Air America air time and state governments are owed money. Apparently, the network still owes the Gloria Wise Boys and Girls Club, a New York City program for poor kids, a whopping $875,000 — money that was transferred from the club by its former director. But even while these people are being stiffed, since the bankruptcy Air America's founders brazenly announced they are starting a new left-wing radio network.

More importantly, though, Air America shows what a mess campaign finance regulations are in. As Justice Anthony Scalia noted during the oral arguments on McCain-Feingold's constitutionality: "if history teaches us anything, [it] is that when you plug one means of expression, the money will go to whatever means of expression are left." One such means is the press: broadcast stations, magazines and newspapers are exempt from the law.

But the term "news media" is difficult to define. When McCain-Feingold first passed in 2002, the National Rifle Association generated outrage when it talked about buying a TV station, so that like other media, it could mention a candidate's name during the 60 days before the general election. Sen. John Kerry demanded that the Federal Election Commission block any attempt by the NRA to get a media exemption, stating, "We urge you to prevent the NRA from hijacking America's airwaves with the gun lobby's money." There is no record of Mr. Kerry objecting to Air America's expenditures.

Unfortunately, the contradictions may soon be getting a lot worse. Recently two Seattle radio talk-show hosts were found guilty of violating the Washington State's campaign finance regulations. The monetary value of their commentary on an initiative exceeded campaign contribution limits.Their sin was apparently to fight for lower taxes. What's next? A monetary value assigned to positive news stories in newspapers?

News organizations will rightly claim that they cannot do their jobs if campaign-finance regulations are applied to them. Hopefully even the majority on the Supreme Court, which supported McCain-Feingold, will realize that regulating the content of news stories and regulating who is part of the media goes too far.

How to solve this problem? One solution — we'll call it the First Amendment solution — is to deregulate the system, let the voters hear what people (even those with "big money") have to say, and trust the voters to choose wisely. The alternative is to extend restrictions to the press. If the latter course is chosen, Mr. Soros and his friends risk finally bringing to America the strict government control of the news he witnessed firsthand as a boy growing up under Nazi and communist dictators.

John R. Lott Jr., the dean's visiting professor at SUNY-Binghamton, served as an unpaid expert witness for the plaintiffs in the McCain-Feingold case.Bradley A. Smith, chairman of the Center for Competitive Politics, is a law professor at Capital University Law School and a former chairman of the Federal Election Commission.

Kiss Of Death For 'President'? (USAT)

By Anthony Breznican

USA Today, October 26, 2006

How do you get people to go to a movie that sounds like it's committing treason?

That's the challenge facing Newmarket Films' new Death of a President, a fictional documentary about what could happen if President Bush were assassinated.

Simply joking about killing a sitting president is a quick way to get a visit from the Secret Service. Could the theme make potential moviegoers skittish?

"It's not a crime to see the movie," jokes Richard Abramowitz, marketing director for Newmarket, which also released the controversial The Passion of the Christ. "The film does not promote violence on any level. It no more advocates for assassination of the president than Silence of the Lambs advocates for cannibalism."

Death of a President, from British director and co-writer Gabriel Range, has raised hackles ever since it premiered in September at the Toronto Film Festival.

Some large theater chains balked at featuring it, and the film will open Friday in about 100 theaters, mostly art houses. CNN and Fox News refused to run ads for the movie.

DOJ_NMG_0086879

"There's a provocative element to it, particularly in synopsis," Abramowitz says. "A one-sentence logline makes the film sound more incendiary than it is."

The film starts with the faux assassination in 2007 and features fictional Secret Service agents, speechwriters, investigators and journalists discussing the events and their repercussions.

One of the suspects has ties to Syria, which leads the newly inaugurated President Cheney to threaten military force.

Range, who has made similar theoretical films about the "collapse" of Britain's transportation and banking systems, says he used Bush instead of a fictional substitute because the story would have been powerless without the trappings of current events.

"This film is about the world we live in," he says. "It's about the consequences of the climate of fear."

Though it won the International Critics Award in Toronto, reviews have been divided.

Jim Emerson, who is filling in for the ailing Roger Ebert at the Chicago Sun-Times, wrote that the use of real characters is "seamless, intelligent and maybe even necessary to an understanding of George W. Bush's role in the world." The Hollywood Reporter's Kirk Honeycutt called Range's manipulation of real footage a "morally dubious tactic."

Conservatives and liberals alike have condemned the subject matter. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called the film "despicable."

Though the White House is obviously displeased with his film, Range says he was contacted only once by the Secret Service, when he was shooting motorcade scenes in Chicago.

Range says Secret Service agents did not ask him to submit a script for review. "I think it was clear to them that the film was being made, and no way was it going to incite anyone to do this."

A Capital Connection (WP)

THE QUALITY of communication between the Washington area and Beijing could influence global stability. But there is no direct flight between the two capitals. Over the next couple of months, the Transportation Department will consider whether that should change. For economic reasons as well as geopolitical ones, the department should back a United Airlines proposal to launch daily service to Beijing from Dulles International Airport.

Because the Chinese government restricts direct flights into Beijing and Shanghai, the number of American cities with nonstop access has to be rationed. At present, there are direct connections to Shanghai, Beijing or both from San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, New York and Newark. Under an agreement with the Chinese, the Transportation Department can give out one more direct link. Washington is competing for the prize with Newark, Detroit and Dallas. All contestants pad their case with scrolls of politicians' signatures and learned economic studies.

Newark serves a large region full of globe-trotters, but it already has direct service to Shanghai and there are daily nonstop flights to Beijing from New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport. Detroit and Dallas lack direct flights, but their populations are 5.4 million and 6.2 million, respectively; the Washington metro area (including Baltimore) has 8.2 million. Washingtonians are more prone to visit China, too. In 2005, according to Transportation Department data, 49,200 people flew (indirectly) from Washington to Beijing. But only 29,510 travelers flew the Detroit-Shanghai route that Northwest Airlines would like to serve. And only 13,390 flew from Dallas to Beijing, the route proposed by American Airlines.

The critics of the Washington route complain that United Airlines already hogs four direct flights to China a day, and awarding it a fifth would give it an unfair lead on its competitors. But United would have only a third of the nonstop flights to China. Moreover, in a market in which regulation creates artificial scarcity, what matters is not just the variety of suppliers but the quantity of the supply. Because United is proposing to use a bigger aircraft than its competitors, awarding the route to Washington would probably do more to hold down prices than awarding it to one of the other bidders.

Washington is the nation's fourth most-populous metro area after New York, Los Angeles and Chicago. That makes it the biggest without direct flights to China. For the Transportation Department, this shouldn't be a hard decision.

Not So Big Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

Our favorite headline this week has to be "Big Worries for Big Oil," reporting that oil company profits are under pressure as oil prices decline. Exxon Mobil, Royal Dutch Shell, BP and other members of the vast energy conspiracy may have a hard time keeping their run of profit growth going now that oil prices have fallen to $60 or so a barrel from upwards of $80.

Imagine that: Oil companies are subject to market forces. They may make big profits when the price of oil rises, but those profits invariably fall back down to Earth when oil prices decline. This is also what happened in the 1990s, as oil crashed below $20 a barrel after the heights reached in the 1970s. The companies and their shareholders swallowed those declines, as they should have.

This cycle is typical of commodity markets, and is part of the risk of doing business. The run-up in oil prices over the past couple of years was rooted in worries about supply related to hurricanes, Middle East tensions and low stockpiles, as well as growing demand in a strong global economy and the Federal Reserve's easy money policy. As supply fears and demand have ebbed and the Fed has tightened, prices have fallen back down, albeit still to higher levels than a decade ago.

The recent price decline is also proof of the folly of a "windfall profits" tax or similar punitive measures against Big Oil favored by so many politicians. Only this week, however, Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi repeated her pledge to soak the oil companies if her party takes over the House next month.

Her policy seems to be that when oil prices decline, oil company shareholders must absorb all the market risk and the lower profits. But when oil prices rise, the companies must hand over a cut of their profits to Members of Congress to spend as they like. The only "windfall" is for the political class.

Chad Says Sudan Is Arming Rebels (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

NDJAMENA, Chad, Oct. 25 — The Chadian government on Wednesday accused Sudan of supplying rebel groups seeking to overthrow President Idriss Déby with weapons and providing them cover to operate in Sudanese territory.

The accusation, made by government and military officials as a rebel group moved toward the capital, heightened the already tense relations between the neighboring countries. They have been at odds over the rebellion in Darfur, which Sudan accuses Chad's government of supporting.

"These rebels entered Chad from Sudan, and they could only have procured this type of military equipment within the sight of and with the knowledge of the Sudanese authorities," the Chadian foreign minister, Ahmar Allami, told Agence France-Presse. "Sudan cannot deny it."

Lt. Col. Mahamat Hassane, a spokesman for the Chadian military, said the rebel group had reached the provincial town of Am Timan, but had not gone any further.

The loose coalition of several rebel factions opposed to Mr. Déby's government have advanced from the eastern part of the country toward the capital, but appear to have stalled. The government has sent reinforcements to Mongo, hoping to prevent the rebels from marching into the capital.

Government officials and diplomats feared a replay of the coup attempt in April, when hundreds of troops drove across the eastern scrubland into Ndjamena, and fierce firefights broke out. About 300 people were killed in the fighting, though the coup attempt failed.

In the current standoff, there have been no confrontations between the rebels and the army. The rebel group has occupied at least two towns, but their location, the size of their force and their intentions remain unclear. The group appears to be well armed — it fired a SAM-7 ground-to-air missile at a French military plane, according to the French government, but did not hit it.

Chad and Sudan have been trading accusations over the past year that each country supports rebel movements in the other. The countries appeared to reconcile this summer under a nonaggression pact brokered by Libya. Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir, attended the inauguration of Mr. Déby, who was re-elected in May after changing the Constitution to allow him to run for a third term.

The increased conflict along the porous border between Chad and Sudan has stymied aid operations to help the estimated 250,000 Sudanese refugees in Chad and 2.5 million displaced Darfurians inside Sudan. It has also forced tens of thousands of Chadians to flee their homes, some into war-ravaged Darfur.

U.S. Faults Europeans' Proposed Iran Sanctions (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The Bush administration has raised sharp but unspecified objections to a draft package of sanctions against Iran floated by European countries.

The resolution, proposed by Britain, France and Germany under the aegis of the United Nations, seeks to cut off most outside support to Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs, while limiting the travel of top Iranian military officials, European diplomats said yesterday.

Iran's uranium-enrichment program has raised suspicions that it aims to develop atomic weapons, though Tehran maintains it has only civilian-energy goals. The Europeans, who have led the diplomacy with Iran for nearly three years, are trying to craft an initial package of economic penalties that will win the support of Washington, which wants tougher punishments, as well as Russia and China, which are leery of sanctioning Iran.

A U.S. official who reviewed the draft said, "The Europeans have a fundamental difference with us on how to proceed, and this draft reflects that difference."

This first sanctions package is meant to be part of a series of increasingly stern resolutions if Iran continues to steam ahead on its nuclear program. Yet the difficulty in forging consensus on this first step shows how hard it will be to win agreement on a second sanctions plan.

Bush administration officials yesterday declined to provide details on how they would like the draft resolution altered, other than to say it isn't yet stringent enough. They cautioned that negotiations on specific language are at an early stage, and differences could be resolved in coming days. Russian and Chinese diplomats said they were still reviewing the draft and declined to comment.

Top officials in Moscow and Beijing have expressed reservations about imposing any measures that would encourage the Iranians to pull out of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty or to reject future cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Iran signed the treaty in the 1960s, forswearing nuclear weapons in exchange for access to technology that could be used for an energy program.

One issue particularly sensitive to Moscow is the future of the Russian-led work on Iran's Bushehr nuclear-power plant, which Russia doesn't want to see canceled. The draft would allow that work to continue, but without Russia supplying the reactor with fuel. U.S. officials said they would like the language on Bushehr to be altered, but declined to provide details of what Washington wants.

A U.N. resolution in July threatened to impose sanctions on Iran if it didn't suspend uranium enrichment and agree to return to negotiations by the end of August. Since then, the U.S., Russia, China, France and Britain -- the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council -- have wrestled with what sort of penalties might bring Tehran back to the table.

The Bush administration has hoped that concerns about North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month might galvanize support for a more muscular approach toward Tehran. Yet Iran's oil wealth and complex commercial interactions with Europe, Russia and China make the U.N. diplomatic effort more complex.

European and U.S. diplomats said negotiations over the draft resolution could drag into next week or beyond.

Draft Iran Resolution Would Restrict Students (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 25 — The United States and three European allies have given Russia and China a draft text for a Security Council resolution against Iran's nuclear program. The proposal includes the extraordinary step of preventing Iranian students from studying nuclear physics at foreign universities and colleges.

The draft resolution would also prohibit any technical or financial assistance that could benefit Iran's nuclear program, and would impose a visa ban on any Iranians involved in nuclear activities, according to European diplomats involved in the negotiations.

Bush administration officials and their European counterparts have been squabbling over details of the draft resolution for the past week, and the horse-trading will probably increase now that the Russians and the Chinese have been given the draft.

United Nations ambassadors from the six countries — the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany — are scheduled to meet Thursday to debate the resolution, officials said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Security Council to move rapidly to adopt the resolution, saying the authority and standing of the international community were at stake.

"For the international community to be credible, it must pass a resolution now that holds Iran accountable for its defiance," Ms. Rice said during a speech on Asia policy at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington policy research organization.

She said that Iran and North Korea had challenged international attempts to halt the proliferation of unconventional weapons, and cautioned that the Iranian leadership was assessing how strictly the world community would enforce recent United Nations sanctions on North Korea.

"The Iranian regime is watching how the world responds to North Korea's behavior, and it can now see that the international community will confront this threat," she said. "Iran can see that the path North Korea is choosing is not leading to more prestige and more prosperity or more security; it's leading to just the opposite."

But after five months of missed deadlines, counterproposals and diplomatic overtures on Iran, few officials from any of the six countries involved were willing to predict when a final sanctions resolution might pass the Security Council. "A matter of weeks," one senior Bush administration official said. "Maybe."

"Will it be the resolution that we would have if we had written it by ourselves? Probably not, but that's part of multilateral diplomacy," Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said. "We fully support this draft, and we look forward to its adoption."

As is customary in diplomatic negotiations, officials who were most up to date on the talks would not allow themselves to be publicly identified by name or nationality. Those who discussed it on background came from several nations involved in the talks.

It was unclear just how far-reaching the proposed ban against nuclear education for Iranian students abroad would be, and the diplomats involved in the negotiations did not seem to have resolved that issue.

The prohibition would ban any training and education of Iranian citizens if it could eventually contribute to nuclear and ballistic missile programs. But whether such a ban would extend to all physics courses, or even to mathematics and other courses, remained undetermined.

The bickering of late has largely been tactical, with the United States on one side and Europe on the other, with both sides trying to decide how best to get the Russians and Chinese to sign on to tough sanctions.

The American ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, for instance demanded that the draft resolution bar Russia from continuing to build Iran's first nuclear power plant — at Bushehr, in the southwest of the country — American and European negotiators said. While some American officials acknowledged that a provision against all work on Bushehr was unrealistic, Mr. Bolton wanted to put it on the table as a bargaining chip to get other Russian concessions, European diplomats said.

The French and British, however, disagreed with that approach, arguing that Bushehr was a "red line" for the Russian foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, and there was no point in putting something in the draft that would come out anyway.

"It's like a flea market," said one European diplomat. "The Americans say, 'We have to make the text even stronger because we know the Russians will water it down.' But that's not a productive way of thinking."

The draft resolution states that sanctions would apply to fuel at Bushehr but not construction, diplomats said.

Iran Said To Be Stepping Up Nuclear Programme (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmeh In Tehran And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Iran was reported on Wednesday to be accelerating its uranium enrichment process even as Europe took the first steps at the United Nations Security Council towards obtaining a resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend its nuclear fuel programme.

Iran's semi-official student news agency, ISNA, quoted an unnamed Iranian official who said a second network, or cascade, of centrifuges used to produce enriched uranium was installed last week, and that injection of the gas feed would take place this week.

"The product of the second cascade will be achieved soon after gas injection," the official said.

Iran began running one cascade of 164 centrifuges at its Natanz facility under UN inspection in January. It denies it has a weapons programme and says the uranium will only be enriched to the low level needed to fuel a civilian nuclear reactor.

Experts in Tehran believe Iran's installation of the second cascade is intended to signal its defiance of sanctions that have been threatened following the Islamic republic's refusal to heed a UN security council demand to suspend the programme that set an August 31 deadline.

"It's a significant part of Iran's policy… to show 'stick policy' will lead only to escalation of [the] crisis and won't hurt Iran's irreversible path," commented Aftab website which is close to Hassan Rowhani, the former nuclear negotiator.

Regime insiders say Iran's top leadership is not particularly worried about nuclear-related sanctions.

On Wednesday France, Germany and the UK – the so-called EU3 that had been negotiating with Iran – presented a draft sanctions resolution to the US, Russia and China for discussion.

Diplomats said one issue at dispute between the EU3 and the US was the future of the Bushehr reactor under construction by Russia in southern Iran. The draft says the "construction" of Bushehr is exempt from the sanctions, but the US has sought to block Russia's planned supply of nuclear fuel next year.

Nicholas Burns, US under secretary of state, said he did not think the Bushehr issue would be a major stumbling block.

The European proposal would seek to prohibit nuclear and ballistic missile cooperation with Iran - unless exempted - by taking "necessary measures" to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of materials and technology. It would also halt related financial transactions, block international travel for Iranians connected to those activities and freeze their overseas assets.

A list is to be drawn up of individuals subject to the travel ban and asset freeze. It is not clear how far up the political hierarchy such a list might go.

Discussions among the five permanent members of the Security Souncil and Germany are to start on Thursday.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, told parliament that the UK was working closely with other veto-wielding Security Council members to get a “proper, binding resolution”.

The US and Europe say the proposed resolution is intended as a first step, and would be followed by steadily escalating measures if Iran did not comply.

At the same time, diplomats are worried that the process could end up replicating the crisis with North Korea whereby Iran would respond to threats by expelling UN inspectors and quitting the nuclear Non Proliferation Treaty. For this reason Europe – including the Russians who have a $1bn contract – are insisting that the Bushehr project should be allowed to continue.

European officials hope negotiations will resume with Iran but on the precondition that it first suspend its enrichment programme.

President George W. Bush reiterated on Wednesday that the US would be ready to join Europe in negotiations following verifiable suspension.

“We’ve got a lot of issues with Iran,” Mr Bush told a news conference. “The first is whether or not they will help this young democracy succeed,” he said, referring to Iraq. He said the “second issue” was whether Iran would help the Lebanese government, and that the “big issue” was “whether or not Iran will end up with a nuclear weapon”.

Secretary Of State ElBaradei (WSJ)

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, is supposed to be the Jack Webb of the nuclear nonproliferation scene, a "just the facts" man who reports his findings to his political superiors in the U.N. Security Council. Lately, however, he's been sounding more like the real life Jimmy Carter than the fictional TV detective.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mr. ElBaradei opined after meeting with Condoleezza Rice on Monday. The director general was talking about North Korea, of whose leaders he took the forgiving view that they are testing nuclear weapons because "they feel isolated, they feel they are not getting the security they need." As for Iran, "the jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon." However, he was quite certain that "at the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran." No doubt Condi was grateful for this free public chiding.

Leave aside for now the substance of Mr. ElBaradei's policy views; at stake here is the question of whether the IAEA can be trusted to be "continuously objective and impartial," words the director general has used elsewhere to describe his organization. That's also the line he took when he was lobbying in 2005 for an unprecedented third term against the opposition of then Undersecretary of State John Bolton, keeping the job after Ms. Rice and the White House acquiesced while asking Mr. ElBaradei to be tough on Iran.

These assurances look disingenuous now that Mr. ElBaradei is offering confident judgments, well above his pay grade, about Kim Jong Il's motives -- and cautious ones about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's. It's even harder to believe given the selective leaks and political hits the IAEA has recently practiced against the Bush Administration and its allies in Congress.

Consider a recent imbroglio between Mr. ElBaradei and Pete Hoekstra, Chairman of the House's Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. In the last year, and initially with bipartisan agreement, Mr. Hoekstra's committee has published regular reports on threats to American security, including on al Qaeda, North Korea and Iran. These reports are generally based on reputable open sources and are intended for broad public distribution and debate. They also repeatedly acknowledge that "the United States . . . [lacks] critical information needed for analysts to make some key judgments."

In other words, there's not much to get worked up about here. At least not until the IAEA decided to leak to the press an ostensibly private letter to Mr. Hoekstra detailing its objections to a report on Iran, which the agency variously labeled "outrageous," "dishonest," "erroneous" and "misleading."

And what was so dreadful about the report, which had bipartisan blessing? Aside from huffing over two committee "errors" -- one of them trivial, the other semantic -- the IAEA took furious exception over the committee's statement that the IAEA had decided to remove Chris Charlier, its chief weapons' inspector for Iran, after Mr. Charlier said publicly that he thought the Iranians were intent on building a nuclear weapon.

The IAEA insists that it was Iran, not the IAEA, that demanded Mr. Charlier's removal, and that Iran is within its legal rights to do so. That's true. But it is also true that Iran has repeatedly -- and illegally -- denied IAEA inspectors the multiple-entry visas they need to do their job.

"Iran has consistently been in non-compliance with its safeguards agreement on this point," a former IAEA official recently told the Platts news agency. "And until now the IAEA has been unwilling to draw international attention to that fact." Our sources tell us that, in addition to Mr. Charlier, Iran denied entry to two other IAEA weapons inspectors in August alone.

This is no small thing. Under Mr. ElBaradei's leadership the IAEA has presented itself as the ultimate arbiter on questions of nuclear proliferation, despite its failures to detect Iraq's nuclear-weapons programs in the 1980s and Libya's in the early part of this decade. Yet if the IAEA cannot get its personnel unimpeded into Iran -- and especially if Iran can bar the toughest, most skeptical inspectors -- the quality of the IAEA's information and the reliability of its judgments are bound to deteriorate.

Had Mr. ElBaradei been doing his real job, he might have made a more strenuous effort at pointing out publicly Iran's failures to comply with its obligations, rather than offer grand pronouncements on diplomacy and making partisan intrusions into American politics by critiquing Congressional white papers and Administration policy. As it is, we have Mr. Hoekstra to thank for bringing to light yet another instance of Iran's bad faith, and of the U.N.'s unreliability.

Iranian Ex-Leader Sought In Argentina (WP/AP)

By Oscar Serrat

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Oct. 25 -- Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven other people in the 1994 suicide bombing of a Jewish community center here that killed 85 people.

The decision to attack the center "was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran," prosecutor Alberto Nisman said at a news conference. He said the actual attack was entrusted to the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah.

The detonation of an explosives-laden vehicle near the Jewish center in Buenos Aires was among the worst terrorist attacks ever on Argentine soil. In addition to killing 85 people, the attack injured more than 200.

Iran's government has vehemently denied any involvement in the bombing, following repeated accusations by Jewish community leaders and others here. Iranian authorities in Buenos Aires declined to comment.

Prosecutors urged the judge to seek international and national arrest orders for Rafsanjani, who was Iran's president from 1989 to 1997. They also asked the judge to detain former intelligence chief Ali Fallahijan and former foreign minister Ali Akbar Velayati.

In addition, they urged the arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief for external affairs.

Nisman and fellow prosecutor Marcelo MartÃ-nez Burgos said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only "under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran."

Federal Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral made no public comments after the news conference. Under Argentine law, the judge is allowed an indefinite period to accept or reject such recommendations.

The two prosecutors head a special investigative unit probing the attack on the Jewish center, since rebuilt into a heavily guarded fortress-like compound.

Nisman announced in November 2005 that investigators believed a 21-year-old Lebanese member of Hezbollah was the suicide bomber.

The attack on the seven-story center, a symbol of Argentina's more than 200,000-strong Jewish population, was the second of two attacks against Jews in Argentina during the 1990s.

In March 1992, a blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires. Twenty-nine people died in that attack, which has also been blamed on Hezbollah.

Some people here speculated that the embassy bombing was inspired by Argentina's support for the U.S.-led coalition that expelled Iraqi forces from Kuwait during the Persian Gulf War in 1991. Others said Argentina's Jewish community, one of the largest in Latin America, represented an obvious target for Israel's opponents.

Although Jewish community leaders and others have said they suspect the involvement of Middle East terrorists in the 1994 attack, lack of progress in tracking down the organizers has made families of the victims increasingly bitter. In 2004, about a dozen former police officers and an accused trafficker in stolen vehicles were acquitted of charges that they had formed a "local connection" in the bombing.

Argentina Seeks Arrest Of Former Iranian Leader (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine prosecutors asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the arrest of former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven others in the 1994 bombing of a Jewish cultural center that killed 85.

The decision to attack the center "was undertaken in 1993 by the highest authorities of the then-government of Iran," prosecutor Alberto Nisman said. He said the attack was carried out by the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah.

The bombing of the Jewish cultural center in Buenos Aires killed 85 people and injured more than 200 when a vehicle laden with explosives detonated near the building. It was the worst terrorist attack in Argentine history.

Iran's government has vehemently denied any involvement in the attack following repeated accusations by Jewish community and other leaders here. Iranian authorities here contacted by the Associated Press had no comment.

Prosecutors urged the judge to seek international and national arrest orders for Rafsanjani, Iran's president from 1989 to 1997. They also asked the judge to detain other former Iranian officials, including an intelligence chief, Ali Fallahijan, and a foreign minister, Ali Ar Velayati.

The prosecutors urged the arrest of two former commanders of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, two former Iranian diplomats and a former Hezbollah security chief.

Nisman and fellow prosecutor Marcelo Martinez Burgos said they suspected that Hezbollah undertook activities outside Lebanon only "under orders directly emanating from the regime in Tehran."

Federal Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral had no comment. He has an indefinite amount of time to accept or reject the recommendations.

The current investigation began after Argentina's federal courts in 2004 halted a botched investigation into the case.

Nisman announced last November that investigators believed a suspected 21-year-old Lebanese Hezbollah militant had been identified as the suicide bomber.

Jewish center leaders said Wednesday that they had no immediate statement.

The attack on the seven-story Jewish center, a symbol of Argentina's more than 200,000-strong Jewish population, was the second of two attacks targeting Jews in Argentina during the 1990s.

Argentine Prosecutor Ties Iran To Bombing Of Jewish Center (MCT)

By Claudia Sanchez, Jack Chang And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina - An Argentine prosecutor on Wednesday sought the arrest of former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, accusing him of approving the 1994 car bombing that killed 85 people at a Jewish community center in the Argentine capital.

Prosecutor Alberto Nisman charged that six other Iranians and a Lebanese were involved in the attack, including a top Hezbollah figure, Imad Fayez Mugniyah. Mugniyah is already wanted by the United States for allegedly plotting the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut and the 1985 hijacking of a TWA airliner, which resulted in the murder of U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem.

Nisman said the accused met on Aug. 13, 1993, in Mashad, one of Iran's holiest cities, to approve the attack. He charged that the plot involved not only top political officials, but also lower-level diplomats in the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires.

"It wasn't a decision taken around a coffee table one day to the next by five or six gentlemen," said Nisman. He called it a well-calculated plan that was part of a "terrorist matrix" that included assassinations in France, Germany and Switzerland.

Nisman is the first Argentine official to publicly accuse officials in Tehran of involvement in the attack, which many here consider the Argentine equivalent of Sept. 11, and his charges lend credence to longstanding American claims that Iran and Hezbollah are sponsors of international terrorism.

But they aren't likely to result in arrests anytime soon. Judge Rodolfo Canicoba Corral must first approve Nisman's findings and issue arrest warrants. Then Argentina would have to seek the suspects' extradition from Iran - a request Iran is unlikely to honor.

Warrants could, however, prevent the suspects from traveling freely outside Iran; they'd be subject to arrest under international police agreements.

Nisman, who spoke to reporters in Buenos Aires, released few details of his investigation. A full report was given to Canicoba on a CD because of the volume of the material. It's unknown when Canicoba will rule on the matter.

How Nisman traced the bombing to a specific meeting attended by Rafsanjani is also unknown. In Washington, Vincent Cannistraro, a former head of counterterrorism operations and analysis for the CIA, said he doesn't know of anyone who can confirm the meeting.

"From an intelligence point of view, we know Mugniyah directed the operation," Cannistraro said. "There's been no confirmation of any meeting. ... No one has that precise intelligence. I do know there is not a hard source that is credible and attended that meeting."

Rafsanjani was the president of Iran from 1989 to 1997 and remains a powerful political force there. He ran for president last year, but was defeated by the current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He currently serves as chairman of the Expediency Discernment Council, a powerful body that attempts to resolve policy differences between the government and the clerics who must approve all government actions.

In 1997, German prosecutors said they believed Rafsanjani ordered the murder of an Iranian-Kurdish leader there, but Rafsanjani was never charged.

Rafsanjani also was the go-between in the arms-for-hostages deals that gave rise to the Iran-contra affair during Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Mugniyah has an extensive terrorist resume. He was indicted in the United States for Stethem's murder and is on the European Union's list of most wanted terrorists. He's variously described as Hezbollah's head of security and a founder of the organization. In addition to the Marines barracks bombing, he's thought to have been involved in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut and the kidnapping of journalist Terry Anderson there.

The United States has offered a $5 million reward for his capture.

The bombing of the AMIA Jewish center here has remained an open wound, with accusations of bungling and cover-ups being levied against successive Argentine governments. The only people tried in the case were two Argentine police officers accused of helping terrorists obtain a van used to carry a hidden bomb. Both were cleared.

Adding to the mystery, a former Iranian spy alleged in 2003 that Carlos Saul Menem, Argentina's president at the time of the bombing, received $10 million in a secret Swiss bank account as payment from Iran to quash the investigation. Menem, of Syrian descent, acknowledged the secret account but denied the hush money.

Later that same year, as Argentina tried to have Great Britain extradite Hadi Soleimanpour, Iran's former ambassador to Argentina, news reports emerged that the chief Argentine judge investigating the bombing - Juan Jose Galeano - paid a witness $400,000 for testimony and that he was writing a book on the case. He was removed from the case in 2004, and Nisman was appointed to investigate.

Against that backdrop, families of the victims had their doubts Wednesday.

"After more than 12 years, we had hoped for more results," said Sofia Guterman, whose 28-year-old daughter, Andrea, perished in the attack, which also injured more than 200. "I don't think it'll be very easy to extradite those people."

Lawyers representing the victims were a bit more upbeat. Marta Nercellas, who's investigated the Iranian connection even when her government wouldn't, told McClatchy Newspapers that there's new evidence in Nisman's case.

Nercellas said Nisman's report includes testimony from former Iranian spies and ex-Hezbollah fighters who now reside in Europe.

"There are new and different testimonies," she said.

McClatchy Newspapers special correspondent Sanchez reported from Buenos Aires, Chang from Rio de Janeiro and Hall from Washington.

Rice Presses South Korea On Sanctions (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded South Korea on Wednesday to show a strong commitment to international sanctions imposed against North Korea for its nuclear test this month.

Rice said the U.S. has no wish to tell Seoul how it should coexist with its neighbor and noted the vigorous debate in South Korea over the future of its "sunshine policy" of partial rapprochement.

But she said North Korea's test of a nuclear device Oct. 9 "requires a strong response," and said that adherence to a U.N. resolution banning the sale of weapons material, luxury goods and more to North Korea is key. The sanctions also seek interception of ships believed to be carrying suspect materials.

"It requires a strong commitment by South Korea," she told the conservative Heritage Foundation. "Any activities need to be seen in the light of making certain to implement that resolution."

South Korea so far has balked at taking strong measures to support the sanctions, mindful of Pyongyang's massive armed forces poised at the border, its family and cultural ties with the North and its wish to expand economic relations with its neighbor.

"We understand that this is a complicated set of issues for South Korea," she said. "South Koreans don't need us to tell them what to do about their policies."

Rice returned Sunday from a weeklong trip to Asia and Moscow to line up support for the U.N. resolution, approved five days after the North's nuclear test.

DOJ_NMG_0086887

"North Korea's behavior poses a regional challenge and it must be addressed in a regional context," she said. "South Korea must be part of the solution, as should Japan and China and Russia.

"These countries all share an interest in a denuclearized Korean Peninsula. They all have leverage to help bring it about. And they must all accept their share of the responsibility to help," Rice said.

S. Korea Official Quits Over North Policy (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

SEOUL -- South Korea's unification minister resigned yesterday, the highest-profile casualty yet in a battle over the government's North Korea policy after an Oct. 9 nuclear test by Pyongyang.

"I am confident about the results our North Korean engagement policy achieved," said Lee Jong-seok, who became unification minister in February.

A strong advocate of engagement and reconciliation with the communist North, Mr. Lee said, "Faced with North Korea's nuclear test, I apologize to the people and to the president."

He said efforts to achieve "peace and security and inter-Korean reconciliation on the peninsula are being recklessly politicized."

Policy toward North Korea has been the subject of fierce debate after Pyongyang's underground nuclear detonation.

In the immediate wake of the test -- conducted despite repeated warnings from Seoul -- opinion polls suggested a strong public reaction against the government's engagement policy toward the North.

Other key supporters of the policy also are departing the government of President Roh Moo-hyun.

Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung resigned Monday, citing strained negotiations over the command of U.S. forces during wartime, and Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, the U.N. secretary-general-designate, is expected to depart his post in the near future.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted sanctions against North Korea less than a week after the nuclear test, but South Korea has been reluctant to punish Pyongyang for fear of angering the often-hostile neighbor.

South Korean investments, which have earned the North about $1 billion in foreign currency, are under scrutiny.

The main projects include a South Korean-financed industrial park and a South Korean tourist project in the North.

North Korea yesterday warned the South not to participate in the U.N. sanctions, calling it a "declaration of confrontation against its own people" and threatening to "take corresponding measures" if the South goes along.

The sanctions include a requirement to inspect cargo ships thought to be holding missile- and nuclear-related materials.

President Bush dismissed the North's rhetoric.

"The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Mr. Bush told reporters in Washington, referring to the North's Kim Jong-il.

Kim Myung-whai of the Institute of Korean Studies noted the shift in public opinion since the nuclear test.

"The engagement policy is not popular among people; many politicians and the public think it has to be changed," he said.

Peter Beck, who heads the International Crisis Group's Seoul office, said there is little evidence that South Korea's government will change its policy toward the North.

"Government seems unwilling to link North-South cooperation with the broader goal of putting an end to North Korea's nuclear arms," Mr. Beck said.

Rice Plays Down Veiled Putin Criticism Of US Handling Of NKorea Crisis (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 26, 2006

The United States brushed aside a complaint by Russian President Vladimir Putin that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon because it had been backed into a corner by its rivals.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met Putin last week in Moscow, said she had extensive discussions on the North Korean issue with Russian leaders and agreed on the need to implement UN sanctions against Pyongyang over its October 9 test.

The goal of the resolution, she said, is to force North Korea back into six-party talks on giving up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and improved relations with the international community.

"It is true that people are concerned that North Korea have a path out if it decides to choose that path out," she said when asked about Putin's remarks during an appearance at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank.

"And I think we have established that there is indeed a path, which is the six-party talks -- that all North Korea needs to do is return to those and return to them seriously," she said.

In what was seen as veiled criticism of the aggressive US policy on North Korea, Putin said earlier on Russian television that one of the reasons Pyongyang chose to set off its first nuclear explosion was that "not all participants in the (six-party) talks process could find the right tone in the talks".

"You never need to push a situation into a dead end. You never put one of the participants in negotiations in such a situation where it has almost no exit, except one -- to escalate the situation," Putin said.

Rice played down the remarks.

"I don't read anything into concerns that you worry about North Korea being locked into a corner, because everybody understands that they've got to implement the resolution," she said.

The six-party talks include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea, the United States and North Korea.

Tokyo Denies Report It Wants Nuke Meet (AP)

By Hans Greimel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 26, 2006

Japan's foreign ministry Thursday denied a news report that the government is planning a meeting with the U.S. and South Korea as early as next month to solidify a common stance on the North Korean nuclear standoff.

The report comes amid growing concerns that South Korea has been hesitant to join the United States and Japan in punishing North Korea for conducting its first-ever nuclear test earlier this month.

Kyodo News agency, citing unidentified government officials, said the meeting among the allies will likely be held in Seoul, the South Korean capital, and include the nations' chief delegates on the North Korean nuclear crisis.

The goal is to lay the groundwork for working-level meetings with the three and Russia and China, on the sidelines of November's Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam, Kyodo said.

Japan wants the trilateral meeting to reaffirm the demand that the North Korean nuclear crisis be resolved through six-party talks that include North Korea, South Korea, the United States, Japan, China and Russia, according to the report.

A Foreign Ministry spokeswoman denied the report. She spoke on condition of anonymity, citing ministry protocol.

North Korea has rejected the six-party format, saying it first wants the United States to lift financial restrictions imposed against the country. It has also been pushing for direct bilateral talks with Washington, a demand the United States has refused.

On Wednesday, South Korea said it formed a task force to look at how to impose U.N. sanctions on North Korea for its nuclear test, while the communist nation warned it would take countermeasures against any such move by the South.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution sanctioning the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear test, but South Korea — a major aid provider to the impoverished North — has been reluctant to adopt stern measures against its volatile neighbor.

The U.N. resolution calls for all member countries to state how they plan to implement sanctions on the North within 30 days from its Oct. 14 adoption.

Later Wednesday, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gently prodded Seoul to show a strong commitment to the sanctions.

N. Korea Warns South Against Sanctions (AP-Y)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, October 26, 2006

North Korea warned South Korea against joining international sanctions, saying Wednesday that its neighbor would "pay a high price" if it joins the U.S.-led drive to punish the reclusive communist nation for its nuclear test.

The statement from the North's Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland came as South Korea struggles to determine how it should enforce the U.N. sanctions, including whether to help interdict North Korean cargo ships suspected of transporting materials for unconventional weapons.

"If the South Korean authorities end up joining U.S.-led moves to sanction and stifle (the North) we will regard it as a declaration of confrontation against its own people ... and take corresponding measures," the North's Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of the Fatherland said in a statement.

President Bush dismissed North Korea's threats, saying leader Kim Jong Il was probing for weaknesses in the international community.

"The leader of North Korea likes to threaten," Bush told reporters in Washington. "In my judgment, what he's doing is testing the will of the five countries that are working together to convince him there's a better way forward for his people."

The U.N. Security Council unanimously adopted a sanctions resolution five days after the North's Oct. 9 test, and a South Korean task force met this week to determine how the country should address the measures, including what to do about joint economic projects with the North.

South Korea's participation in the sanctioning the North is important because the country is one of the main aid providers to the impoverished communist nation, along with China.

But both countries have been reluctant to impose stern measures against their volatile neighbor. China, North Korea's closest ally, voted for the U.N. resolution but is concerned that excessive measures could worsen the situation. South Korea has expressed similar concerns, although there was no immediate response to Wednesday's statement from North Korea.

"If North-South relations collapse due to reckless and imprudent sanctions against us the South Korean authorities will be fully responsible for it and will have to pay a high price," said the statement, carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

A top U.S. diplomat said North Korea's test has brought China and the United States closer together and both countries want a unified response.

"China has been in a very important relationship with us for many years and at no time did we feel any closer together with China than we felt in the wake of the North Korea provocation," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told reporters during a meeting of Pacific leaders in Fiji.

"I think the Chinese understand that the North Korean ... decision to proceed with a nuclear weapons program is really something quite beyond the pale and something we need to all speak with one voice about," said Hill, the chief U.S. envoy to six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

The U.N. resolution gave member countries 30 days from its Oct. 14 adoption to report on implementing the sanctions.

The South Korean panel, which met for the first time Tuesday, also is trying to decide how to handle the interdiction of North Korean cargo ships and what to do about the economic projects that have been criticized for providing hard currency to the North. The United States suspects the funds might have helped the North's arms programs.

One is a tourism program run by South Korea at North Korea's Diamond Mountain and the other is a South Korean-run industrial complex in the North Korean city of Kaesong. The North has received at least $900 million under the projects since the 1990s.

South Korea prizes the projects as symbols of reconciliation and has been unwilling to halt them. But it plans to make adjustments to meet Seoul's requirements under the U.N. sanctions.

Also at issue was whether South Korea would expand its participation in a U.S.-led drive to interdict North Korean ships and aircraft suspected of carrying weapons of mass destruction or related material.

South Korea has been reluctant to participate fully in the Proliferation Security Initiative because of concerns it could lead to clashes with North Korea and undermine efforts to persuade the communist state to give up its nuclear ambitions through diplomacy.

South Korea has only sent observers and attended briefings on the program.

South Korean Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok, a strong supporter of engagement with North Korea, offered to resign Wednesday because of the nuclear test. Critics have accused Lee of being too supportive of North Korea, but even if his resignation is accepted, it is not likely to lead to any immediate change in the South's engagement policy.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, meanwhile, also warned that pressuring the North could backfire.

"One should never lead the situation into an impasse, one should never put one of the negotiating sides in a position from which it virtually has no way out but one: an escalation of the situation," Putin said in televised comments broadcast in Moscow.

A U.S. Embassy In Pyongyang (WSJ)

By Henry S. Rowen

The Wall Street Journal, October 26, 2006

The United Nations sanctions on North Korea are useful, but unless China and South Korea change their policies, these sanctions will not have much effect on Pyongyang's weapons programs. On the contrary, be braced for more North Korean tests.

Beijing, with an assist from Seoul, has been keeping the North on life support. If it saw Pyongyang's programs as seriously damaging to its own interests, it has the means to stop them. While the Chinese say they told Kim Jong Il not to do it, they don't want chaos in North Korea with millions of refugees coming across the border; and they don't want American forces on their border, either. We and the South Koreans urgently need to discuss these matters with the Chinese -- along with the contingency known, colloquially, as "loose nukes."

A few years ago, some of us thought that Beijing would block the North's nuclear weapons because these programs would put pressure on the Japanese to get weapons of their own. Do the Chinese believe that Japan will get nuclear weapons anyway, or is that they do not care what Tokyo does? It's a puzzle.

There are some coincident, and some conflicting, interests between Washington and Beijing, but there is a larger anomaly: The country with the greatest influence in North Korea is China, while the one most at risk (so we think) is the U.S. A serious divergence of perceived interests here would not be good for either of us. As someone who regards the China-U.S. relationship as basically win-win, it is distressing to contemplate the possibility of members of Congress coming to see China's help to North Korea as supporting a major security threat to the U.S.

South Korea has been part of the problem. Residents of Seoul are ever conscious of their vulnerability to shelling from across the DMZ. Seoul also wants to avoid chaos in the North and is trying to open it up economically and politically. And it sees itself competing with China for influence there. All this has led to large subsidies to the North under its "sunshine policy," without much to show for it. The South supports a regime whose weapons can destroy it and threaten its protector, the U.S. Worse, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun evidently sees the U.S as more dangerous than the North. There is the potential here for a disastrous breach between Washington and Seoul.

Matters are now in flux. Even before the test, Mr. Roh and his Uri party had become very unpopular. According to a post-test poll by the JoongAng Ilbo daily, 65% of respondents said they favor South Korea getting nuclear weapons and that the policy of engaging the North had failed. These views might not last, but if they persist maybe sunshine subsidies will be cut and support for a South Korean bomb will build.

This situation is now so serious that we and the South Koreans need to work hard to come together. What should we try to accomplish regarding the North's weapons? Having worked on them for over 30 years, getting nuclear weapons seems to be in the North's DNA, although it has been expressed in fits and starts over time. The Kim family's chosen isolation, with attendant poverty and growing military weakness, has made WMDs central to its survival.

These weapons pose two main dangers to us. One is a nuclear attack by the North -- which would result in its destruction. The other, much greater, threat is the sale of weapons materials to anyone who will pay. Therefore, President Bush has said that while the U.S. has no intention of attacking North Korea, "the transfer of nuclear weapons or material . . . to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action." Think, although not exclusively, of Iran and Hezbollah, with the U.S. and Israel as the prime targets.

Without a change in position by Beijing and Seoul, there is little chance of getting rid of the North's weapons. Another challenge, with better odds, is stopping the completion of the large reactor under construction, that will make much more plutonium available for sale. If it comes into production, we face the daunting task of deterring sales -- a task for which we would need help from many others, including the Chinese, as well as military options. * * *

What about diplomacy? It is elementary that we need both sticks and carrots in such a situation. In 1994, the credible threat of an American attack on its Yongbyon reactor, combined with a package of benefits, produced an agreement that slowed the North's program for nearly a decade. (Though it didn't keep Pyongyang from circumventing it by starting a uranium enrichment effort -- it's that DNA again.)

More immediately relevant sticks include not only the Security Council endorsed sanctions, but also our actions against banks that help the North's counterfeiting and other nefarious financial transactions, as well as our efforts to disrupt sales of drugs and arms. They are good in themselves, and add some muscle to diplomacy.

The Bush administration must find it irritating to be told by such lightweights as Kofi Annan that it should deal directly with Kim Jong Il (although more substantial figures such as James Baker are also saying this). Despite such endorsements, this position should be taken seriously. The administration's stance that the North's neighbors, who are in the six-party talks, should be at the table, is correct but incomplete.

There are two distinct propositions here. One is having diplomatic relations with Pyongyang. We should have them with every state, no matter how evil. We did it with Stalin's Soviet Union, but don't want to with Kim Jong Il's North Korea. An American delegation in Pyongyang might find itself isolated; but it might learn some things, and having a presence in what looks like an inherently unstable country could have a useful payoff if parts start to break loose.

As for one-on-one negotiations, there is a case for naming an experienced political heavyweight as our negotiator (enter the name of your favorite candidate here). Most of the items on the agenda have been around for some time, but it would be foolish to pretend that nothing major has occurred, and that there aren't new items such as the sanctions. This is an unsettled time with dangers and perhaps opportunities. Expectations need to be kept under control, but the game of getting something useful in exchange for giving something should not be scorned.

Of course, there is the argument that to do such things now signals that any state that sets off a bomb or launches a long-range missile can win recognition from us. Avoiding such awkwardness is a good reason for dealing with everybody in the first place, and, in the present instance, for having skilled diplomats to manage our switch.

Bush Pushes For Trade Agreement (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 26, 2006

President Bush and the leader of the Dominican Republic agreed on Wednesday to jump-start a delayed free trade agreement to remove barriers to commerce between the two nations.

In an Oval Office meeting, Bush told Leonel Fernandez, the president of the Caribbean nation, that the United States will implement the Central American Free Trade Agreement as soon as possible.

"To that end, I had my trade minister, Ambassador Susan Schwab here, to make sure that we both heard the message of the president — that this was a very important piece of legislation," Bush said.

The Dominican Republic is one of six Latin American signatories to CAFTA, which is part of the administration's push to strike free trade deals with nations around the world as a way to boost U.S. exports. The free trade agreement has taken effect in Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and El Salvador, but not in Costa Rica or the Dominican Republic.

The pact was supposed to take effect in the Dominican Republic on Jan. 1, but the country has not passed legislation needed to implement parts of the deal. Some of the delays stem from conflicts between U.S. and Dominican intellectual property law, including issues related to pharmaceutical manufacturing.

"We are now in the final phase," Fernandez said. "This is a bill now before our own congress in the Dominican Republic. We are dealing with some minor legal amendments, and our two teams have been working very hard to obtain a speedy implementation."

After the meeting, Fernandez talked with reporters about the open Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council.

There is a deadlock between Guatemala and Venezuela, which are bidding for the spot, and the Dominican Republic is on a list of compromise candidates. Guatemala has led Venezuela in nearly three dozen rounds of voting, but it can't muster the necessary two-thirds majority in the 192-nation General Assembly to win the seat. Venezuela has refused to withdraw, saying that would mean ceding victory to the United States, which has campaigned against it.

"After 35 consecutive rounds with no result, obviously it's causing a degree of concern," Fernandez told reporters outside the West Wing. "Up to this end, the Dominican Republic was not formally asked to be a candidate. We will be watching how the events evolve in the future."

Putin Promises To Remain Influential (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 — President Vladimir V. Putin, a former spy who is still popular in Russia after six years in office, said Wednesday that he would continue to “influence the life in our country” after his second term is up in 2008, but that he would not run for president again.

Mr. Putin said he would step down “even though I like my work.” Although a third consecutive term is forbidden under Russia’s 1993 Constitution, his supporters have called for a referendum to do away with that ban.

Though there is much speculation about his future, Mr. Putin did not elaborate during a televised question-and-answer session for Russian citizens.

The town-hall-style show has become an annual tradition in Russian politics under Mr. Putin, at a time when many forms of political expression are no longer possible. He said he used the call-in show to respond directly to voters.

Operators screened roughly a million calls, e-mail and cellphone text messages and passed a few dozen to Mr. Putin to answer during the nearly three-hour program.

Most were bread-and-butter domestic issues, like teachers’ and doctors’ salaries. But he also weighed in on the sexual-assault charges facing Israel’s president and chided North Korea for testing a nuclear device near Russia’s border.

Early on in the program, Arkady Kokayev, a truck driver from the steppe town of Podgornaya-Pokrovka, asked Mr. Putin, “What will happen to us and this country after you leave?”

“Arkady, I think everything will be all right,” Mr. Putin said, striking a folksy tone.

DOJ_NMG_0086892

"As for myself, as I have said, the Constitution — even though I like my work — the Constitution does not give me the right to stand for a third consecutive term," Mr. Putin said.

He went on to say: "I shall be able to retain the most important thing that a man in politics should value: your confidence. And using it, you and I, we shall be able to influence the life in our country."

It was a strong hint that Mr. Putin, who has quashed most dissent here, would remain in politics in some fashion after 2008. Analysts say Mr. Putin has several options, including assuming the leadership of the party he founded, United Russia, becoming speaker of Parliament or the chairman of Gazprom.

Later in the program, Mr. Putin revisited some puzzling, coarse comments he made in a meeting with the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, last week. A microphone inadvertently left on captured Mr. Putin saying of President Moshe Katsav of Israel, who faces rape and assault charges: "He turned out to be quite a powerful man. He raped 10 women. I never expected it from him. He surprised all of us. We all envy him."

A Kremlin spokesman at the time characterized Mr. Putin's words as a joke that lost its humor in translation. Mr. Putin on Wednesday did not dispute the quotation but suggested that journalists reported a remark not intended to be public.

"In regard to representatives of the press, I can say, as we joked when I worked for an entirely different organization," Mr. Putin said in reference to his time at the K.G.B., "they were sent to peek but eavesdropped instead. It's not proper."

Mr. Putin condemned violence against women, but said that "The Israeli instance is special" and ventured that it was a form of political fallout after the war in Lebanon this summer.

"In my view, and many experts agree with me, a significant part of Israeli society was not satisfied with their leadership's action in the Lebanon conflict," Mr. Putin said. "Using instruments like defense of women's rights to solve unrelated political questions is unacceptable."

On other foreign policy matters, Mr. Putin criticized North Korea for testing a nuclear device about 100 miles from the Russian border, but he assured Russians that the prevailing winds in North Korea blew out to sea.

On Georgia, he said that Russia recognized its territorial integrity but noted that two separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia, were not historically part of Georgia when that country was annexed by the Russian empire. He said Georgia's attempts to regain control would lead to "bloodshed."

Mr. Putin demonstrated his trademark command of details and numbers. He said that Russia's economy was growing at a fast clip — 6.6 percent so far this year — but that it had failed to diversify away from dependence on oil and gas.

He also vowed to solve a string of recent contract murders, including the slaying of Anna Politkovskaya, an investigative journalist. He said, however, that murder for hire, the ultimate Russian system of settling disputes, had declined under his watch as the authorities became more successful at solving the crimes.

Putin Says He'll Retain Influence In Russia After Term Ends In '08 (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 25 -- With his trademark indefatigability and command of detail, President Vladimir Putin fielded questions from Russians for nearly three hours Wednesday in an annual televised session that has become a ritual of presidential stagecraft here.

Putin, who has sworn off amending the constitution to allow himself a third term, reiterated his determination to step down in 2008 but said he would continue to influence the country's direction.

"Even having lost the powers and the levers of presidential power and not tailoring the basic law according to my personal interests, I will manage to retain the most important thing that a person involved in politics must cherish -- your trust," Putin said. "And using that, you and I will be able to exert influence on the life of our country and guarantee its development."

Each year, Russians are invited to send in questions by e-mail, phone and text message for Putin to answer, and this year more than 2 million questions poured in. Putin selects some questions, and others are chosen by the two national television stations that broadcast the event. People from across Russia also pose questions live.

The session reinforces the popular perception here of Putin as an open, capable and responsive leader. The latest opinion poll by the independent Levada Center gave the president a 77 percent approval rating.

Many questions dealt with local or bread-and-butter issues, and Putin, speaking directly into the camera without notes, cited one fact or statistic after another to highlight progress in areas from medical care to road-building. Answering a question about the poor quality of roads in Russia's Far East, for instance, he recalled that a black gravel layer was being laid on the Chita-Khabarovsk highway and that an asphalt layer would be finished by 2010.

On Georgia, Putin said Russia's policies toward its southern neighbor were primarily motivated by a desire to prevent bloodshed over the status of two breakaway regions of Georgia that are seeking independence. Georgia has accused Russia of fueling separatism in those zones.

Putin condemned the targeting of Georgians living here by Russian law enforcement agencies, which a Russian television anchor called a "hunt" after reports that police were demanding lists of schoolchildren with Georgian names.

"You know the Russian saying, 'Make a fool pray to God, and he will smash his head praying,' " Putin said. "I cannot approve of selective actions on ethnic grounds. On the contrary, I am calling on all law enforcement bodies and administrative bodies to refrain from such actions."

Human rights groups have charged that Putin inflamed passions here when he said that wholesale markets, where many members of ethnic minorities work, should be monitored "to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population."

Putin said contract killings, the bane of Russian life in the 1990s, had declined in recent years, despite the murders in the past two months of a central banker, a leading journalist and a mayoral candidate.

"The obligation of the state is to bring any such investigation to the end. This concerns the killings of mass media representatives and killings in the economic sphere," Putin said.

Putin also said jocular comments he made about allegations that Israeli President Moshe Katsav had raped 10 women were reported by journalists who "were already leaving the room and heard only dimly what was said about it and then they started speculating on the topic." He said he condemns violence against women.

During a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last week, Putin was reported by the Russian newspaper Kommersant to have said: "Greetings to your president. What a powerful man he turns out to be! He raped 10 women. I would never have expected this from him. He surprised us all. We all envy him."

On Wednesday, Putin said: "Ten women announced there that the president had raped them, and corruption allegations have recently been leveled at the prime minister. In my view, this can be explained by the fact that a significant number of Israelis are dissatisfied with their leadership's actions in the conflict with Lebanon."

As for the journalists who overheard him, Putin, a former KGB officer, said: "I could tell you a joke that we used when I worked in an absolutely different outfit: They were sent to keep an eye on us, and instead they are eavesdropping on us. It's a shame."

Putin Hints At His Political Future (FT)

By Neil Buckley In Moscow

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

Vladimir Putin, Russian president, said on Wednesday he would retain influence in the country even after he steps down as president in 2008, hinting at a possible continuing political role.

Answering Russian viewers' questions during a three-hour TV phone-in, Mr Putin reiterated that he would not seek to change the constitution to enable him to stand for a third presidential term "even though I like the job".

"But even when I no longer have governing power and the levers of presidential rule, I think that, without adjusting the fundamental law to my personal interests, I will be able to keep your trust," he told a questioner from southern Russia. "And, using that, we will together be able to influence life in our country, guarantee its further development, and exert influence on what happens in Russia."

Mr Putin still enjoys 75 per cent approval ratings after six years as president and will be only 55 when he steps down. Analysts said his comments suggested he might aspire to the kind of guiding role Deng Ziaoping played in China from the late 1970s to the early 1990s.

Vyacheslav Nikonov, a political consultant close to the Kremlin, noted on Russia Today news channel the constitution would allow Mr Putin to stand for president in 2012 after a four-year break.

"He can be a politician for quite a while, like Winston Churchill, for example, who was the leading politician in Britain for half a century, coming back and forth ... or comrade Deng Xiaoping," Mr Nikonov said.

Mr Putin told reporters after the broadcast he would name a suggested successor in due course but "the Russian people must decide who is the strongest candidate".

Speculation centres on two deputy prime ministers – Dmitry Medvedev, who heads several multi-billion dollar social development programmes, and Sergei Ivanov, defence minister – as likely successors. But analysts believe a dark horse candidate could emerge, such as Vladimir Yakunin, head of Russian railways and a friend of the president.

Much of Mr Putin's annual phone-in was devoted to domestic policy, with the president highlighting Russia's continued strong economic growth, forecast at 6.6 per cent this year. But venturing into foreign policy, Mr Putin insisted Russia's suspension of transport links with neighbouring Georgia was not a punishment for the former Soviet republic's ambitions to join Nato.

He said Moscow's actions were aimed at ensuring Georgia did not try to use military force to regain control of two Russian-backed separatist regions, South Ossetia and Abkhazia.

Putin Vows Not To Seek 3rd Term (WT/AP)

By Henry Meyer

The Washington Times, October 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin reaffirmed yesterday that he would not try to run for another term but said he would retain influence over Russia even after leaving office in 2008.

The immensely popular Mr. Putin is constitutionally barred from seeking a third consecutive term, but supporters have called for a referendum to amend the country's laws to allow him to stay in power.

"Despite the fact that I like my job, the constitution doesn't allow me to run a third time in a row," Mr. Putin said during a nationally televised question-and-answer session.

With his popularity high, Mr. Putin sees the session -- his fifth since taking office in 2000 -- as an opportunity to show that he can respond directly to voters' concerns. He said the trust that Russians have in him will allow him to keep influencing the country after his presidency.

"Even having lost the powers and the levers of presidential power and not tailoring the basic law according to my personal interests, I will manage to retain the most important thing that a person involved in politics must cherish -- your trust," he said. "And using that, you and I will be able to exert influence on the life of our country and guarantee its development."

After the question-and-answer session, Russian news agencies quoted Mr. Putin as telling reporters that he was not prepared to name his successor but that when he was, he would make his choice known through the press.

Speculation on the successor is focused on Defense Minister Sergey Ivanov and Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev.

The Russian leader also hailed the oil-rich country's robust economic growth rate of about 7 percent and vowed that the killers of a top Central Bank regulator and a well-known investigative journalist would be brought to justice.

During the broadcast, Mr. Putin reeled off statistics, chided North Korea for its nuclear test, pledged to protect agricultural producers and vowed that his government would strictly monitor all companies, including foreign ones, for environmental violations.

Dressed in a dark blue suit and striped tie and seated at a rectangular table, the Russian president gestured and pointed as he fielded questions, as if giving a lecture.

The killings of Central Bank regulator Andrei Kozlov and investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya have stoked fears that Russia is returning to the violence of the 1990s, when business disputes were commonly resolved through shootings and bombings.

Mr. Putin said that contract killings had declined in recent years and that authorities were becoming more successful in cracking down on financial crimes.

He answered questions posed by correspondents from the state-run television network speaking for small crowds in cities across the vast country, as well as questions sent via phone, e-mail and text messaging.

It was impossible to tell whether the questions were arranged in advance or questioners coached. During past question-and-answer sessions, critics said authorities and state television reporters screened questions and selected audiences to go live with Mr. Putin.

Putin Suggests He Will Remain A Force After Leaving Office (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

Russian President Vladimir V. Putin on Wednesday reaffirmed his intention to leave office in 2008 at the end of his second term as required by the constitution, but suggested that he might continue to wield influence.

The Russian leader's comment was taken by some observers as an indication that he might seek to exercise power from another position, such as prime minister, or that he envisioned a role such as that played by Deng Xiaoping after the late Chinese leader retired from his official positions.

Putin's statement came during a live, nationally televised session of nearly three hours during which he took more than 50 citizens' questions, submitted via telephone, video feed, the Internet and text message. The annual event has become a key means for Putin to project an image as a leader responsive to his people.

"Although I like my job, the constitution denies me the right to run for a third term in succession," Putin said in response to a question about Russia's fate after he leaves office.

"But even when I no longer have governing power and the levers of presidential rule," he continued, "I think that without adjusting the fundamental law to my personal interests, I will be able to keep the most important thing that anyone engaged in politics should cherish: that is, your trust. And using that, together we will be able to influence life in our country so as to guarantee its progress and exert influence on what is happening in Russia."

Liliya Shevtsova, an analyst at the Carnegie Moscow Center, said she interpreted Putin's remarks as an indication that he was "seriously pondering" an attempt to move into a kind of unofficial paramount leader role modeled after Deng.

"The way I understood him, he doesn't want to become a party leader, a constitutional court chairman or parliamentary speaker," she said. "He knows that all these positions in today's Russia are miniature compared to the presidency. That is why he is really thinking about laying down a new tradition in the style of Deng Xiaoping."

In his wide-ranging comments, Putin also defended a rapid increase in Russian military spending, implicitly criticized U.S. handling of nuclear negotiations with North Korea and warned Georgia not to try to regain control of two pro-Russian separatist regions through use of force. He expressed satisfaction with the state of Russia's economy, which has averaged about 7% annual growth since he took office in 2000, and said the country must reduce the gap between rich and poor.

Although the annual event is designed to give some appearance of spontaneity, critics say it is stage-managed to present Putin in the best possible light.

Some questions posed via Internet and cellphone messages were presented by the studio hosts, and others chosen earlier and read by Putin himself. They were among more than 2 million questions that were submitted, organizers said.

The questions via video feed came from small groups of people gathered in village or city squares around the country, together with correspondents. Some correspondents made comments implying that questioners had not been pre-selected, then walked straight to some individuals to give them the microphone. Questions dealt with everything from international relations and domestic policy to concerns about crime, gambling and education.

"Putin quite confidently played the role of 'the good czar,' " said Mikhail G. Delyagin, chairman of the Institute of Globalization Studies, a Moscow think tank. "In conditions where democracy in Russia is curbed in many aspects, Putin talks directly to the people, as if asking, 'What lack of democracy?' And people must accept this as proof of real democracy, and another proof that no one in the foreseeable future can run this country better than Putin."

One questioner asked why the country had boosted military spending. "Who are we going to fight against?" she asked. "Our relations with the United States are good, aren't they?"

Putin first replied that "it is hard to please everybody" because in previous events of this nature he was asked why Russia wasn't paying more attention to its army. He went on to say that the military budget is now 3.5 times what it was in 2000, but that American defense spending is 25 times that of Russia.

Putin said Russia was secure despite spending much less than the U.S. and China, mainly because of military technology retained from Soviet times.

Asked about North Korea's Oct. 9 test of a nuclear device, Putin cited Russia's support for a United Nations resolution condemning the test, and described the Pyongyang government's action as "impermissible." But he also took an apparent jab at Washington, suggesting it had taken too tough a stance in negotiations.

The international community should try to understand why the nuclear test occurred, Putin said.

"I think one of the reasons is that far from all the participants in the negotiating process were able to find the right tone during those talks," he continued, in apparent reference to the U.S. and some other participants in six-party talks that include Russia, China, Japan, South Korea and North Korea.

"One should never drive the situation into an impasse," he said. "No party should ever be put in such a situation where the only way out is the aggravation of tensions."

North Korea is now signaling its readiness to return to the negotiating table provided that its national security interests and ability to develop civilian nuclear power are ensured, Putin said.

Vote For Security Council Seat Stalled (AP)

The vote has been repeated — over and over, 41 times — and with each count, there is no winner in the diplomatic battle over Latin America's seat on the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0086896

The two contenders — U.S.-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, led by its fiercely anti-American President Hugo Chavez — refuse to budge, though it has been clear since the early ballots that neither can gain the needed two-thirds support in the 192-nation U.N. General Assembly.

Frustrated diplomats from Latin America and the Caribbean met Wednesday, hoping to find a solution that would avoid another fruitless confrontation in the General Assembly.

But Ecuador's U.N. Ambassador Diego Cordovez, who chairs the 34-nation regional group, reported there was no imminent solution. Wednesday afternoon's voting, he said, would have to go ahead.

It did, for six rounds, and mirrored previous results: Guatemala led Venezuela but couldn't win a two-thirds majority. Voting resumes on Thursday.

Cordovez said, however, there is hope a solution may be found.

He held talks with the Guatemalan and Venezuelan ambassadors "in a very good atmosphere," and he said negotiations will continue Thursday with the foreign ministers of both countries.

"My expectation is that we are going to have — perhaps not tomorrow because these are very difficult things — but that we are going to have an agreement," Cordovez said.

He said that agreement would indicate what both countries are going to do themselves and a decision on a compromise candidate.

Mexico's U.N. Ambassador Enrique Berruga said he was "hopeful more than optimistic" that the two foreign ministers will come up with a quick solution. That's because of "their entrenched positions," with each saying "no you quit first," he said.

"Our expectation is that they can come to an agreement — and that that agreement is the way forward," he said after Wednesday's voting in which Guatemala received between 100 and 109 votes while Venezuela got between 72 and 84 votes.

Berruga outlined three scenarios: that one of the two countries withdraws in favor of the other, that both quit and recommend a compromise candidate be adopted by consensus, or that both agree to quit but pass the ball on choosing a third candidate to the Latin American and Caribbean Group.

Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas said he expects that out of the foreign ministers' meeting "will come positive agreement that will facilitate a dignified and constructive solution."

Many U.N. members — not just the Latin Americans — hope that proves to be true.

The Guatemala-Venezuela voting is already the third longest in the U.N.'s 61-year history.

The second highest number of ballots was 52, set in 1960. After that, the General Assembly agreed to allow Poland and Turkey to serve on the council for one year each.

The record number is 155 rounds of voting, set in 1980. The General Assembly gave up on Cuba and Colombia after 154 rounds, and chose Mexico on the 155th, in early January of that year.

Brazil's U.N. Ambassador Ronaldo Mota Sardenberg said the message at the closed-door meeting was that the group needs to reach agreement on a candidate for the Security Council.

"We encouraged them to reach a solution quickly," he said, expressing hope that the Venezuelan and Guatemalan foreign ministers "will achieve some kind of a consensus."

"If they do, our group then can go for a consensus — can adopt a consensual solution," he said. "But first we need them — the two of them — to get together and present a name, present the name of a country."

Sardenberg said Brazil — which has been mentioned along with Bolivia, Costa Rica, Uruguay, Chile and others as a possible third option — "is not a candidate and we are ready to join any consensus."

Venezuela proposed Bolivia as an alternative in hopes of breaking the deadlock.

That nation said it would agree to be a candidate if it helped reach a consensus. But it remains to be seen if other nations in the region would agree on Bolivia, whose President Evo Morales is among Chavez's closest allies.

Venezuela's Arias Cardenas told Venezuelan radio network FFF that he understood Guatemala has suggested Costa Rica as an option.

But Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal denied that, saying: "We've never proposed an alternative country."

Mexico's Berruga said Latin America needs to establish a system to avoid future diplomatic battles over seats on the U.N.'s most powerful body.

He said he also feels "a little bit ashamed because ... we're paralyzing the work of the General Assembly with this exercise" when there are pressing global issues to tackle.

Venezuela Would Back Bolivia For UN Security Seat (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal In Caracas

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086897

Venezuela and Guatemala on Wednesday appeared ready to agree to find a consensus candidate to fill a temporary seat on the United Nations Security Council after a 40th round of voting failed to break a week-long diplomatic deadlock.

Neither of the two countries has been able to secure the two-thirds majority needed to win one of the two seats on the council allotted to a Latin American government since voting sessions began in the General Assembly last week.

However, Guatemala, which is strongly backed by the US, has led Venezuela in all but one of the voting rounds by a consistent margin of around 30 votes. Wednesday's final ballot left Guatemala with 105 votes and Venezuela with 78.

President Hugo Chávez conceded on Wednesday that his government had virtually no chance of being able to win the seat, but he claimed to have captured the moral high ground in his ongoing sparring effort with Washington.

"It's going to be very difficult for us to win two-thirds of the vote," Mr Chávez said. "But we have achieved a great moral victory that no-one can take away from us."

The ongoing stalemate has markedly increased the chances that Latin American diplomats will now search for a consensus nation to resolve the impasse.

Uruguay and the Dominican Republic have been repeatedly rumoured as potential candidates.

Earlier yesterday, Nicolás Maduro, the Venezuelan foreign minister, said that while Caracas would not yet step down, it would back Bolivia as a consensus candidate if Guatemala first withdrew its bid.

"We are maintaining our candidature . . . [but] we are open to dialogue," Mr Maduro said. "The candidature of Bolivia is on the table, and to us it looks like an option."

In an unexpected turn on Tuesday, Bolivian president Evo Morales said that Mr Chávez had called him to say that Caracas would back La Paz.

"Chávez said he will leave the candidature to Bolivia," he said.

But what level of diplomatic backing Bolivia would garner as a Latin American consensus candidate for the council seat was not immediately clear on Wednesday.

Mr Morales is a close political ally of Mr Chávez, an alliance that would likely leave Bolivia open to accusations that its candidature would be politically influenced by Caracas.

Venezuela meanwhile has repeatedly accused Guatemala of being under the political tutelage of Washington.

John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, was last week actively lobbying to block the bid by Caracas, Venezuelan diplomats have said.

The Security Council seat will be vacated by Argentina at the end of year. Peru currently holds the other Latin American seat.

After 41 U.N. Ballots, Venezuela-Guatemala Logjam Persists (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 25 — Venezuela and Guatemala on Wednesday were unable to break the stalemate over which Latin American country should join the Security Council next year, and the General Assembly completed its 41st round of inconclusive balloting on the issue.

Diplomats expressed hope that a meeting in New York on Thursday between the foreign ministers of the countries, Gert Rosenthal of Guatemala and Nicolas Maduro of Venezuela, could lead to the choice of a compromise candidate.

"Any consensus of the Latin American-Caribbean group depends upon agreement between the two candidates, and that is why the meeting of the candidates' foreign ministers tomorrow is so important," said Heraldo Muñoz, the ambassador of Chile.

The decision to resume voting on the issue was made after the ambassadors of the two countries, Jorge Skinner-Klée of Guatemala and Francisco Arias Cárdenas of Venezuela, failed to reach any agreement in a meeting held in the mission of Ecuador, which is the current president of the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group.

The two countries are competing for the two-year term seat being vacated by Argentina.

United Nations rules allow for indefinite voting, and the General Assembly announced Wednesday evening that it had provisionally set aside time for additional ballots through the middle of November.

Venezuela has conducted a global campaign for the position, which the country's United States-baiting president, Hugo Chávez, has said he would devote to trying to shift the balance of power at the United Nations toward the poor countries of the developing world.

But Venezuela has failed to rally those countries, which are in a majority at the United Nations, and performed unexpectedly badly.

The United States has simultaneously lobbied vigorously against Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0086898

In the six rounds of balloting on Wednesday, Guatemala averaged 104 votes and Venezuela averaged 79, much the same outcome as after last week's 35 rounds of voting. A two-thirds majority of those voting and not abstaining, or roughly 124, is needed to win.

Both countries have said they will talk about the possibility of leaving the race in favor of a compromise candidate, but each has said it will not be the first to quit.

Guatemala argues that as the leader, it should not be obliged to step aside. Venezuela says giving up would hand a victory to the United States.

Venezuela has put forward Bolivia as a substitute, but Guatemala has made it clear the choice is unacceptable. Bolivia's president, Evo Morales, is a close ally of Mr. Chávez, whom he calls "comandante." In a speech in Caracas on Wednesday, Mr. Chávez referred to Mr. Morales as "comrade."

Other countries mentioned as possible third candidates are Costa Rica, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay, the Dominican Republic and Panama.

Concerns Accompany U.S. Support For Uribe (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia, Oct. 25 -- Beyond the hearty handshakes, a high-level U.S. delegation that visited here this week raised concerns with President Ã lvaro Uribe's government about human rights abuses by the army and about the scandal-plagued effort to disarm paramilitary groups.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, led 15 Bush administration officials from six agencies for meetings with virtually every top Colombian ministry. In reiterating support for Uribe, whose government receives more U.S. assistance than any country outside the Middle East, Burns told the Colombians that Washington would continue providing about $600 million a year through 2008 for programs from aerial fumigation of drug crops to training of the army.

But the delegation's two-day mission, which ended Wednesday, also confronted a string of reports that Colombia's army has been embroiled in drug-related scandals and murdered dozens of peasant farmers, only to pass them off as dead guerrillas.

"They're concerned that these issues haven't been resolved, that they continue to draw criticism from human rights groups, from the United Nations and presumably from some of their own diplomats," said Mark Schneider, senior vice president of the International Crisis Group, a policy analysis organization that regularly assesses the Colombian conflict.

"They're not blind to what's going on," said Schneider, who met with Burns on Monday in Washington before the diplomat left for Colombia.

In one particularly disturbing episode earlier this year, an army patrol with suspected ties to cocaine traffickers ambushed and killed 10 members of an elite anti-narcotics police unit trained by U.S. officials. Colombia's intelligence service is also trying to reform itself after allegations that rogue agents collaborated with paramilitary members to assassinate leftist union activists and provided secret information to drug traffickers.

The State Department has been concerned by reports that paramilitary commanders, despite having ostensibly laid down their arms, are killing hundreds of civilians while infiltrating government institutions. On Tuesday, two Colombian senators and a congressman were forced to give depositions at the Supreme Court after they were accused of working with paramilitary units.

In meetings with reporters on Tuesday, Burns stressed that U.S. support remains unwavering for Uribe and his "democratic security" policies, which are designed to take back a once-chaotic country from Marxist rebels, paramilitary groups and drug traffickers.

"But it is also true that there are big concerns raised about possible human rights violations," Burns said. "We are a friend of Colombia, and so, of course, we raise these issues."

The visit by the delegation, considered the highest-level visit by U.S. officials in years, occurred as Uribe's governing coalition has been hobbled by infighting and by concern that Marxist rebels remain a potent force. Last week, a powerful car bomb was set off inside one of the army's most important bases. That infuriated Uribe, who blamed leftist guerrillas and immediately cut off talks that could have led the rebels to release dozens of captives, including three Americans.

Despite the setbacks, the White House considers Uribe, who was reelected to a second four-year term in May, a stabilizing force and a Latin American success story.

Colombia was on the brink of calamity four years ago, but violence is decreasing and the economy is growing stronger. Nearly 400 drug traffickers have been extradited to the United States under Uribe's government, and the country is now considered a linchpin in an unstable region marked by rising populism and deepening poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0086899

Still, some U.S. legislators, even supporters of Uribe, are increasingly pushing for better results. After providing more than $4 billion in aid, most of it for military and anti-drug programs, U.S. policymakers are concerned that as much coca is being cultivated in Colombia now as when aerial spraying of the drug crop began six years ago.

The message was increasingly pressed upon Burns and other State Department officials before his visit, said human rights activists, congressional aides and others who met with him recently.

"We've given them $4 billion since 1999, and there were people from Congress who felt that it would lead to more dramatic results," said Myles Frechette, a former U.S. ambassador here who remains in close contact with American diplomats.

"Congress has given this money, and things are not working the way they're supposed to work," said Frechette, who despite the criticism counts himself as a backer of Uribe.

Burns stressed that in Washington he had met with Human Rights Watch and the International Crisis Group, both of which have been critical of Uribe's policies. He also said on Tuesday that he had meetings scheduled with Colombian human rights groups.

"He knows the situation is not what it should be, given the huge financial investment the U.S. has made," said Tim Rieser, foreign policy aide to Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), ranking member of the Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations. "There's been a lot of criticism, and they recognize there are problems that need to be dealt with."

The International Crisis Group, which issued a report last week on Colombia, says it is crucial for the country to focus more of its resources on creating a functioning state in rural areas where armed groups often hold sway. After providing billions in aid, Schneider said, many in the U.S. Congress would like to see the Uribe government generate more of its own resources toward the effort.

"There are a lot of lawmakers at the Capitol who are concerned that Colombian taxpayers are not making the same sacrifice that American taxpayers have made to provide foreign assistance to Colombia," he said.

Nicaragua To Join Nations Banning All Abortions (LAT)

By Hector Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, October 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Nicaragua's legislature Thursday is expected to approve a law that outlaws all forms of abortion, including those procedures intended to save the life of a pregnant mother.

The measure has been supported by most major political parties, heading into the Nov. 5 presidential election, as they seek to win over voters in this overwhelmingly Catholic country. Leaders of the Roman Catholic Church helped draft the bill and have mobilized followers to support it.

Medical associations in Nicaragua and international human-rights groups have strongly criticized the proposal.

Since the late 1980s,Latin America's El Salvador and Chile have adopted similar measures. At least 34 countries, mostly in Africa and the Middle East, prohibit all abortions, without exception, according to the Center for Reproductive Rights, a nonprofit advocacy group based in New York.

The law would establish prison sentences of 6 to 30 years for women who abort their pregnancies and the doctors who perform the procedure.

Leaders of the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front and the ruling right-wing Liberal Alliance have said their representatives would vote for the proposal. The two groups control all but one of the seats in the 92-member legislature.

"The current law allows a small door in which abortions can be performed, and we are trying to close that door," said Dr. Rafael Cabrera, an obstetrician and leader of the Yes to Life Movement. "We don't believe a child should be destroyed under the pretext that a woman might die."

Cabrera and other backers of the law argue that medical science has advanced sufficiently to allow doctors to bring a fetus to the point of viability without endangering a woman's life.

But doctors with the Nicaraguan Society of Gynecology and Obstetrics told a Managua news conference Tuesday that the measure would endanger the lives of women and make doctors reluctant to perform life-saving procedures.

"When a woman arrives at a hospital with vaginal bleeding ... we're going to be afraid to do anything," society president Efrain Toruno said, according to the newspaper El Nuevo Diario. "If we treat her we could be prosecuted, and if we don't we could also be prosecuted."

Women's groups in Nicaragua charge the proposed law is a cynical pre-election ploy that panders to the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. The text of the law, they point out, is almost identical to a church proposal drafted earlier this year.

Outgoing President Bolanos fast-tracked the bill, using his authority to present emergency legislation to the National Assembly.

"The worst message of this proposed law is that the lives of women don't matter to this president, or to the government or the church," said Marta Maria Blandon, Central American Director of Ipas, a U.S.-based reproductive rights group.

Ipas estimates that 32,000 illegal abortions are performed in Nicaragua each year, many under unsafe conditions. Only 24 abortions authorized by law have been performed in Nicaragua in the past three years.

In 2004, a 9-year-old rape victim received an abortion under the current law's provisions.

Nearly all Latin American countries outlaw abortion, but most, including Nicaragua, allow the procedure in cases of rape and to preserve the life of the mother. Many countries, including Mexico, are working to make abortion more accessible to women who qualify for such exceptions.

Jose Maria Vivanco, Americas director of the U.S.-based Human Rights Watch, said the law could.

With Beheadings, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

URUAPAN, Mexico — Norteño music was blaring at the Sol y Sombra bar on Sept. 6 when several men in military garb broke up the late night party. Waving high-powered machine guns, they screamed at the crowd to stay put and then dumped the contents of a heavy plastic bag on the dance floor.

Five human heads rolled to a bloody stop.

“This is not something you see every day,” said a bartender, who asked not to be named for fear of losing his own head. “Very ugly.”

An underworld war between drug gangs is raging in Mexico, medieval in its barbarity, its foot soldiers operating with little fear of interference from the police, its scope and brutality unprecedented, even in a country accustomed to high levels of drug violence.

In recent months the violence has included a total of two dozen beheadings, a raid on a local police station by men with grenades and a bazooka, and daytime kidnappings of top law enforcement officials. At least 123 law enforcement officials, among them 2 judges and 3 prosecutors, have been gunned down or tortured to death. Five police officers were among those beheaded.

In all, the violence has claimed more than 1,700 civilian lives this year, and federal officials say the killings are on course to top the estimated 1,800 underworld killings last year. Those death tolls compare with 1,304 in 2004 and 1,080 in 2001, these officials say.

Mexico’s law enforcement officials maintain that the violence is a sign that they have made progress dismantling the major organized crime families in the country. The arrests of several drug cartel leaders and their top lieutenants have set off a violent struggle among second-rank mobsters for trade routes, federal prosecutors say. The old order has been fractured, and the remaining drug dealers are killing one another or making new alliances.

“These alliances are happening because none of the organizations can control, on its own, the territory it used to control, and that speaks to the crisis that they are in,” said José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, the top federal prosecutor for organized crime.

Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca said a steadily rising tide of drug addiction within Mexico had spurred some of the murders, as dealers fought for local markets. At the same time, more and more honest police officers are trying to enforce the law rather than turn a blind eye to drug traffickers, often paying with their lives, prosecutors say.

But those assessments, other authorities say, are overly rosy and may explain only part of the picture. Some experts say the Mexican police forces, weakened by corruption and cowed by assassinations, are simply not up to the task of countering the underworld feuds unleashed by the arrests of cartel leaders over the last six years.

Many of the dead made their living in the drug trade and perished in a larger struggle for territory between a federation of cartels based in Sinaloa, on the Pacific Ocean, and the Gulf Cartel from the northeastern state of Tamaulipas, federal prosecutors say.

The five men beheaded in Uruapan, in Michoacán, were street-level methamphetamine dealers, addicted themselves to the synthetic drug. They were linked loosely to the Valencia family, which once controlled most of the drug trade in the state and is a part of the Sinaloa group, the police say. The killers came from a gang called The Family, believed to be allied with the Gulf Cartel.

A day before, the killers had kidnapped the five men from a mechanic’s shop they had been using as a front for selling “ice,” as crystal methamphetamine is called on the street. They sawed their victims’ heads off with a bowie knife while they were still alive shortly before going to the bar, law enforcement officials said.

"You don't do something like that unless you want to send a big message," said one United States law enforcement official here, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The beheadings, in fact, have become a signature form of intimidation aimed at both criminal rivals and federal and local authorities. In the tourist town of Acapulco, killers from one drug gang decapitated the commander of a special strike force, Mario Núñez Magaña, in April, along with one of his agents, Jesús Alberto Ibarra Velázquez.

They jammed the heads in a fence in front of the municipal police station. "So you will learn to respect," said a red note next to them.

"This year has been one to forget, a black year," said Jorge Valdez, a spokesman for the Acapulco police. "It's the most violent year in the last 50 years, and the acts are barbaric, bloody, with no trace of humanity."

The violence is by no means limited to Acapulco. In mid-July, about 15 gunmen attacked a small-town police station in Tabasco State at dawn with grenades, a bazooka and machine guns in an attempt to liberate two of their gang members, who were arrested after a bar fight the night before.

Two police officers died in the assault. The authorities said the attackers were dressed in the commando outfits of federal agents and belonged to the Zetas, former soldiers who work for the Gulf Cartel.

One reason for the wave of law enforcement killings is that the Mexican police do a poor job of protecting their own. Arrests have been made in only a handful of the assassinations of police officers this year. The overwhelming majority remain unsolved because witnesses fear testifying against drug traffickers. Even seasoned investigators are afraid to dig too deep into the murders.

"There is an atmosphere that affects us, of distrust, of terror inside the police force," said Jesús Alemán del Carmen, the head of the state police in Guerrero, where 22 law enforcement officials have been brutally assassinated this year.

One of the officers killed was Gonzalo Domínguez Díaz, the state police commander in Pátzcuaro, Michoacán. In February, he received a death threat from a local businessman who law enforcement officials say has links to the Valencia crime family.

The threat came just minutes after Commander Domínguez arrested two men on weapons possession charges. He arrived home that night pale and shaken, said his widow, Fanny Carranza Domínguez. His anxiety grew over time, after prosecutors released the men he had arrested, for a lack of evidence, his wife said.

In early May, he told his wife that he had heard on the street that gunmen were looking for him. "He said, 'I know that if I arrest them I am risking my life,' " she recalled. " 'I bring them to the capital, and they let them go.' "

On May 8, a car cut off Commander Domínguez's police car as he was driving home alone about 6:30 p.m. Within minutes, he was shot point blank in the head with a 12-gauge shotgun and twice in the chest with an AK-47. He never unholstered his sidearm. So far, prosecutors have made no progress in solving his murder. He was 47, the father of three.

"I think the commanders that haven't been killed are in the game, and the ones that have been killed, it is because they attacked crime," Mrs. Carranza Domínguez said.

"The prosecutor seems asleep here," she added. "He doesn't do anything but collect his salary and go home."

Commander Domínguez was one of 16 state and federal police commanders assassinated this year across Mexico, along with 2 judges handling drug cases and 2 federal prosecutors. Local police chiefs have also been targets. Eight have been murdered, most of them in Michoacán.

Most were ambushed in their cars or outside their homes by men with machine guns. A few were kidnapped by men posing as federal agents. In these cases, the bodies were found later, shot full of holes, often showing signs of torture.

Commander Cándido Vargas, 40, the second in command of the state police in Uruapan, died that way in August. Prosecutors say he was walking to his car when he was surrounded by about 15 heavily armed men dressed in black commando outfits like those used by federal agents. It was 3:30 in the afternoon, and he was just 100 yards from the police headquarters.

The men hustled him into one of their vehicles and sped off. He was found the next day on a nearby ranch, shot 25 times. A sign next to his body read: "For playing with two bands."

No one from the police department visited his wife and three children, who live in another town, to tell them of his death. "We found out through the newspaper," said Paula Vargas, his wife of 23 years. "It was as if the whole world fell down on me."

The state prosecutor in Uruapan, Ramón Ponce, says he has found no evidence of Commander Vargas's being corrupt. Neither does he have any leads, he said. "The atmosphere is very tense," Mr. Ponce said. "It's very difficult."

While attacks on the police have risen, they have been far outpaced by grisly gangland killings. In Michoacán, The Family is believed to be responsible for the beheadings of a dozen people besides the ones they delivered to the Sol y Sombra bar. The heads have often been accompanied by cryptic messages declaring the killings divine justice, accusing the victims of crimes, or daring their rivals to send more henchmen.

Nearly every day, new victims are found in states along the major drug shipment routes, especially Quintana Roo, Michoacán, Guerrero, Tamaulipas and Baja California. Most are bound, gagged and shot to death, their bodies dumped on lonely roads.

In the towns hardest hit by the gangland warfare, the fear is palpable. For two years now, Nuevo Laredo has been the main battleground for a fight between gunmen loyal to Joaquín (Chapo) Guzmán of Sinaloa and the remnants of the Gulf Cartel, whose leader, Osiel Cárdenas, is in prison awaiting trial.

"I wouldn't be human if I said I wasn't afraid," acknowledged Elizabeth Hernández Arredone, a state prosecutor in Nuevo Laredo who has taped to her door a photograph of a female judge who recently disappeared.

The effects are everywhere. Many local journalists have stopped covering drug violence for fear they may become targets themselves. Tourists used to spill across the border from Laredo, Tex., to swig tequila, buy trinkets and run wild. Not anymore.

Church attendance is down, said the Rev. Alberto Monteras Monjarás of Santo Niño Church, because even a Sunday morning can be dangerous.

"People used to sleep outside on the porch if it got too hot," he said. "Not anymore. You stay inside, and you put three or four locks on the door."

Prominent S. African Denied Entry Into U.S. (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Oct. 25 -- A prominent South African political analyst said Wednesday that U.S. border agents had denied him entry into the United States and questioned him about his views on terrorism.

Adam Habib, executive director of the Democracy and Governance Research Program for South Africa's Human Sciences Research Council, was taken to a holding room at John F. Kennedy International Airport on Saturday after his arrival for meetings in New York and Washington, he said in an interview.

Seven hours later, his visa had been canceled and he was escorted by an armed guard to a return flight to Johannesburg.

Habib said the border agents did not give him a reason. A U.S. Embassy spokesman, Mark M. Schlachter, confirmed the incident but said he did not know why Habib had been denied entry.

Habib, who is Muslim, said that most of the dozens of people in the holding room had dark skin and appeared to be Muslim, by virtue of their language or dress. He added that U.S. security measures, though in some cases justified by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, threaten to create resentment among Muslims worldwide.

"If you do this in a way that alienates large portions of the world and creates enmity, then you are compromising your medium-term security in pursuing your short-term security," Habib said from his office in Pretoria.

Habib said that most of the questions seemed routine, though they included some about his views on terrorism. The rest of the South African delegation continued to a series of meetings with the World Bank, the National Institutes of Health, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and other groups.

The Human Sciences Research Council has asked the U.S. Embassy in Pretoria to investigate, and Habib said he had written the U.S. Customs and Border Protection office in Washington seeking an explanation.

In Burma, A Cry For U.N. Help (WP)

By U Pu Chin Sian Thang And U Thein Pe

The Washington Post, October 26, 2006

Last month the U.N. Security Council formally discussed the situation in Burma for the first time. For Burmese people such as us, who live under the country's oppressive regime, this was a welcome development.

The Security Council discussion is incredibly important. Over the past 10 years we have watched with dismay as our country's military ruler has repeatedly hoodwinked a stream of U.N. envoys and ignored the world body's actions. Twenty-eight resolutions from the U.N.'s General Assembly and its former Commission on Human Rights, four consecutive human rights special rapporteurs and two successive special envoys representing U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan have failed to produce political change, dialogue or national reconciliation in Burma.

Meanwhile, much of the world has failed to understand the gravity of the crisis in our country. It is shocking that the Security Council has taken so long to get involved. No fewer than 3,000 villages have been destroyed or dislocated by the military regime in eastern Burma in the past decade. During the regime's systematic attacks on ethnic populations, women have been raped, children conscripted as child soldiers and rice supplies burned. Recently the regime instituted a practice of using soldiers' bayonets to pierce the bottoms of rice bowls, leaving villagers unable to cook their most basic foodstuff.

Fleeing the cruelty of this regime, leaving smoldering villages behind, our fellow citizens run for their lives, often to inhospitable territories where the junta awaits. The cycle of terror seems without end. Because of the regime's practices, mortality rates in eastern Burma have risen to the levels of the worst conflict zones in Africa. Children are chronically malnourished, infant mortality rates are soaring, and the most common ailments have become death sentences for thousands.

We know the Security Council has responded to other cases in which there are horrendous problems with refugees and internally displaced populations, in which rape is widespread and conscripting child soldiers is the norm. Burma, with 70,000 child soldiers, waits for a similar response and resolve from the Security Council. We simply cannot understand why the council has not taken the same sort of action in Burma as it has elsewhere. Now that it has taken up the issue of Burma, it must go further and pass a resolution.

Clearly, efforts outside the Security Council have not worked. After Ibrahim Gambari, a U.N. undersecretary of political affairs and envoy to Burma, visited the country in May, the military regime doubled the sentence imposed on Aung San Suu Kyi, the world's only imprisoned Nobel Peace Prize recipient, and increased its attacks on ethnic minorities. The heightened military offensive against these communities has resulted in thousands more refugees streaming across the borders into neighboring countries.

The regime has not stopped its brutal campaign of terror, in part because the secretary general is unable to act without the mandate of a Security Council resolution. Only a council resolution will provide the United Nations with what it needs to confront this situation.

Just last month the Burmese military arrested five of the most prominent members of our movement, including Burma's second most-famous political leader, Min Ko Naing. By writing this opinion piece, we, too, are risking our lives. Our freedom is worth the risk.

We hope that attention at the Security Council will do more to shed light on the important cultural and political context of our struggle and the threat destabilizing the region. The U.N. diplomatic corps must understand that, unlike other countries, in which factors such as religion or historical rivalries weaken public support for democracy, Burma is a nation in which the people have clearly and repeatedly articulated what they want: a democratic society. That is why the National League for Democracy and allied parties won 82 percent of the seats in parliament in our last elections, and why tens of thousands of people risk their lives to participate in our movement.

Put simply, there is overwhelming evidence that the people of Burma want an end to the dictatorship that has been forced upon them. Without this understanding and without a Security Council resolution, the United Nations is likely to fail in Burma yet again.

The writers are members of Burma's parliament, which was chosen in the country's last democratic elections but has never been permitted to meet.

Sept. 11 Plotter Asks Court for Lawyer, Trial; Case Embodies Debate Over Habeas Rights

By Carol D. Leonnig and Julie Tate
Washington Post Staff Writers

Ramzi Binalshibh, an admitted al-Qaeda planner of the Sept. 11 attacks, tried four times to join the terrorist hijackers who flew planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in 2001 and has acknowledged his goal of killing as many Americans as possible.

Now the Yemeni man is seeking the help of the U.S. court system to address his complaint that he has been wrongfully imprisoned and treated unfairly by the U.S. government. He filed a legal challenge in federal court in Washington on Oct. 10, asserting his rights to contest his detention and requesting that a court-appointed lawyer represent him free of charge.

In so doing, Binalshibh brought to life the two arguments at the heart of the recent, furious debate over stripping such habeas corpus rights from so-called enemy combatants: the administration's position that alleged terrorists like him do not deserve access to U.S. courts, and his opponents' assertion that the American justice system is a model for the world precisely because it accords such basic rights to all.

One of the most bitterly fought provisions of the legislation President Bush signed Oct. 17 to establish a system of military trials, or "commissions," for accused enemy combatants eliminated those rights for the captives at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Suspending habeas rights is a step that has been taken only four times previously in U.S. history, and its legality this time will almost certainly be decided by the Supreme Court.

Because of Binalshibh's alleged admission that he was a key player in the Hamburg cell that carried out the attacks, his legal suit may provide the starkest test yet of America's justice system, legal experts said.

"It is how our system treats the worst of the worst, the most reviled of the reviled, that shows how true we are to our principles, " said David H. Remes, who has represented 17 detainees, mostly from Yemen, and coordinated defense arguments to the Supreme Court in the successful Hamdan case.

Binalshibh may never get the hearing he is seeking. His is one of hundreds of cases the government asked the courts to dismiss immediately after Bush signed the new law. For his part, Binalshibh did little more than assert his habeas rights and ask for a lawyer.

Binalshibh is part of a select group of detainees that even defense lawyers acknowledge may be guilty -- 14 suspected terrorists the government deemed "high-value detainees," some of whom have allegedly admitted high-level roles in the al-Qaeda attacks. President Bush cited the 14 men, selected from more than 100 terrorist suspects who had been held for years in secret CIA-run prisons, when he successfully lobbied for the military commission law.

Bush sought Congress's approval after the Supreme Court ruled in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld in June that the administration lacked the authority to establish the military trials on its own. He pressed for the legislation as the government transferred the 14 men to a unit of the military prison in Guantanamo Bay and singled out Binalshibh -- along with Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

Binalshibh's family's decision to seek help in a U.S. court also highlights a growing tension within the defense bar about the ethical and practical dilemmas of representing detainees who likely played a role in slaughtering thousands of Americans.

Binalshibh's brother filed a petition on his behalf and asked the federal court to appoint a public defender to represent him. The Center for Constitutional Rights, a civil liberties group that sued last year to represent the remaining detainees in Guantanamo Bay who lack representation, is not currently representing him. A group official said he could not comment on the reason because of potential attorney-client privilege.

Tina Foster, a civil liberties lawyer who previously helped coordinate the work of dozens of law firms representing hundreds of Guantanamo detainees, said it would be a "challenge" to find a pro bono lawyer for Binalshibh because he has been virtually convicted in media reports as a Sept. 11 plotter. Remes said there is an "understandable reluctance" among large commercial law firms to champion Binalshibh's cause.

"You wouldn't be rushing to file a habeas claim for Ramzi Binalshibh," Foster said. "Most of the folks down there are "no-value" detainees -- they shouldn't even be there -- and those are the ones you'd want to push in the court."

Binalshibh was captured by the United States in Pakistan in 2002 and taken to secret detention facilities.

According to the Sept. 11 commission, he told interrogators that he was supposed to pilot another hijacked airliner on the day of the attacks but was repeatedly refused a visa to enter the United States.

His transformation to a terrorist began in 1997 when he became friends with future hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah while living in Germany on a student visa. He later pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden while training with his friends in Afghanistan in 1999.

Instead of participating in the attack, Binalshibh relayed messages between the hijackers and Mohammed, met with Atta for briefings on attack planning and allegedly helped transfer money to the hijackers.

Raytheon Sues Government Over USMC Contract

Raytheon has filed a lawsuit with the U.S. Court of Federal Claims to fight the Marine Corps' decision to take away a $36 million contract and award it instead to L-3 Communications, Inside the Navy reports.

By filing the lawsuit, Raytheon turns up the volume on its objection after submitting a protest Sept. 27 to the Government Accountability Office.

At issue is a contract to develop thermal imaging systems for amphibious assault vehicles. Marine Corps spokeswoman Dedra Jones told ITN the lawsuit aims to block L-3 from building sights "urgently needed by the Marines for Iraq."

A U.S. Court of Federal Claims official confirmed Raytheon filed the lawsuit Oct. 18. Judge Loren Smith has been assigned to preside over the case, the official said. On Oct. 19, the parties participated in a status conference, the official said. Oral arguments are slated to begin Nov. 9, according to the official.

The official said Raytheon's legal filings are not publicly available because they contain proprietary and confidential information. MUNDT SAYS JOINT WARRIOR-PREDATOR IDEA NOT IN FY-08 POM: The Army and Air Force have made progress on potentially folding the Warrior and Predator unmanned aerial vehicle programs into a single joint venture -- but not enough to include such a framework in the Pentagon's next six-year spending plan, Inside the Air Force reports.

"We have come a long, long way" but the services have yet to ink a memorandum of agreement on creating a joint program office, Army Brig. Gen. Stephen Mundt told ITAF on Oct. 18.

At issue is an effort aimed at finding a way to make the Army's Warrior unmanned aerial vehicle program and the Air Force-led Predator initiative a joint venture. The services have yet to break a months-long impasse on the issue.

The services missed a May deadline for forging a way ahead on a joint Warrior-Predator office they set in response to a directive by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to explore a dual-service structure. That OSD order came after the Army selected General Atomics Aeronautical Systems' longer-range Predator for its Extended-Range/Multi-Purpose program, now called the Warrior.

An Air Force spokeswoman last month said there had been no movement for quite some time in reaching a Warrior-Predator pact. ARMY OFFICIAL SAYS FUTURE AIRLIFTER PLAN TO BE CRAFTED: Brig. Gen. Stephen Mundt, the Army Aviation Task Force director, says before the services can proceed with the development of the Defense Department's next generation of transport aircraft, department leaders need to examine how conceptual platforms like the Joint Heavy-Lift and "Advanced Mobility Concept" aircraft would complement one another, reports Inside the Army. Alternatively their requirements might be melded into a single concept, he said.

Speaking with reporters after an Oct. 18 American Helicopter Society dinner, Mundt said it is unclear if JHL, in a concept design and analysis phase, will materialize into a funded program because a joint requirement has not been established, and because more than one service would have to pony up program dollars.

To date, the Army is footing the bill for the JHL initiative but Mundt said the service would not forge ahead with JHL development without financial backing from the other services.

Initial, conservative cost estimates, according to Mundt, place a $2 billion price tag on building a "couple" of JHL demos that would be used to determine if such an aircraft is feasible.

"I've got to have enough money right now to finish the concept refinement, bring that to fruition, do a good [initial capabilities document] and take this program to a milestone A decision. At that point, because it's joint, it needs to get into" the Joint Requirement Oversight Council, the one-star said. MARINE CORPS SEEKS MEANS TO DEFEAT IED THREAT: To address the ever-changing threat of improvised explosives in Iraq and elsewhere, the Marine Corps is pursuing not only existing commercial solutions but also new developmental technology, program officials told Inside the Navy last week.

The Marine Counter Improvised Explosive Device Technology Directorate works with the Joint IED Defeat Organization at the Pentagon to provide a plethora of technologies -- ranging from body armor to jammers -- to reduce the IED threat to forward-deployed troops.

"Our requirements come from the operating forces and basically if they need something we're going to go out and find a quick solution that goes through the requirements process," Joseph Murgo, director of the Marine Corps' Counter IED Technology Directorate, told ITN Oct. 18. "It's not like a normal acquisition. If it's a joint universal needs statement, we're going to react pretty fast."

"Fast" means fielding the technology in three to six months, Murgo explained. Nonetheless, sometimes it takes more than a year to modify commercial-off-the-shelf technology or develop new technology to meet requirements, he said.

"We are taking a parallel approach to the changing threat," said Murgo. F-35 PARTNER NATIONS CONSIDER EARLY PACT APPROVAL: Two of the nine nations participating in the Joint Strike Fighter coalition could ratify language on a vital procurement pact one month ahead of an anticipated December deadline, reports Inside the Air Force.

Defense officials from the United Kingdom and the Netherlands "have expressed interest" in signing the international memorandum of understanding (MOU) as early as next month, JSF Program Executive Officer Brig. Gen Charles Davis said.

"We will have some guys that are going to sign in November," the one-star told reporters during a recent conference in Washington. "The Dutch have expressed interest in doing that [and] I think the Brits are looking to sign at a fairly early time frame."

The memorandum of understanding is expected to lay out a set of principles that will formally articulate the international fighter effort's production schedule. It also is expected to cover sustainment and follow-on development issues for the next-generation, multibillion-dollar program, according to U.S. defense officials.

Perhaps more importantly, the MOU could dictate terms and an overall number of component and system transfers that would be granted to the U.S. allies participating in the F-35 program.

Italy, Turkey, Australia, Canada, Norway and Denmark are the other nations involved in the JSF program. PENTAGON USING FCS TO MODERNIZE CHEM-BIO DEFENSES: In its quest to modernize chemical and biological defense capabilities, the Pentagon is using the Army's Future Combat System program as a catalyst to test and develop revolutionary concepts for defenses against chemical and biological agents before applying them to other Defense Department platforms, Inside the Army reports.

The JPEO is working on modeling and simulation initiatives to make those new chem-bio defense technologies more "modular," Douglas Bryce, the deputy joint program executive officer for chemical and biological defense, told ITA Oct. 18 at an asymmetric warfare conference sponsored by the Institute for Defense and Government Advancement.

"FCS has been where we have put a lot of our experimentation -- our concepts, our ideas -- in place, and we'll prove them," Bryce said. "And then, hopefully, you can just export them to the other major defense acquisition programs," including ships and other land vehicles, he said.

By the end of the calendar year, the JPEO should have an idea of whether its theories and processes will work, he said.

"We think we will have enough information to say, 'Our concepts and theories work; therefore we can go out and buy some things we can go out and test,'" Bryce said. PENTAGON CANCELS MARINE CORPS' H-1 HELO REVIEW: The Defense Department has dropped plans to review the H-1 helicopter program this month at a Defense Acquisition Board meeting, which would have been overseen by DOD acquisition executive Kenneth Krieg, Inside the Navy reports.

Plans for the late October review were scrapped at the Navy's request, but there will still be another DAB meeting next year before officials decide whether to buy a fourth batch of helicopters in the low-rate-initial production phase of the program, said a service official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The H-1 program is supposed to provide both light utility (UH-1) and attack (AH-1) helicopters to the Marine Corps. But the program has suffered delayed deliveries and increased costs.

In May, Krieg decided to continue the program, but also directed officials to continue examining potential alternatives to the program. He codified his decision in a memo signed June 22. The memo said Krieg would reconvene the DAB this month to conduct another in-process review of the program.

More recently, however, the Navy maintained it would be unnecessary to hold a DAB meeting now and the Office of the Secretary of Defense agreed, the service official said. For the moment, Bell Helicopter Textron appears to be on schedule in terms of efforts to get the program back on track, the official said. LOCKHEED TO SLOW JASSM-ER TESTING FOLLOWING FUNDING CUT: Facing a $20 million reduction handed down by lawmakers in the fiscal year 2007 Defense Appropriations Act, officials plan to slow the testing schedule for the extended-range variant of the Joint Air-to-Surface Standoff Missile, reports Inside the Air Force.

Lockheed Martin, the munition's prime contractor, was forced to postpone a live warhead test of the JASSM-ER initially scheduled for last month, Jennifer Allen, a spokeswoman for the defense giant said in an Oct. 17 e-mail.

The Senate Appropriations Committee, in a July report on its version of the defense legislation, expressed concern with JASSM-ER testing concurrency and proposed a $40 million reduction to the Air Force's budget request for the program. House appropriators fully funded the Pentagon's JASSM procurement request in their version of the bill.

During a September conference on the bill, House and Senate appropriators agreed to a $20 million reduction for the JASSM request. President Bush signed the bill on Sept. 29.

During deliberations on the legislation, Lockheed Martin discussed program changes to JASSM-ER with lawmakers.

"We worked with our Air Force customer and the [Senate Appropriations] Committee to slow the program to mitigate that concern and to conserve funds in the event funding was not restored in conference," Allen said.

Lawmakers fully funded the Air Force's JASSM procurement request in the FY-07 defense authorization bill, which the president signed into law on Oct. 17. ARMY OFFICE TAKES UP ELECTRONIC WARFARE INITIATIVES: The Army has created a new division within its Asymmetric Warfare Office that will take the lead in preparing U.S. ground forces to dominate the electromagnetic spectrum -- a key to countering the threat from improvised explosive devices, reports Inside the Army.

Col. Laurie Buckhout, the chief of the Electronic Warfare Division in the Army's Asymmetric Warfare Office, laid out the service's plans during an Oct. 17 presentation at an Institute for Defense and Government Advancement conference.

While the definition of asymmetric warfare is evolving, Buckhout said it generally involves conflicts in which a less-capable enemy fights across the spectrum of political, economic, social and military activity, often disregarding the laws of war. Suicide bombers, improvised explosive devices and kidnappings are all examples of asymmetric weapons.

Conventional U.S. military forces can expect to see this type of activity in every future operation, said Buckhout. She added that the asymmetric office will serve as the focal point of the service's shift from a force-on-force emphasis of conventional warfare to asymmetric threats.

Electronic warfare is considered any military action involving the use of the electromagnetic spectrum and directed energy to control the battlespace and/or attack the enemy. Much of this effort is concentrated on broadband jamming equipment designed to disrupt enemy communications and radar systems, Buckhout said. MARINE CORPS PICKS SYSTEM FOR UNMANNED DRONE DEMO: The Marine Corps has decided to award MTC Technologies of Dayton, OH, a contract to provide an unmanned drone for a demonstration effort that will inform a new Navy and Marine Corps program, reports Inside the Navy.

In an interview, Capt. Dave Funkhouser, the unmanned aerial systems branch head at the Marine Corps Warfighting Lab, said MTC is working with the unmanned drone developer Arcturus, which makes the T-16 drone.

Images of Arcturus' T-16 system posted online (www.arcturus-uav.com) show it is a fixed-wing drone with a propeller on the nose.

MTC was selected from a pool of six bidders to provide the Tier II concept demonstrator.

Looking ahead, the program will undergo factory acceptance testing, Funkhouser said. The system also will have to obtain a flight clearance from Naval Air Systems Command. Further, the system will undergo a limited technical assessment to see if it really meets military requirements, he said. Beyond that, there would be an extended user assessment, he said.

This is a concept demonstration effort, not a program of record, Funkhouser noted.

The demonstration will inform a Navy and Marine Corps program of record, a joint effort formed by the merger of the Marine Corps' Tier II initiative and the Navy's new Small Tactical Unmanned Air System initiative, he said. The program of record is supposed to produce drones that achieve an initial operational capability around 2010, he added. AFSOC OFFICIALS MULLING POSSIBLE 'LOW-VISIBILITY AIRCRAFT': Air Force Special Operations Command officials are eying a new fleet of small airlifters that could ferry military teams into nations where an obvious U.S. military presence might breed political problems for the host government, Inside the Air Force reports.

"We're researching the feasibility of using a lighter cargo aircraft" instead of larger airlifters currently in the AFSOC fleet, such as its MC-130s, Deputy Commander Brig. Gen. Donny Wurster said recently.

"Some missions don't require the full capabilities of a MC-130," he said. His comments came on Oct. 3 during an industry conference in Ft. Walton Beach, FL.

AFSOC sometimes will send small teams of personnel into a nation to assist a government with some kind of mission or for other clandestine tasks.

Though willing to accept help or training from U.S. special operators, that nation "might not want a C-130 with American markings sitting on the ramp for a few days," Wurster told the conference.

AFSOC officials are still in the early phases of answering several key questions, including: whether they will eventually pursue a new airlifter acquisition program, how many low-visibility airframes the outfit might need and what kind of plane the command should buy. ARMY GETS HALF OF REQUESTED FUNDS FOR FOLIAGE PENETRATING RADAR: Following a protest by the Defense Department, House and Senate appropriations conferees have rejected a Senate move to cut all funding in fiscal year 2007 for an Army radar program that DOD contends is capable of detecting tactical targets in foliage, and improvised explosive devices and other threats in urban clutter, reports Inside the Army.

According to the Army, the Foliage Penetrating Radar completed the final year of a three-year advanced concept technology demonstration in FY-06. The Army plans to leverage that work, sponsored by the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and adapt it for one of the service's UAVs. The radar was deployed for a first limited military utility assessment to the U.S. Southern Command area of operations in June 2005.

In July, the Senate Appropriations defense subcommittee eliminated the $25 million the Army requested for the radar project when it approved its version of the FY-07 defense appropriations bill. DOD subsequently sent an appeal to House and Senate appropriations conferees arguing that the technology is "desperately needed" by both Southern Command and U.S. Central Command.

SOUTHCOM's 2005 demonstration showed the radar's ability to support real-world operations, DOD said. "It provided a critical layer of intelligence information not previously available and provided the last 10 percent that compelled field commander's decision-making and significantly enhanced the mission planning process," the department told conferees.

Last month, the conferees agreed to fund the radar project at slightly more than $13 million in FY-07, $12 million below the Army's request. President Bush signed the FY-07 defense appropriations bill into law on Sept. 29.

Press Release: CREW Files Appeal to Force Agency to Release Communications Regarding Destruction of Abramoff Secret Service Visitor Records; National Archives and Records Administration Appears to be Under Direct Orders from Bush Admin. to Keep Records Private

Washington, DC – Today Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) filed an administrative appeal with the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) for failing to disclose communications regarding the handling of Secret Service visitor records. CREW is seeking records of communications NARA had with the Secret Service regarding the agency's practice of destroying visitor records to the White House. According to the Secret Service, it stopped destroying records in October 2004 at NARA's direction. NARA has refused to disclose the documents, claiming they are protected by the deliberative process privilege and exempt from the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).

CREW is already in litigation with the Secret Service over its refusal to produce all records of White House visits made by Jack Abramoff and his associates.

In a separate case filed by The Washington Post, the Secret Service has taken the position that all White House visitor records are presidential records controlled exclusively by the White House and, therefore, are exempt from the FOIA. It now appears that the White House is also preventing NARA from disclosing documents that would contradict the White House's claim that it has absolute custody and control over the visitor records.

In the past the Secret Service has taken a very different position, recognizing that visitor records are under the agency's control. During the Clinton administration, for example, the Secret Service provided such records to Judicial Watch in litigation over Filegate. The records that NARA has refused to disclose to CREW would document this radical shift in position.

CREW's executive director Melanie Sloan said today, "For months the Bush administration has been working to prevent the American public from learning of any contacts between administration officials and lobbyists, including Jack Abramoff." Sloan continued, "In its continued efforts to hide the truth, it now appears that the White House has ordered NARA not to comply with CREW's FOIA. CREW will continue to litigate this issue to ensure that the American public gets all the facts."

Court to hear arguments in OOIDA's HOS challenge Dec. 4

GRAIN VALLEY, Mo. – The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit will hear oral arguments Dec. 4 in OOIDA's court challenge of the Hours of Service regulations for truck drivers.

The Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association filed the challenge of the current regulations after Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration officials denied a petition to reconsider the rule.

OOIDA filed a petition Aug. 29, 2005, asking the government to reconsider changes to the sleeper-berth exception. In that petition, OOIDA asked for two changes.

Under the current sleeper-berth exception, drivers have to take a minimum of eight consecutive hours off in the sleeper berth plus at least an additional two hours off duty.

OOIDA sought in its petition to allow team drivers to split sleeper-berth time into something smaller than one consecutive eight-hour stretch and another two-hour break.

The second change OOIDA petitioned for was to allow solo drivers the ability to count the two-hour portion of the sleeper-berth exception as off-duty.

Under the current exception, truckers count two-hour breaks as off-duty time, but it does not stop the 14-hour clock. OOIDA requested these breaks stop the duty clock just as the eight-hour portion of the split does.

The Association's petition for both of these changes was denied by FMCSA. The Association followed up the denied petition with the current court challenge of the regulation in January.

Several groups joined the lawsuit on OOIDA's behalf — including the California Trucking Association and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

OOIDA, the interveners and FMCSA have been filing written arguments and various other court-required documents since the suit commenced. The oral arguments will be taken under advisement by the appeals panel and a ruling will be issued at a later date.

Opinion:An American atrocity

By Myron Beckenstein

October 26, 2006

The nightmare still isn't finished for Maher Arar and, through him, for those who care about what is happening to what once were considered bedrock American values - such naive concepts as liberty, trial by jury and innocent until proved guilty. The latest spasm showed up this month, four years after something that never should have happened had long passed the stage where it should have been over.

One of the reasons too many of us are willing to look the other way as these democratic frills are scrap-heaped in the so-called war on terrorism is that the people who are most affected have no names or faces. We can't visualize them. But Maher Arar gave us a name and a face.

Maher Arar is a Canadian citizen born in Syria. In 2002, he was returning to Canada from an overseas trip, and this required a brief stopover at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York. He was not planning to even leave the airport. But he was seized by U.S. agents as a threat to American security, held for several days and then sent to Syria, where he was jailed and tortured for a year before being allowed to return home to Canada.

The U.S. said it acted on information from Ottawa that Mr. Arar might be considered dangerous. But if he were dangerous, why didn't Washington just make sure he got on that plane and let the Canadians deal with him? Why did it have to jump into the picture and send him off to certain torture? The Canadians were not even consulted before this was done.

The picture became more complicated by the recent revelation that days before Mr. Arar was flown to Syria, Ottawa had notified the FBI that the information it had posted on him was wrong. It could find nothing linking him to terrorism.

So we have a man with no known terrorist ties being arbitrarily, nonjudicially convicted of having terrorist ties and sent off to a punishment that until recently was deemed unconscionable.

The Canadian government set up a panel to investigate its role in the affair and, after two years, released a 1,200-page report. It was critical of the Canadian authorities but also found no evidence that Ottawa participated in or agreed to the U.S. decision to send one of its citizens to Syria. The report also urged

Ottawa to formally protest the matter with Washington.

Washington's reaction has been neither apology nor even concern. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said he had not read the report and didn't know that Mr. Arar had been tortured, although this fact had been public for years. Mr. Gonzales added, "Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria."

The United States had shipped an innocent man to torture in a foreign country, but "we were not responsible." A day later, a clarification was issued: When Mr. Gonzales said "we," he was not speaking of the U.S. but just of his own Justice Department.

The deportation was carried out by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which in 2002 was part of the Justice Department. But now it is part of the Department of Homeland Security. Thus the Justice Department cannot be responsible for INS actions, even if they happened on its watch. And obviously DHS can't be responsible for something that happened before it was created. Responsibility has fallen safely into the bureaucratic cracks.

But it turns out the Justice Department did know. The deportation order was signed by Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson. Even John Ashcroft, the attorney general at the time, knew. When Canada learned of Mr. Arar's deportation and protested, Mr. Ashcroft assured Ottawa that Syria had assured him that Mr. Arar would not be tortured.

Last week, Mr. Arar was quoted as saying that an INS agent was on hand as he was being put aboard the plane to Syria. When he told the agent that he would be tortured there, he says the INS agent responded, "The INS is not the body or the agency that signed the Geneva Convention against torture."

As the details continue to come out, a White House spokesman said the other day that he couldn't comment on the case because Mr. Arar may be suing the United States.

After all he has gone through, Mr. Arar is still not in the clear. A human rights organization, the Institute for Policy Studies, was planning to honor him in Washington last week with its human rights award. But the sponsors could not get assurance from Mr. Gonzalez, or any member of the U.S. government, that Mr. Arar's name is not still on a watch list and that he wouldn't be arrested again if he entered this country. "We do not disclose names on watch lists," a Department of Homeland Security official said.

Although the Arar situation should be troubling to the government, it doesn't seem to be the least bit concerned. But what about the public? Are U.S. citizens upset about what is being done in the name of fighting terrorism? Or will the public keep looking the other way because the person involved is someone with an Arabic name, and after all, it couldn't happen to me?

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. AG Says He May Consider Proposal To Investigate Updating Geneva Conventions (AP)

By Mike Corder, Associated Press

AP, October 27, 2006

THE HAGUE, Netherlands (AP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the Bush administration may consider a Dutch proposal to set up an international group to investigate updating the Geneva Conventions or establishing a new treaty to deal with the threat of global terrorism.

In a speech Tuesday at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., Dutch Foreign Minister Ben Bot said it was legitimate to question whether international law _ framed mainly to deal with armed conflict between nations and conventional armies _ needs updating.

"Suggestions to explore such options as an additional protocol to the Geneva Conventions or a new ... Terrorism Convention or Treaty, cannot be dismissed out of hand," Bot said. "As I have suggested to Dutch Parliament, we should create a trans-Atlantic group of eminent experts to identify these possibilities."

After visiting Dutch ministers in The Hague, Gonzales told reporters Washington was not formally investigating updating international law, but he added: "We are not averse to looking at that."

"Obviously, we assess every day what is effective in dealing with the threat against the United States, in dealing with the threat against our friends and allies around the world," Gonzales said. "And this would be another thing I think that we would look at to see: do we have the necessary legal tools to deal effectively with terrorism?"

Facing a barrage of criticism from opponents and human rights groups about its incarceration of terror suspects at the Guantanamo Bay naval base in Cuba and the system of military tribunals set up to try them, Gonzales stressed that the Bush administration still fully supports current international law aimed at protecting the rights of those captured during armed conflicts.

"Obviously we want to be careful in not sending the message that we are in any way backing away from the principles of, say, the Geneva Conventions in terms of the protection of basic human rights," he said. "That's something we believe very strongly in and re-examination of Geneva would have to be done ... with the understanding that we all remain committed to the basic principles of the Geneva Conventions."

Gonzales is touring European capitals discussing Washington's new law paving the way for trials of terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

The administration's original legal framework for trying the suspects at military tribunals was rejected by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional, leading Washington to revamp the process.

U.S. President George W. Bush signed the act into law last week after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the legislation. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

In Germany, U.S. Official Addresses Rift With Allies (NYT)

By Mark Landler

BERLIN, Oct. 25 — Seeking to heal one of the deepest rifts between the United States and its European allies, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said here on Wednesday that the Bush administration had done a poor job of explaining its legal principles in its effort to prevent terrorism.

But he also faulted European countries, which have criticized the American military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. He said they were reluctant to take back their own citizens when released and had been insufficiently helpful in negotiating with other countries for the safe return of prisoners facing mistreatment in their own lands.

"We have repeatedly asked our European allies to join in these efforts," Mr. Gonzales said in a speech to a polite, skeptical invited audience. "But despite demands that Guantánamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees."

The diplomatic initiative by Mr. Gonzales comes amid growing concern over the conduct of German soldiers, including photographs that surfaced on Wednesday that appeared to show German troops in Afghanistan posing with a human skull.

Mr. Gonzales declined to name the countries he said were being uncooperative with regard to returned prisoners — especially, he said, while standing on a podium "in this great country."

His comment, delivered with a thin smile, seemed to suggest that Germany was among those the United States regarded as laggards.

Germany's responsiveness has come under scrutiny in the case of Murat Kurnaz, a Turkish-German man who was imprisoned at Guantánamo for more than four years, partly because of Germany's reluctance to take him back. Last August, Mr. Kurnaz was finally returned home, eight months after a new chancellor, Angela Merkel, raised his case in a meeting with President Bush.

In general, however, Mr. Gonzales seemed intent on reaching out to Europeans rather than rebuking them.

"There has been a lot of friction" in the trans-Atlantic relationship, he said. "We are partly to blame for that. We didn't do as good a job as we should have from the outset in explaining ourselves."

Mr. Gonzales, the legal architect of some of the Bush administration's toughest policies toward suspected terrorists, said he was deeply disappointed that many people overseas did not believe that the United States, or Mr. Bush himself, were committed to protecting the rule of law.

He defended American policies on the detention of "enemy combatants," the rights afforded them by military commissions, and the role of the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of prisoners.

Mr. Gonzales's European tour, which includes stops in Spain and the Netherlands, coincides with a growing concern here that Germany has compromised its own principles in helping the United States in its worldwide effort against terrorism. It also comes at a time when Germany published a proposed new defense policy that would pave the way for the country to play a bigger role in international peacekeeping missions.

There are no fewer than five formal investigations under way here relating to terrorism and the German military. The issues raised include accusations that the Central Intelligence Agency transferred prisoners to secret prisons in Eastern Europe, and questions about whether the German government was aware of such transfers, as well as whether German soldiers mistreated Mr. Kurnaz in Afghanistan, as he contends, before he was sent to Guantánamo.

The Defense Ministry denies that German soldiers abused Mr. Kurnaz. But the military has opened an investigation into his accusations.

"Our guys are supposed to be in Afghanistan to help stabilize things, not to kick around prisoners," said Volker Perthes, director of the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "This embarrasses us and qualifies a bit our discussion about what American soldiers are doing in Abu Ghraib."

The photos that appear to show the German troops posing with a human skull have added to the concerns. Some of the photos, published Wednesday in the mass-market newspaper Bild, depict the soldiers placing the skull on the hood of a jeep as a grisly emblem.

Bild did not say how it had obtained the photos. The paper said they were taken in 2003 near Kabul, and involved German troops serving as part of the international security force in Afghanistan.

The defense minister, Franz Josef Jung, has ordered an investigation. "Such activities are diametrically opposed to the values and behavior we teach our troops," he said to Bild.

Reports of military abuse carry an obvious historical echo in Germany, Mr. Perthes said, and could generate opposition in Parliament to the country's continuing involvement in Afghanistan.

In particular, there are questions about the deployment of soldiers belonging to an elite rapid-response unit of the German Army known as the KSK. The activities of these troops in Afghanistan are cloaked in mystery.

DOJ_NMG_0086921

Parliament is also investigating whether the German government was aware of the possible C.I.A. activities in Europe. That has put Mrs. Merkel in an awkward position, since her foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, was a high-level adviser to her predecessor, Gerhard Schröder.

The previous government is also under scrutiny in the case of Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen who was abducted in Macedonia in 2003 and turned over to American agents, who flew him to Afghanistan, on the mistaken belief that he was involved in terrorism.

George Bush Talks About 'The Next Attack On America' (WSJ)

Somewhere it is written in the Book of Politics that when the race gets tight, the leaders call in the Scribes. It is for this reason that I found myself at LaGuardia Airport Wednesday enroute to an afternoon meeting in the Oval Office with President Bush. That would be followed by lunch the next day with the vice president. The airport deserves mention because the very small group of writers who sat with the president was in fact exponentially larger than the number of travelers there who stopped to watch his 10:30 a.m. news conference on the TV monitors.

Two weeks from an election, perhaps their minds are made up. The president's certainly is. "This war is different than the other wars we've been in," Mr. Bush said a few hours after his news conference while sitting beneath a portrait of George Washington. "If we leave, they will follow us here."

Meetings with the president at election time are overtly political, but the remarkable irony here was how little election politics came up in our discussion. Mr. Bush talked expansively about Iraq, the Maliki government, Iran, Syria, North Korea and the broader war on terror. When his own party's infatuation with immigration was raised, Mr. Bush briefly ticked off his own thoughts on immigration policy and swung back to this:

"I'm campaigning like mad, and I'm looking at people in the eye and saying, you better have a government that does everything in its power to protect you from attack. You're right here in the office where I get briefed every morning and I'm telling you it's on my mind, and I can't keep it off my mind. I was affected deeply by the attacks of September the 11th. It became clear to me that day that we were at war. I know we're at war."

The room in which Mr. Bush is briefed every morning on the war, the Oval Office, is a cheerful room, full of light along high lemon-yellow walls. There are fine busts of Abraham Lincoln, Winston Churchill and Dwight Eisenhower, and the Washington painting. These icons of Mr. Bush's political formation no doubt were chosen after his first inauguration. But it is hard not to notice that the room today is occupied full time by three former war presidents and a prime minister of war.

The Oval Office today is a war room, and this is a war presidency. In these most partisan of times, Mr. Bush barely mentions the media and not once utters the word "Democrats." But as in 2004, we are again going to the polls to vote on national security. With Baghdad a cauldron of violence, this is the fight the Democrats say they want, and the one they are going to get

Nov. 7. However many Republican candidates are separating themselves from Mr. Bush's war, the president is guaranteeing that the subject goes to the voters.

What struck me Wednesday was how Mr. Bush's public news conference was almost wholly about the Iraqis and their government, and how his private conversation with us was mostly about the stakes for the American people. Over these war years, there should have been more of the latter. Admittedly, it is difficult to convey in public the urgency about the war on terror that Mr. Bush conveys in private. But it is obvious that he regards the threat to the American people as palpable.

"My biggest issue that I think about all the time," Mr. Bush says, "is the next attack on America, because I am fully aware that there are people out there that would like nothing more than to have another spectacular moment by killing American people. And they're coming. And we've got to do everything we can to stop them. That's why we need to be on offense all the time." This, he insists, is the justification for the terrorist wiretaps, the Patriot Act, the interrogations and the Iraq war.

Mr. Bush goes on offense himself in the kind of plain speech that maddens his detractors but may endear him in the heartland: "Maybe it's not nuanced enough for some of the thinkers and all that stuff -- that's fine. But that's exactly what a lot of people like me think."

On the nation's sense of frustration: "You don't have to tell me people are out there looking for something. I'm from Texas. My buddies are saying, 'Are you doing enough?' -- not, 'Are you doing too little?' They want to know, 'Are we winning?' They want to know, this mighty country, are we doing what it takes to win?"

The burden of war, however, has not sapped Mr. Bush physically as it did Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon. Recalling the deep toll that war and partisanship imposed on their presidencies, I looked closely at Mr. Bush for similar evidence: none. The hair's gone gray, but there is little sign of fatigue in his face or demeanor. I asked how he stays normal: "Prayer and exercise."

He dismisses the notion that Iraq is a mistake or a distraction: "This stuff about how Iraq is causing the enemy . . . whatever excuse they need, they have made up their mind to attack and they grab onto things to justify. If it's not Iraq, it's Israel. If it's not Israel, it's the Crusades. If it's not the Crusades, it is the cartoon."

Still, it's evident that Baghdad's sectarian violence has sent the U.S mood into a trough. The next day in a similar conversation with Vice President Cheney -- ballast to the energy of his president -- I ask if he senses a nation veering again toward the disillusion of the Vietnam War. He says no. "9/11 changes a lot. It's a watershed event and makes it more difficult for someone to argue that if we just bring the troops home we'll be safe and secure behind our oceans. The threat is there and it's real."

No matter the election results, it's obvious this president won't step back. He says, "We will press and press and press to protect ourselves. . . . If this country lets down its guard, it will be a fatal mistake."

Maybe it's too much. Maybe the country, or most of it this fall, doesn't share Mr. Bush's desire to be on offense all the time. Maybe they think he's exaggerating the threat for political effect. Maybe. But with or without a Republican Congress, if the country has a commander in chief who feels this deeply about protecting American soil from another 9/11 for at least another two years, it's fine by me.

Cheney Endorses Simulated Drowning (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 27, 2006

Dick Cheney, US vice-president, has endorsed the use of “water boarding” for terror suspects and confirmed that the controversial interrogation technique was used on Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, the senior al-Qaeda operative now being held at Guantánamo Bay.

Mr Cheney was responding to a conservative radio interviewer who asked whether water boarding, which involves simulated drowning, was a “no-brainer” if the information it yielded would save American lives. “It’s a no-brainer for me,” Mr Cheney replied.

The comments by the vice-president, who has been one of the leading advocates of reducing limitations on what interrogation techniques can be used in the war on terror, are the first public confirmation that water boarding has been used on suspects held in US custody.

A spokeswoman for Mr Cheney denied that he had endorsed or confirmed the use of water-boarding.

"The VP was talking about the interrogation programme, clearly noting that we do not torture and we live up to our international treaty obligations. He does not discuss any techniques or methods that may or may not be used in questioning," said Lea Anne McBride.

Mr Cheney said recent legislation passed by Congress allowed the White House to continue its aggressive interrogation programme.

But his remarks appear to stand at odds with the views of three key Republican senators who helped draft the recently passed Military Commission Act, and who argue that water boarding is not permitted according to that law.

"[It's] a direct affront to the primary authors of the Military Commission Act in the Senate – John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner – all of whom have publicly stated that the legislation signed by the president last week makes water boarding a war crime," said Jennifer Daskal, advocacy director at Human Rights Watch. "This is Cheney ignoring the consensus of his own Pentagon," she said, referring to comments by senior officials that harsh interrogation techniques do not produce reliable intelligence.

John Bellinger, the State Department legal adviser, last week declined to answer specific questions on water boarding, saying Congress would have to determine whether specific interrogation techniques were permissible under the Geneva -conventions.

The Bush administration was forced to work with Congress to pass the Military Commissions Act after the Supreme Court ruled that al-Qaeda suspects were entitled to some protections under the Geneva convention. "Any procedures going forward would have to comply with the standards of Common Article 3 [of the Geneva conventions], including the prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment . . . ," Mr Bellinger said. "Congress would have to agree that they are permitted under the law."

Asked in the radio interview whether he would agree that the debate over terrorist interrogations and water boarding was "a little silly", Mr Cheney responded: "I do agree".

"I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation," he said.

Cheney's Remarks Fuel Torture Debate (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Vice President Cheney said this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water during questioning was a "no-brainer," prompting complaints from human rights advocates that he was endorsing the use of a controversial technique known as waterboarding on prisoners held by the United States.

In an interview Tuesday with Scott Hennen, a conservative radio show host from Fargo, N.D., Cheney agreed with Hennen's assertion that "a dunk in water" may yield valuable intelligence from terrorism suspects. He also referred to information gleaned from Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the captured architect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, but stopped short of explicitly saying what techniques were used.

"Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Hennen asked.

"Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Cheney said, "but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

The comments underscore continuing uncertainty over precisely which techniques can be used legally during CIA interrogations of terrorism suspects. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other lawmakers have said recent legislation that established ground rules for interrogations should effectively bar waterboarding and other methods that are viewed as violations of the Geneva Conventions and U.S. criminal law.

Bush administration officials have repeatedly declined to say which techniques they believe are permitted under the new law and have steadfastly declined to discuss methods used in the past.

Numerous sources have said that the CIA subjected Mohammed and other "high-value" terrorism suspects to waterboarding, a technique that gives the prisoner the sensation of drowning.

DOJ_NMG_0086924

A Cheney spokeswoman said yesterday that he was not confirming the use of any specific interrogation techniques.

"He was talking about the interrogation program without torture," spokeswoman Lee Anne McBride said. "The vice president does not discuss any techniques or methods that may or may not have been used in questioning."

Congress passed legislation last month putting limits on interrogation techniques that can be used on prisoners declared to be "unlawful enemy combatants." Lawmakers largely left it to the executive branch to decide whether many techniques would be legal.

The U.S. Army revised its field manual last month to ban waterboarding and other techniques as "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment" outlawed by the Geneva accords. Military officials said experience had shown that abusive techniques do not work in yielding reliable intelligence from prisoners.

John Sifton, a senior researcher on terrorism and counterterrorism at Human Rights Watch, said Cheney's comments seem to both endorse waterboarding and suggest its use on Mohammed and other prisoners.

"I think the context is clear that he's agreeing that what the interviewer suggested -- dunking people in water to interrogate them -- is a no-brainer," Sifton said. "Basically, what the vice president did is inject ambiguity into a situation in which Congress and the military thinks there is no ambiguity."

Neal Sonnett, chairman of an American Bar Association task force on enemy combatants, said Cheney's comments were "a little equivocal" on details but clear in their overall meaning.

"It may be too much to characterize it as a direct admission," Sonnett said. "But he is certainly suggesting that he doesn't see anything wrong with waterboarding."

In waterboarding -- one of a number of drowning-simulation techniques that date to the Spanish Inquisition -- a prisoner is generally strapped down with his feet higher than his head. Water is then poured on his face while his nose and mouth are covered by a cloth. The technique produces an intense sensation of being close to suffocation and drowning, according to interrogation experts and human rights advocates.

The Khmer Rouge and other outlaw regimes have employed the method, and it has been condemned by many human rights and military lawyers as a clear example of illegal torture.

In 1947, the United States prosecuted a Japanese soldier for war crimes and sentenced him to 15 years hard labor for using the technique on a U.S. prisoner.

Israeli Agent Tells How Suspect Admitted Meeting Terrorists (AP)

October 26, 2006 (CHICAGO) - An Israeli security agent told a courtroom cleared of spectators Thursday how a suburban Chicago grocer admitted under days of questioning that he had met secretly with Palestinian terrorist leaders.

"Did you think that he had information that could lead to an imminent threat to human life?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Reid J. Schar asked. "Yes," said the agent who testified under the one-name alias Nadav rather than his real name out of concern for possible reprisals. The testimony came at the racketeering trial of Muhammad Salah, 53, of suburban Bridgeview and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va. They are accused of bankrolling Hamas terrorists and have pleaded not guilty to the indictment. Prosecutors say they were part of a U.S.-based cell that furnished money and fresh recruits to the group that wants to overthrow the State of Israel and replace it with a Palestinian government.

Nadav was granted permission not only to testify under an alias but to appear on the stand in disguise. Reporters were able to see the prosecutor and listen to the testimony, through a translator, on television in a separate courtroom where the audio was sometimes less than sharp.

Before even entering the separate courtroom, five floors from where the trial was taking place, reporters were required to pass through a metal detector. Comet, an explosives-sniffing Labrador retriever who is a familiar face at the courthouse, shuttled between the two rooms.

Salah was arrested in January 1993 as he tried to enter Israel from the Gaza Strip and served four and a half years in prison after making a series of admissions about his ties to the Hamas terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0086925

The same admissions obtained by Nadav and other interrogators are now being used as evidence by federal prosecutors at the racketeering trial.

Salah says that the admissions were tortured out of him.

By contrast Nadav testified he built a close rapport with Salah and that the two men ate salad and drank tea together between questionings.

Salah's attorneys maintain that Israel's Shin Bet security service, of which Nadav is a member, used a so-called good-cop, bad-cop technique in which one interrogator is very tough while the other professes friendship.

They say Nadav was the so-called good cop.

Nadav testified that Salah readily admitted meeting with Adil Awadallah, allegedly the Hamas military leader in the Ramallah area.

"Did the defendant Salah tell you about a second meeting with Adil Awadallah?" Schar asked. Nadav said that he did.

"Did he tell you about providing any money to Awadallah?" Schar asked.

"Yes," Nadav said. He said Salah told him he agreed to provide the alleged Hamas commander with $60,000 and "this is what actually happened."

Nadav said Salah also told of meeting with other terrorist leaders.

Salah defense attorney Erica Thompson objected, saying the message to the jury was that Salah knew high-level terrorists. Salah maintains he was actually delivering money to Palestinian charities.

"This is insidious," Thompson said. Judge Amy J. St. Eve told the jury the testimony was not being offered as proof that the individuals named were actually terrorists but only to show what Nadav believed.

After his arrest, Israeli security men searched Salah's East Jerusalem hotel room and found $100,000 in cash.

Nadav testified that at the end of January, he made a deal with Salah who agreed to provide a map to the whereabouts of the remains of an Israeli soldier who had been kidnapped and murdered by Hamas terrorists.

But he said that Salah's wife told him in a telephone conversation that the map had been destroyed. Salah drew a version of the map from memory and an all-night search followed but the remains were not found.

Nadav testified that the Israelis agreed in return for help in finding the body to return the $100,000 and free a number of female prisoners.

Ga. Terror Case Files To Stay Open (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 27, 2006

A federal magistrate Thursday denied prosecutors' attempts to seal court documents containing unclassified material in the case of two Atlanta area men held on terrorism-related charges.

Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn G. Brill ruled that prosecutors' requests were too broad and "would seal (at least initially) virtually all filings" and impose a "significant administrative burden on the court."

Prosecutors in the case of Syed Haris Ahmed and Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, who are charged with providing material support to terrorists, had argued that unclassified but "sensitive" information handed over to defense attorneys could not be used in further court pleadings unless first put under seal. The judge then would have had to determine what could be released to the public and what could not.

Prosecutors said such "sensitive" information might disclose ongoing investigations, implicate people who are not charged with crimes and shine light on foreign governments' operations.

Brill wrote that, if the government wants unclassified information to remain under seal, it must "narrowly tailor" its arguments for doing so — not seek a blanket order.

Classified information that is turned over to the defense will be kept in a secure room where lawyers can go to view it. If defense attorneys want to quote any classified information in their motions, they must turn the documents over to a court security officer, who's charged with producing filtered versions for the public file.

DOJ_NMG_0086926

The case highlights the difficulty of trying suspects in terrorism-related cases using foreign intelligence and other sensitive and classified information.

Tom Clyde, attorney for The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, the Associated Press and WSB-TV, said that the prosecution's arguments for enhanced secrecy was a "reversal of the presumption of openness" and "is plainly unworkable."

"The order reflects that fact that our court system is founded on a principle of openness," Clyde said Thursday. "Even in a terrorism case, the government does not get a free pass to litigate the case in secret. If the government wants to have records sealed, it is going to have to demonstrate why that is necessary."

Sadequee, 20, of Roswell, and Ahmed, 21, a former Georgia Tech student, are accused of traveling to Canada in March 2005 and meeting with others to discuss "violent jihad." The two men allegedly took "casing videos" of potential targets in Washington in April 2005 and discussed an attack on Dobbins Air Reserve Base in Marietta.

Suspected Terrorists To Face Hearings (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba-Fourteen high-profile suspected terrorists recently transferred to the Guantanamo detention center are expected to face hearings soon, military officials said Wednesday.

Brig. Gen. Ed Leacock, deputy commander of detention operations at Guantanamo Bay, said officials are gathering evidence for the hearings now. Officials have also identified individuals who could work with the men as their representatives during the hearings, but no appointments have been made yet.

It was not clear Wednesday whether any of the 14 men have been questioned by the military interrogators. The hearings - officially called Combatant Status Review Tribunals - for the 14 men would determine whether or not they are enemy combatants, and therefore subject to a military trial.

The 14 men include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who allegedly planned the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, as well as the alleged architect of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole and the alleged plotter of the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

They had been held in CIA custody at secret locations, and were transferred several weeks ago to the Guantanamo Bay detention center in southeastern Cuba.

Military leaders, who took a few reporters on a tour of the detention center Wednesday, said the 14 high-profile detainees have not created any problems for the guards. And they said other detainees know the men are there, but have had little reaction to that.

The defense officials, including Cully Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, also would not say where the men are being held at the facility - which includes five separate camps and a sixth one to be completed in a few months, a maximum security building. Some portions of the camps are not being used because of ongoing repairs and upgrades, including fixing damage done during an uprising by some 20 detainees earlier this year.

Stimson also said he expects military tribunals for some of the other detainees could begin as early as next spring. Officials have drafted new rules and procedures for the military trial that were authorized by a law signed last week by President Bush.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that trying detainees in military tribunals violated U.S. and international law, so Bush urged Congress to change the law. Six weeks later, after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the bill, Bush signed the new law.

Leacock said engineers and planners have been at the facility this week and would be making recommendations for a courthouse complex for the military commissions when they begin next year.

The plans would include housing and media facilities, as well as added security.

Two options would be presented to Pentagon leaders that could include anywhere from a few to 10 new courtrooms. Stimson said there was "very little difference between the two" options.

DOJ_NMG_0086927

Members of Congress would also weigh in on the decision because appropriators would have to find funding for the construction. Staff from the appropriations committees are planning to visit the facility soon. Defense officials had no cost estimates.

Construction will take longer than other similar projects because all the materials will have to be delivered by barge to Guantanamo Bay, said Leacock.

Previously 10 detainees had been charged with war crimes, and it is expected that they would be charged again under the new law. Officials expect to charge another 60 to 80 detainees, and bring them to trial.

The Guantanamo tour came just one week after the military began a new investigation into alleged prisoner abuse at the detention facility. Army Col. Richard Basset is looking into allegations, made by a Marine sergeant, that guards she met bragged about hitting detainees and denying them water.

There are currently 435 detainees at the prison, most considered enemy combatants. About 120 have been approved for transfer to either their home countries or another nation that was willing to accept them.

U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-The U.S. government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents.

The government argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence.

The U.S. proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees.

The rules, which would apply to detainees pursuing court challenges to their designations as "enemy combatants," would tighten censorship of mail from attorneys and give the military more control over what lawyers can discuss with their clients, according to the filing.

The number of face-to-face meetings between defense attorneys and detainees would be limited to four total. There are now no restrictions on the number of times they can meet, although lawyers' access to the base is already hampered because it is so remote.

The government says current rules have allowed detainees to receive books or articles about terrorist attacks in Iraq, London and Israel, as well as details of the prisoner abuse investigation at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In the court filing, which was first reported Wednesday by The Boston Globe, a military lawyer said security at Guantanamo Bay has been threatened by the introduction of a book on Abu Ghraib, a speech given at an Amnesty International conference about the war on terror, and other materials.

"Such materials could incite detainees to violence, leading to a destabilization of the camp," wrote Navy Cmdr. Patrick M. McCarthy.

The government petition was filed in August in the case of Haji Bismullah, an Afghanistan native who is among several Guantanamo detainees represented by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

Currently, mail from lawyers is examined only for physical contraband. The proposed rules call for all of a detainee's mail to be examined for forbidden information.

Wells Dixon, an attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, said he suspects the proposal is aimed at controlling the information coming out of Guantanamo. Accounts from defense lawyers who have visited Guantanamo have cast doubt on government assertions that most detainees are hardened terrorists, Dixon said.

"What's happening is the government wants to hide this indisputable fact," he said "They're not happy we've been able to bring a lot of these developments to light."

In 2004, the Supreme Court said detainees can contest the legality of their detentions. A law signed by President Bush on Oct. 17 bars detainees from protesting their detentions in court, but they still have a right to challenge their designations as "enemy combatants." The new rules would restrict legal representation for those challenges.

The Paradox Behind The Paralysis On Security (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

A theory that explains the chaotic world of 2006 -- one where people from Baghdad to Beijing seem unable to cooperate on projects that would make them better off -- was written more than 40 years ago by an obscure American economist named Mancur Olson Jr. His short 1965 book, "The Logic of Collective Action," explained why big groups, including nation-states, cannot agree on actions that are in their common interest.

You can see this perverse "logic" at work in nearly all the conflicts that vex the planet today. The divisive political dynamic that blocks collective solutions -- what Olson described as the "surprising tendency for the exploitation of the great by the small" -- is apparent even in the United States. But I'm going to stick to foreign examples.

Start with Iraq, the conflict that is grinding up U.S. soldiers and Iraqi civilians in horrifying numbers. Iraqis know they would all be better off if they could agree on a national compact that would subordinate sectarian differences to the larger national interests of stability and prosperity. Their leaders keep pledging support for this goal, but it doesn't happen.

Why? Olson, who taught at the University of Maryland until he died in 1998, explained the underlying problem this way: "Unless the number of individuals in a group is quite small, or unless there is coercion or some other special device to make individuals act in their common interest, rational, self-interested individuals will not act to achieve their common or group interests."

The problem, he said, is that although everyone would benefit from the collective good of, say, greater security, it's irrational for any individual to make voluntary sacrifices to achieve it.

I put a version of this dilemma to L. Paul Bremer in Baghdad in January 2004, when he was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority. In an interview in the Green Zone, I said that although people were describing him as an imperial proconsul, his situation seemed closer to that of a bankruptcy trustee: If one of his three big creditors -- the Shiites, the Sunnis and the Kurds -- decided to push for unilateral advantage and "call their loans," they would drive the enterprise into ruin. But if Bremer could coax the parties toward an agreement, everyone would emerge better off.

Bremer's initial response to the bankruptcy analogy was unforgettable: "Is that Chapter 7, or Chapter 11?" he asked. He went on to say that, like a bankruptcy trustee, he had to believe that the parties around the table were rational.

But individual rationality often pushes us toward solutions that are collectively ruinous. That was Olson's point. He was writing at a time when most social scientists embraced upbeat theories about the inherent cohesiveness of politics. He showed why this optimism was misplaced. It was, in fact, irrational for any individual to pay taxes voluntarily to support an army; better to let your neighbor pay, and get the benefit for free. Groups that acted voluntarily for the common interest were "composed of either altruistic individuals or irrational individuals," he wrote.

Iran illustrates the Olson problem. Every Iranian I encountered on a recent trip there expressed a belief that this is Iran's moment to emerge as a leading political and economic force in the Middle East. But to get this collective benefit every Iranian wants, the country's leaders will have to limit a nuclear program that some Iranians want. Olson would tell us that, absent compulsion, it isn't going to happen: Powerful pressure groups will prevent the collective good.

An Olson problem also afflicts North Korea's neighbors as they deal with its nuclear weapons program. China, Russia, Japan, South Korea and the United States would all be better off if they had stopped Kim Jong Il before he detonated a bomb. But it's like fixing potholes. It was easier to wait for someone else to do it -- for Washington to wait for Beijing and vice versa. And, of course, the job never got done.

Olson's escape from this conundrum was his recognition that it's necessary to compel the collective behavior that is in everyone's interest. Workers must be compelled to join a union; otherwise, they'll freeload. Citizens must be required by law to pay taxes; otherwise, they won't do it. Sectarian groups must be forced to obey the national government; otherwise they will create anarchy. And individual nations must be compelled to obey rules limiting the spread of nuclear technology and other threats to common security. Otherwise, we will have unending wars.

In the international arena, the appropriate instrument of compulsion is not, as the Bush administration has believed, the United States. It is the United Nations. Making the United Nations effective enough that it can compel the common good is the right answer to Olson's paradox.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Chief Says Politics Ignored In Rise Of Corruption Probes (AP)

By Ron Jenkins, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY - The FBI has stepped up public corruption investigations since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorists attacks and is pursuing current probes with no thought of the upcoming elections, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Thursday.

Story continues below advertisement

Mueller, in Oklahoma City for a rare visit, his second since becoming director five years ago, said when the FBI prioritized its national security mission after 9-11, it also made public corruption its No. 1 priority in criminal investigations.

The result has been a surge in public corruption convictions. "In the last two years, we have had upward of 1,070 convictions of public officials who have abused the (public) trust."

"Having made that a priority, each of the divisions has looked for areas in which there has been or appear to be public corruption and addressed it with investigations followed up with successful prosecutions."

The FBI also has established a separate Web site for the public to report suspected corruption.

Mueller declined to address questions on specific investigations, such as the congressional page scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., entering alcohol treatment after disclosure he had made sexually implicit text messages to teenage male pages.

He would not speculate on how long the page scandal probe would last.

But he said politics "does not influence" the course of FBI corruption investigations.

"We continue our investigations, regardless of the politics of the time. Investigations have gone on as if there were no elections coming up."

Oklahoma interest in the page scandal has been peaked by the disclosure that Jordan Edmund, former deputy campaign manager for GOP gubernatorial candidate Ernest Istook, may have received suggestive text messages from Foley.

Edmund was interviewed for 2 1/2 hours by FBI agents in Oklahoma City earlier this month.

Mueller said the FBI is increasing its presence abroad in order to fulfill its primary mission of protecting American citizens at home.

"Increasingly, we find that which adversely impacts us in the United States is being initiated overseas and for us to be successful, we have to be a worldwide organization," he said.

He referred specifically to two "computer worms" that caused havoc in the United States _ one caused by a teenager in Morocco and one by an individual in Turkey.

"I see us as a bridge between that which is happening within the United States and that which is occurring overseas that may adversely affect us here," he said.

Asked about the agencies interrogation methods, he said: "What I will tell you is the FBI adheres to its protocol for interrogations, which over a period of time has been in place and does not allow coercion. That has been our protocol and we adhere to that protocol."

DOJ_NMG_0086930

Oklahoma City was the site of the country's worse domestic terrorist act in 1995 when a federal building was blown up. The explosion killed 168 people and injured hundreds. Timothy McVeigh was executed for his role in the bombing plot and Terry Nichols, a former Army buddy of McVeigh's, was given a life sentence.

When asked about former Attorney General John Ashcroft's criticism of prosecutors in the bombing case in his book, Mueller said it was wrong for authors of books on the attack to say federal authorities botched the case.

"While there may have been some glitches in the prosecution, in terms of the documents, nonetheless, all documents that conceivably could have been exculpatory were turned over to the defense counsel and the case has taken its course and McVeigh has been executed.

"And so it's been a successful investigation and successful prosecution and an exceptionally unfortunate and horrible terrorist attack."

He said the various conspiracy theories that keep popping up are "a fact of life."

"You have those conspiracies that will be out there, regardless of the weight of the evidence as it has been shown in public trials."

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., has announced that he will begin hearings about Nov. 15 with a focus on "possible foreign connections" to the Oklahoma City bombing.

No Extra Prison Time For Terror Hoax (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 27, 2006

A federal judge today handed down a 41-month sentence for a man who pleaded guilty to falsely telling the FBI about a terror plot against a company's Chicago headquarters.

Gilbert Romero, 31, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Elaine Bucklo for the hoax.

Bucklo said she wanted to send a message that the incident was serious, even though Romero is expected to serve the sentence concurrently with a 12-year state prison sentence on prior burglary convictions.

Romero, whose last known address was in Northlake, did not make a statement in court.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Edward Siskel said false statements like the ones in the Romero case are disruptive to the FBI, which has limited resources to use in terror investigations.

"(The hoax) was taken extremely seriously by the FBI," Siskel said, adding that agents spent a month running down leads.

Siskel said Romero's apparent motivation was to be transferred from a county jail to federal custody.

Romero's lawyer, Thomas Brandstrader, said Romero had "a bad idea, and the execution was even worse."

The defendant pleaded guilty June 30 to "conveying false information about the use of a weapon of mass destruction against property in the United States" and making false statements to federal agents.

Romero had a string of prior burglary convictions and has been in and out of state custody since the early 1990s, according to state records.

In June 2005, Romero told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement.

He said the attack was to be carried out by an individual who was recruiting other terrorists for a strike on U.S. soil, the indictment against him stated. Prosecutors did not reveal the individual's identity or the name of the company.

According to the indictment, Romero falsely told federal agents he and three others would team with the supposed terrorist.

The phony terrorism team purported it would fund the plot either through the anticipated awards of a medical malpractice suit or by taking hostages—specifically owners of currency exchanges and jewelry stores—and holding them for ransom, the indictment alleges.

The hoax that Romero allegedly sketched out involved enormous violence. In addition to destroying the company with a fertilizer-and-fuel bomb, Romero told agents the terrorists would gun down any police officers who intervened, the indictment alleges.

Romero said the guns, AK-47s and Mac-10 machine pistols, would come from Romero's street gang, according to the charges.

Prison Sentence For Man Who Lied To FBI About Chicago Terror Plot (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge gave a 41-month sentence Thursday to a 31-year-old man who pleaded guilty in July to telling the FBI about a fictitious terror plot to bomb a company's Chicago headquarters.

U.S. District Court Judge Elaine Bucklo said she wanted to send a message that the incident was serious, even though Gilbert Romero is expected to serve the sentence concurrently with a 12-year state prison sentence for prior burglary convictions.

Romero, of suburban Northlake, was charged with making false statements and reporting a hoax terrorism threat.

Authorities said Romero was an inmate at the Cook County Jail in June 2005 when he allegedly told officials he had information about an upcoming attack.

FBI agents interviewed Romero, who had been jailed for a parole violation, authorities said. He had been paroled from state prison in February after being convicted for burglary, according to state records.

Assistant State's Attorney Edward Siskel said Romero's apparent motive was to be transferred from a county jail to federal custody.

Romero's lawyer, Thomas Brandstrader, told the Chicago Tribune that Romero had "a bad idea, and the execution was even worse."

Romero told the agents the attack would be carried out by an individual who was recruiting others for a supposed strike on a U.S. target with a fertilizer and fuel bomb, according to the indictment. He also allegedly told agents the terrorists would kill any police officers who intervened. The indictment did not give further details of the fictional plot.

Siskel said false statements like the ones in the Romero case are disruptive to the FBI, which has limited resources to use in terror investigations.

Liquid Ban Causes Airline Earnings To Spring A Leak (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, October 27, 2006

The government's abrupt ban on liquids in plane cabins last summer slammed third-quarter earnings of U.S. airlines as potential customers changed travel plans rather than deal with the tighter rules.

US Airways and AirTran Airways on Thursday became the latest of several large carriers to blame the terrorism-related ban for major hits to results for the quarter ended Sept. 30.

Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways said the restriction cost it between $30 million and $40 million in lost ticket sales, and Orlando-based AirTran put its lost revenue as high as $12 million. Last week, No. 1 American Airlines cited a $50 million hit to its revenue, and discount leader Southwest put the number at $40 million.

The ban added to airlines' costs in various ways, including worker overtime. But the airlines have only quantified lost revenue.

“We saw a cessation of bookings over that first weekend,” AirTran CEO Joe Leonard said. “We have returned to normal booking levels, but we never made up that loss.”

On Aug. 10, hours after British authorities arrested suspected would-be plane bombers in London, officials in the USA and Britain prohibited passengers from carrying almost any liquids or gels onto airplanes. The terrorists had been plotting to bring liquid explosives onto planes to blow up trans-Atlantic flights, authorities said.

Airport security lines mushroomed because of stricter searches and passenger confusion. Many passengers missed flights. The amount of checked baggage soared because passengers could not pack liquids in carry-ons. Airlines were forced to pay workers overtime to try to keep up with the increase.

The TSA has since relaxed the rules so passengers can bring aboard containers of liquids 3 ounces or less that are carried inside a clear plastic bag. But even as recently as Sept. 30, checked luggage at US Airways was still running 20% higher than before the ban, US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said. AirTran's checked luggage is still running 9% higher than normal.

AirTran reported a third-quarter loss of $4.3 million, or 5 cents per share, vs. a profit of $1 million a year earlier. US Airways posted a $78 million net loss, or 88 cents per share, vs. a $99 million loss a year earlier. Excluding special items, US Airways earned $101 million.

Terrorizing Congress (WSJ)

The U.S. hasn't been hit by a terror attack in five years, but that hasn't stopped the insurance industry from hitting up Congress again and again for more terror insurance subsidies. Keep this in mind the next time someone claims a new federal program will be "temporary."

Congress passed the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act (TRIA) ostensibly to assist the insurance industry through a "transitional period." In return for insurers offering terrorism coverage to their commercial policyholders, the feds agreed to cover the bulk of any losses from future terror attacks. The problem is that this federal backstop is no longer needed, if it ever was. It's true some insurers exited the market after 9/11, but others were still able to raise capital after the attacks. And by the time Congress passed TRIA in November 2002, premium rates were falling.

If anyone needs further evidence that TRIA deserves a proper burial, we recommend a recent U.S. Treasury report on the terrorism risk insurance market. According to the report, the percentage of companies buying terrorism coverage has climbed to 58% in 2005 from 27% in 2003, even as the cost of coverage has fallen to "roughly 3 to 5 percent of total property insurance coverage."

The report adds that the "financial health and capacity of insurers" has also bounced back, disasters like Katrina notwithstanding. Since 9/11, "policyholder surpluses in the property and casualty industry have risen, as the industry has remained profitable (even with the 2005 hurricane season losses) and has benefited from increased rates of return on investments." In short, this industry is doing just fine without any taxpayer guarantees.

Already renewed once, TRIA expires at the end of 2007, and the program's backers in the insurance, real-estate and financial services industries are out in force arguing that it be made permanent. Hank Greenberg, the former AIG chief, calls TRIA "essential." And Aaron Davis of Aon Corp. claims that "the private market for terrorism risk insurance cannot operate without some form of public-private partnership."

But that gets it exactly backward. As the Treasury report explains, TRIA "appears to negatively affect the emergence of private sector reinsurance capacity because it dilutes demand for private sector reinsurance." We'll never know what the private sector reinsurance market is capable of so long as Uncle Sam is providing the service for free. TRIA also creates a moral hazard. By shifting coverage costs from property owners to taxpayers, the program potentially creates higher overall costs by reducing incentives for property owners to invest in risk mitigation efforts.

So far the White House has been steadfast in insisting that TRIA eventually be allowed to sunset. And in a letter submitted with the new report to Senator Richard Shelby, whose Banking Committee would lead any reauthorization of the law, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson reiterated that "TRIA was not intended to be permanent, but rather was intended to help stabilize the insurance industry. It has been successful in that regard."

It certainly has. But that doesn't mean the Bush Administration isn't in for a fight next year with Washington's formidable insurance lobby. Government programs -- even hastily conceived ones like TRIA -- just keep going, and going, and going . . .

Don't Mistake Iraq Timelines For Deadlines, Rumsfeld Says (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Thursday that critics should “just back off” on demands for deadlines for progress in Iraq and that it is difficult to predict when Iraqis will assume control of their country.

DOJ_NMG_0086933

At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld said U.S. and Iraqi officials have been discussing benchmarks for Iraq's security, politics and economy. Such benchmarks are valuable, he said, because “you are in effect establishing priorities.”

However, he said the timelines have no specific deadlines, nor do they spell out consequences if the goals are not met.

“You're looking for some sort of a guillotine to come falling down if some date isn't met. That is not what this is about,” Rumsfeld said.

“They've been discussing the way forward through the rest of this year and next year,” Rumsfeld said of discussions between U.S. and Iraqi officials. “As they do that, they then discuss, ‘Well, when might something happen?' And it isn't a date. And it isn't a penalty if it doesn't” happen.

“You ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult,” Rumsfeld said regarding talk of deadlines. “Honorable people are working on these things together.”

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in Baghdad on Tuesday that Iraqi leaders had agreed to have a plan by the end of the year laying out the times by which they want certain things accomplished.

On Wednesday, however, Iraqi Prime Minster Nouri al-Maliki said his government had not agreed to anything.

Later Wednesday, President Bush said al-Maliki was correct in saying mandates could not be imposed on Iraq. He added, “We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective.”

Rumsfeld Tells Iraq Critics To 'Back Off' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

With his chorus of critics expanding deeper into Republican ranks, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told detractors yesterday to pull back as U.S. and Iraqi officials grapple with the uncertainties of laying out Iraq's course.

"You ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult," Rumsfeld said, appearing unusually combative as he sparred with reporters at the Pentagon. "Honorable people are working on these things together," he said, adding emphatically that "no daylight" exists between the U.S. and Iraqi sides.

But with just 12 days before the Nov. 7 elections, bipartisan criticism of the war appears to be gaining momentum, despite Rumsfeld's pugnacious defense of the Bush administration's Iraq strategy. The office of Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) mocked Rumsfeld's admonition on a day when October's death toll of U.S. troops in Iraq reached 96, the highest monthly total in a year.

More troubling for President Bush, the cracks in the Republican Party's support for the war are widening. In recent days, Rep. Anne M. Northup (Ky.) and Sen. Mike DeWine (Ohio) have called for Rumsfeld's resignation, and Rep. John E. Sweeney (N.Y.) and Tennessee's Republican Senate candidate, Bob Corker, have declared that "stay the course" is not a viable strategy. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Tex.) has said she would not have authorized the invasion if she knew then what she knows now; and Rep. Curt Weldon (Pa.) has demanded that generals -- not the White House -- draft a plan for withdrawal.

Bush declared Wednesday that the United States is winning the war in Iraq, but acknowledged that he is not satisfied with the situation and vowed to press Iraqi leaders to do more to stabilize their country on their own.

"Everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this, and . . . turn it into a political football," Rumsfeld said yesterday of the ongoing talks over goals by the Iraqi leadership, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior U.S. commander in Iraq. He denied reports that Casey sought to increase U.S. troops in the country, and he said a majority of the 310,000 Iraqi security forces are "in the lead" and "bearing the brunt of the battle" in Iraq.

Rumsfeld said setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to assume greater control over security and the operation of public institutions does not imply strict deadlines. "You're looking for some sort of guillotine to come falling down if some date isn't met. That is not what this is about," he said.

Four months ago, House Republican leaders orchestrated an 11-hour floor debate, hoping to put Democrats on record as opposing Bush's stand to see the war through until "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq" has been reached. Over the summer, a trickle of Republicans voiced concern that the war was not going the way the White House was portraying it. Now, many more Republicans are adding their voices.

"You can have a bad week, you can have two bad weeks, but when you have two bad months, you have to reassess," Northup said this week as she called for Rumsfeld's replacement. "You cannot afford to lose the numbers we are losing now and just keep slugging away."

Sweeney told the Glen Falls, N.Y., Kiwanis Club last week: "I think that the strategy of 'staying the course' is not a strategy at all. It doesn't work."

Rumsfeld "would not be my secretary of defense if I was the president of the United States," the embattled DeWine told CNN. "He has, you know, made huge mistakes. And I think history will judge him very harshly."

"I can't defend how the president laid out the need for [going to war in Iraq]. I don't support Rumsfeld," Rep. Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio) said recently in a local newspaper.

"We can't set a hard timetable, but we can ramp up pressure on the Iraqis to take responsibility," Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) told the Danbury News-Times editorial board.

Such statements about an unpopular war may seem logical from candidates locked in perhaps the most difficult political campaigns of their lives. But in recent days, the sentiments have come from Republicans breezing toward reelection or not even in a race this year.

Hutchison, a White House stalwart who is not up for reelection, broke from Republican talking points, saying: "If I knew then what I had known now, on the weapons of mass destruction, which was a key reason I voted the way I did, I would not have voted to go into Iraq."

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), who is leading her Democratic opponent in the most recent poll, 73 percent to 10 percent, declared: "Staying the course is neither an option nor a plan. Congress must be willing to reassess and re-chart our future military presence in Iraq."

Republicans had once hoped to frame Iraq as a vital front in the fight against terrorism and to pound Democratic critics for being weak on national security. But with just days left to campaign, Democrats are turning the war against Republicans in dozens of closely contested races around the country.

The calls for Rumsfeld's resignation and the criticism of the conduct of the war by Northup, DeWine and others are "a reflection of just how difficult it has been for Republican candidates to separate themselves from the president and the war," said Amy Walter, a House analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

"With 12 days left, they've attacked the Democrats. It didn't work. They've talked about their greatest strengths: taxes, terrorism and immigration. It didn't work. Now they're saying, 'Well, we'll try this.' "

"They have to respond to their constituents," said Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster and campaign strategist.

"In the end, voters need to know they understand the public's frustration and concern," he said. "Does it undermine the support for the war? Yes. But does it help these Republican campaigns? Also yes."

Rumsfeld Says Iraq Goals Not Deadlines (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld waded yesterday into the debate over benchmarks for political progress in Iraq, saying the goals laid out this week in Baghdad by U.S. officials are not firm deadlines as asserted by the Iraqi prime minister.

In a combative press conference at the Pentagon during which he urged reporters to "back off," he noted the intense atmosphere in Washington by saying, "It's a political season, and everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this."

He said his top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George Casey, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, have been in continuing discussions to set markers for accelerating the takeover by Iraqi security forces and reaching peace between ruling Shi'ites and minority Sunnis.

"They then discuss, 'well, when might something happen?'," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "And it isn't a date and it isn't a penalty if it doesn't. I mean, you're trying to add a degree of formality and finality and punishment to something. My goodness."

Last week, Mr. Rumsfeld said Iraq had to assume more security missions "sooner rather than later."

DOJ_NMG_0086935

Mr. Rumsfeld admonished the press for what he says is an attempt to create division between the administration and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, even while the Iraqi himself has rebuked Washington.

"This is complicated stuff," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "No one can predict the future with absolute certainty. So you ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax."

President Bush on Wednesday, and Mr. Rumsfeld yesterday, took pains to explain the benchmark process announced in Baghdad in the face of strident criticism from Mr. al-Maliki.

Earlier this week, Gen. Casey announced a timeline for having Iraqi security forces take control of all 18 provinces in 18 months. They have been put in control of two. Mr. Khalilzad said he wanted a political compact in place within a year that divided up Iraqi oil wealth and brought militias under government control. This would include the Mahdi Army controlled by radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Mr. al-Maliki's

Asked how the United States will deal with Sheik al-Sadr, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "It is something that the sovereign Iraqi government is wrestling with."

When a reporter asserted that "Every time a benchmark has been laid down in terms of security forces and the like the Iraqis have been unable to meet them," Mr. Rumsfeld became testy.

"That is just false," he shot back, before listing missions they had accomplished.

Defense sources have told The Washington Times that Sheik al-Sadr lost control of a large number of militiamen, who formed autonomous death squads that hunt down Sunni civilians around Baghdad.

Mr. Rumsfeld said the press was trying to corner the administration into setting firm deadlines. "And then of course you can point with alarm and say, 'Oh my goodness, you didn't make it.' And you can have a front-page article and everyone will have a good time," he said. "And then the ones that we make earlier than we thought, we'll never see it on the front page."

Real Timetables For Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Funny how a few weeks before the election Bush administration officials start hinting at timetables for getting American troops out of Iraq. But spinning out implausible scenarios — like the claim that it might take only 12 to 18 more months for the Iraqis to be able to defend themselves — won't get Iraq any closer to containing the mayhem, nor this country any closer to extricating itself.

What is needed is an explicit, credible and public set of deadlines — for Iraq's leaders but also for President Bush — to confront the most difficult problems, including disarming sectarian militias, stabilizing Baghdad, protecting minority rights, and apportioning the country's oil wealth.

That's the only way Iraqis and Americans can judge whether progress is being made and whether the effort is worth the cost.

The American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, seemed to be moving down that road this week when he announced that Iraq's leaders had agreed to a timeline for "making the hard decisions" necessary to reduce sectarian bloodletting. The Times's review of the unpublished "notional political timetable" suggests that it is a lot less demanding than advertised.

For example, it gives the Iraqi Parliament until December to outline the terms for demobilizing militias. But it sets no deadline by which Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki — whose government is backed by two religious parties with powerful militias — must disarm the militias. The day after Mr. Khalilzad announced the existence of a timetable, Mr. Maliki held his own news conference denying that he had agreed to anything.

The Iraqis weren't the only ones backpedaling. A day after the top American general in Iraq, George Casey, acknowledged that more troops may be needed to help stabilize Baghdad, his office issued a "clarification" saying that wasn't really what he meant.

And while General Casey suggested that the Iraqis should be able to provide their own security in 12 to 18 months, President Bush let slip that he had a far different timeline in mind. When asked at a news conference whether he would renounce any claim to permanent bases in Iraq, Mr. Bush said that was something for the Iraqi government to decide. He added, "And, frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world is going to look like five or 10 years from now."

This week we described what we believe must be done immediately to lessen the chances of chaos in Iraq after American troops withdraw. The Iraqis need to begin national reconciliation talks and disarm the militias. The Americans need to make a credible push to secure Baghdad and elicit the help of Iraq's neighbors.

There's no time left for notional timetables. Mr. Bush said the other day that "we're making it clear to the Iraqis that America's patience is not unlimited." We hope it's clear to Mr. Bush that Americans have already lost patience with his bumbling conduct of this war, and the remaining grace period can be measured in months, not years. That's a real deadline, for concrete progress, not for more rosy notions of victory.

Maliki And The GI (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

One of the toughest jobs confronting Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is disarming the Shiite militias. The kidnapping Monday in Baghdad of an American soldier by vigilantes claiming to be from the so-called "Mahdi Army" underscores the urgency of the problem, and Mr. Maliki's response has been inadequate at best.

Not only has he criticized American and Iraqi operations in Sadr City aimed at freeing the captive, he also appeared to accept at face value yesterday the Sadrists' denial that they are holding an American. "We asked the Sadr movement to look for him and they swear they know nothing about him," Mr. Maliki told [a news agency] in an interview, adding that Sunni insurgents sometimes pose as Mahdi fighters.

But a well-placed source tells us it's becoming clearer that the American was in fact kidnapped by Shiite vigilantes and may have been moved from Sadr City in Baghdad to an area south of the capital. Mr. Maliki also got the details of the kidnapping wrong -- the soldier (who is of Iraqi descent) was not with his brother, as the Prime Minister told [a news agency] -- suggesting he has not been very engaged on the issue.

Mr. Maliki obviously has concerns about confronting the Sadrists, who hold about 30 seats in parliament and backed his bid for the premiership (as did the Bush Administration). But he also needs to understand that this incident could prove a turning point in his relationship with the American forces who protect his government. Those troops need to see him exerting maximum effort behind the scenes to free their comrade. A public appeal for the American soldier's release is the least Mr. Maliki could do.

On the broader issue of what to do about Mahdi Army violence in general, there's no easy answer. Moqtada al-Sadr could and should have been arrested several years ago when a warrant was issued in connection with the murder of moderate cleric Abdul Majid al-Khoei after the U.S. invasion in spring of 2003. But at this point it may be smarter to go after the worst of the Mahdi troublemakers in smaller operations, as U.S. and Iraqi forces are now doing, and hope that their nominal leader's political influence will wane.

Mr. Maliki also says he is working with Mr. Sadr on a political solution to the problem, and he deserves a chance to try. But if Sadrist forces ask him to choose between them and his obligations to a unified Iraq worthy of U.S. support -- as the Sadrists appear to have done with this kidnapping -- he should know there will be consequences for picking the wrong side.

Mr. Maliki's moves here will affect his relationship with Iraq's Sunni community as well. One key to striking a political compromise across religious communities is convincing Sunnis that Shiite death squads won't be tolerated by the government. If Sunnis see him unwilling to confront the Sadrists on behalf of the Americans to whom he indirectly owes his job, what reason do they have to believe he will act against militia violence on their behalf?

Analysis: Bad Reviews For Iraq Policy (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 27, 2006

'Stay the course' is gone. In its place: 'constant readjustment' of tactics, a timeline to crush Shiite death squads and inducements like unconditional amnesty for Sunni insurgents.

Polls of Iraqis show them eager for American troops to leave. U.S. public opinion surveys find that only about 34 percent of voters support the war effort.

With such broad disaffection and midterm elections coming Nov. 7, the Bush administration has spent the past few weeks in an intense search for a new face to put on the conflict, in which more than 2,800 U.S. troops now have died.

While American voters will make their judgement of the administration effort in less than two weeks, the newly burnished policy already is getting bad reviews in Baghdad. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took issue only a day after it was unveiled, implying portions of it were a challenge the sovereingty of his five-month-old government.

First, he rejected U.S. talk of an ill-defined timeline to curb violence.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it."

Then he said the plan was prompted by American electoral politics:

"I am sure that this is not the official policy of the U.S. government, but it is a results of the election race going on and we are not much concerned with it."

It was not known if al-Maliki raised the objections out of conviction or to mollify his Shiite Muslim political base — or both. Maliki's political position is a delicate balance, one that sometimes frustrates his U.S. backers.

At a Wednesday news conference, President Bush said Iraq's government "must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Even before that veiled warning, al-Maliki felt compelled earlier this month to ask Bush if he were in danger of losing American backing. Bush reported that he reassured the Iraqi leader that he had no plans to pull troops out of Iraq and told him to ignore rumors the United States intended to enforce a deadline for Baghdad to rein in sectarian violence.

But al-Maliki's concern was not unfounded, given remarks by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the start of her Iraq tour at the start of the month.

"The security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it is not one that is being helped by political inaction," Rice said.

Officials close to Al-Maliki, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said he had been told by the Americans that he had until the end of the year to make significant progress in ridding the streets of sectarian death squads or face the quiet withdrawal of U.S. backing.

If true, it would be a tough move for the United States given its stated objective of leaving behind a democratic Iraq. If only rumor, it still reflected the precariousness of the U.S.-Iraqi relationship.

The administration appears to be losing patience in the 44th month of the war partly because of the big jump in U.S. deaths. As of Thursday, 96 service members had been killed in combat this month, the highest toll since October 2005, when the same number of U.S. troops died. Only three months have seen higher death figures since the war began.

As the toll mounted, administration officials and the U.S. military increasingly sought to blame at least a portion of the skyrocketing bloodshed on the political savvy of insurgent forces.

Their argument holds that Sunni fighters had stepped up attacks to kill more Americans in a bid to turn U.S. voters more deeply against the conflict, and thus harm Republican chances and weaken Bush. Further, the reasoning claims, insurgents believed a Democratic-controlled Congress would more quickly force an end to U.S. involvement.

"In regards to this spike in violence ... it's no coincidence that the surge in attacks against coalition forces and the subsequent increase in U.S. casualties coincides with our increased presence on the streets of Baghdad and the run-up to the American midterm elections," U.S. military spokesman Gen. William B. Caldwell said a week ago.

"The enemy knows that killing innocent people and Americans will garner headlines and create a sense of frustration."

Last week, Bush agreed that a New York Times columnist might have been right to compare surging Iraqi violence to the 1968 Tet offensive in Vietnam.

The Viet Cong drive against American and South Vietnamese soldiers was seen as a turning point in U.S. public opinion against that war and responsible for President Lyndon Johnson's decision months later not to seek a second term.

"He could be right," the president said of analogy drawn by Thomas Friedman. "There's certainly a stepped-up level of violence, and we're heading into an election."

But some who closely follow the war find that explanation insufficient, if not a distortion of the facts.

"Iraqis are fighting Iraqis for Iraqi reasons, not to influence elections or force the U.S. out of Iraq," Center for Strategic and International Studies scholar Anthony Cordesman said in a recent paper.

DOJ_NMG_0086938

"This has built up for more than two years, and any reference to a 'Tet offensive' requires both a massive ignorance of the realities in Iraq and an equal ignorance of the realities in Vietnam," he said.

Democrats Are Divided On A Solution For Iraq (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — If the Nov. 7 election in the United States is a referendum on the Iraq war, what are the choices?

President Bush admitted Wednesday that things were not going as well as he had hoped in Iraq and that he was adjusting tactics on the ground to deal with the continuing military and political problems there. He said his overarching goal — victory — remained unchanged, but he gave no sense of what it would take to achieve it.

Democratic leaders and candidates are virtually unanimous in opposing the president's conduct of the war, and most advocate American disengagement — either quickly or slowly. But most are not calling for an immediate withdrawal of American forces or offering a vision of what postwar Iraq should look like. They say they stand for change, but the variety of formulations is dizzying.

Nineteen House members sponsored a bill to cut off funds for the war. The Democratic Senate candidate in Pennsylvania opposes a deadline for ending American involvement in Iraq. The Democratic candidate for Senate in Ohio wants all the troops out within two years. Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the current minority leader who is likely to be the next speaker of the House if Democrats win back the chamber, is calling for immediate steps to begin to remove American forces, with all of them out of Iraq by the end of 2007.

"We haven't coalesced around a single plan," Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat who is up for re-election this year, acknowledged in an interview on Thursday. "But, we're in general agreement on the basic principles."

The range of proposals in part reflects the military, political and sectarian maze that Iraq has become. With virtually no one contending that an exit would be easy, no one wants to be responsible for a decision that would leave Iraq a smoldering ruin of civil war.

But the range of proposals also illustrates the state of the Democratic Party, which has not held executive power for six years or controlled the Congress for twice that long. There is no dominant figure in the party to formulate a policy position, so a hundred schools of thought contend. And even if the Democrats win one or both houses of Congress, they will not have the authority to change the course of the war significantly.

"The republic is being offered a choice between muck and murk," said David R. Gergen, an adviser to Republican and Democratic presidents and now a professor of public policy at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "Neither party is offering a clear path ahead in Iraq."

A number of Democratic policy analysts and elected officials who are not facing re-election this year have drafted quite detailed proposals for untangling the Iraq knot. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat, has proposed a plan to divide Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions — for the Kurds, the Shiites and the Sunnis — with the United States providing a security umbrella for a time.

Senators Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island are urging a plan, endorsed by a majority of Senate Democrats, to begin withdrawing troops within the next few months to impress upon Iraqi leaders that the American presence is not open-ended.

Richard C. Holbrooke, who was the ambassador to the United Nations under President Bill Clinton, this week offered an amalgam of the two plans. His proposal would give each of the three major population groups more autonomy and would provide for the beginning of a phased withdrawal with no firm timetable for completion.

But most Democrats standing for election are not as detailed or categorical. If the election has become a referendum on Iraq, it is one without a definitive choice. With less than two weeks to Election Day, both Republicans and Democrats appear to be fudging their positions to avoid alienating voters. Polls indicate that the public, hungry for a change, prefers the Democratic approach, unspecific as it is, to a continuation of the Bush policies.

Republicans regularly express frustration at what they see as the Democrats' ability to get away with criticizing the conduct of the war without being pressed to offer their own solution.

"To the degree that they're trying to be none of the above, they find it useful," said Stuart Stevens, a Republican strategist who worked on Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign and represents several candidates this year. "But they're offering more of a weather report than a foreign policy position."

Democratic leaders in Congress say that voters are not demanding that candidates present a coherent plan to end the war. It is beyond the power of Congress to conduct military operations or order troop withdrawals in any case. But, they say, voters are flocking to the party because it offers an alternative to what Democrats call the failed Bush administration policy.

"The public understands also we're not the commander in chief," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who heads the party's senatorial campaign committee. "If we were to get the majority, we could do a lot more to get George Bush to change direction."

Mr. Holbrooke said that it was the administration, not the Democrats, that was in disarray on Iraq. The Democrats, he said, are united in their desire for disengagement. Disputes over when and where the troops would go are merely technical, he said.

"The Democrats stand for disengagement and de-escalation," Mr. Holbrooke said. "It's the Republicans who are all over the lot."

Yet in debates and interviews, Democratic candidates for Congress offer a wide range of formulations within the broad rubric of opposition to the war. Bob Casey Jr., the Democrat who is challenging Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, for his Senate seat, said he would have voted to authorize the war in 2002 if he had been in the Senate, although he said he now believes the intelligence on which senators voted was faulty.

Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat who is trying to unseat Republican Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, said he wants the military to come up with a plan to provide for an "orderly and safe" withdrawal of American troops within the next two years. "It's a practical plan, and I think the public agrees with it overwhelmingly," Mr. Brown said in an interview Thursday.

Representative James P. McGovern, Democrat of Massachusetts, sponsored the bill last year to cut off funding for the Iraq war. Eighteen other House Democrats co-sponsored the measure.

The Democrats have a plethora of proposals to extricate the United States from Iraq but no unified approach, said Marshall Wittman of the Progressive Policy Institute, a centrist Democratic research organization. "The overriding dynamic in this election is the war," he said. "The paradox is that once they take control of Congress, there is little they can do. That's the great irony of this election."

Staying The Course Right Over A Cliff (NYT)

By George Lakoff

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

THE Bush administration has finally been caught in its own language trap.

"That is not a stay-the-course policy," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, declared on Monday.

The first rule of using negatives is that negating a frame activates the frame. If you tell someone not to think of an elephant, he'll think of an elephant. When Richard Nixon said, "I am not a crook" during Watergate, the nation thought of him as a crook.

"Listen, we've never been stay the course, George," President Bush told George Stephanopoulos of ABC News a day earlier. Saying that just reminds us of all the times he said "stay the course."

What the president is discovering is that it's not so easy to rewrite linguistic history. The laws of language are hard to defy.

"The characterization of, you know, 'it's stay the course' is about a quarter right," the president said at an Oct. 11 news conference. " 'Stay the course' means keep doing what you're doing. My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. 'Stay the course' also means don't leave before the job is done."

A week or so later, he tried another shift: "We have been — we will complete the mission, we will do our job and help achieve the goal, but we're constantly adjusting the tactics. Constantly."

To fully understand why the president's change in linguistic strategy won't work, it's helpful to consider why "stay the course" possesses such power. The answer lies in metaphorical thought.

Metaphors are more than language; they can govern thought and behavior. A recent University of Toronto study, for example, demonstrated the power of metaphors that connect morality and purity: People who washed their hands after contemplating an unethical act were less troubled by their thoughts than those who didn't, the researchers found.

"Stay the course" is a particularly powerful metaphor because it can activate so many of our emotions. Because physical actions require movement, we commonly understand action as motion. Because achieving goals so often requires going to a particular place — to the refrigerator to get a cold beer, say — we think of goals as reaching destinations.

Another widespread — and powerful — metaphor is that moral action involves staying on a prescribed path, and straying from the path is immoral. In modern conservative discourse, "character" is seen through the metaphor of moral strength, being unbending in the face of immoral forces. "Backbone," we call it.

In the context of a metaphorical war against evil, "stay the course" evoked all these emotion-laden metaphors. The phrase enabled the president to act the way he'd been acting — and to demonstrate that it was his strong character that enabled him to stay on the moral path.

To not stay the course evokes the same metaphors, but says you are not steadfast, not morally strong. In addition, it means not getting to your destination — that is, not achieving your original purpose. In other words, you are lacking in character and strength; you are unable to "complete the mission" and "achieve the goal."

"Stay the course" was for years a trap for those who disagreed with the president's policies in Iraq. To disagree was weak and immoral. It meant abandoning the fight against evil. But now the president himself is caught in that trap. To keep staying the course, given obvious reality, is to get deeper into disaster in Iraq, while not staying the course is to abandon one's moral authority as a conservative. Either way, the president loses.

And if the president loses, does that mean the Democrats will win? Perhaps. But if they do, it will be because of Republican missteps and not because they've acted with strategic brilliance. Their "new direction" slogan offers no values and no positive vision. It is taken from a standard poll question, "Do you like the direction the nation is headed in?"

This is a shame. The Democrats are giving up a golden opportunity to accurately frame their values and deepest principles (even on national security), to forge a public identity that fits those values — and perhaps to win more close races by being positive and having a vision worth voting for.

Right now, though, no language articulating a Democratic vision seems in the offing. If the Democrats don't find a more assertive strategy, their gains will be short-lived. They, too, will learn the pitfalls of staying the course.

The Arithmetic Of Failure (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Iraq is a lost cause. It's just a matter of arithmetic: given the violence of the environment, with ethnic groups and rival militias at each other's throats, American forces there are large enough to suffer terrible losses, but far too small to stabilize the country.

We're so undermanned that we're even losing our ability to influence events: earlier this week, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki brusquely rejected American efforts to set a timetable for reining in the militias.

Afghanistan, on the other hand, is a war we haven't yet lost, and it's just possible that a new commitment of forces there might turn things around.

The moral is clear — we need to get out of Iraq, not because we want to cut and run, but because our continuing presence is doing nothing but wasting American lives. And if we do free up our forces (and those of our British allies), we might still be able to save Afghanistan.

The classic analysis of the arithmetic of insurgencies is a 1995 article by James T. Quinlivan, an analyst at the Rand Corporation. "Force Requirements in Stability Operations," published in Parameters, the journal of the U.S. Army War College, looked at the number of troops that peacekeeping forces have historically needed to maintain order and cope with insurgencies. Mr. Quinlivan's comparisons suggested that even small countries might need large occupying forces.

Specifically, in some cases it was possible to stabilize countries with between 4 and 10 troops per 1,000 inhabitants. But examples like the British campaign against communist guerrillas in Malaya and the fight against the Irish Republican Army in Northern Ireland indicated that establishing order and stability in a difficult environment could require about 20 troops per 1,000 inhabitants.

The implication was clear: "Many countries are simply too big to be plausible candidates for stabilization by external forces," Mr. Quinlivan wrote.

Maybe, just maybe, the invasion and occupation of Iraq could have been managed in such a way that a force the United States was actually capable of sending would have been enough to maintain order and stability. But that didn't happen, and at this point Iraq is a cauldron of violence, far worse than Malaya or Ulster ever was. And that means that stabilizing Iraq would require a force of at least 20 troops per 1,000 Iraqis — that is, 500,000 soldiers and marines.

We don't have that kind of force. The combined strength of the U.S. Army and Marine Corps is less than 700,000 — and the combination of America's other commitments plus the need to rotate units home for retraining means that only a fraction of those forces can be deployed for stability operations at any given time. Even maintaining the forces we now have deployed in Iraq, which are less than a third as large as the Quinlivan analysis suggests is necessary, is slowly breaking the Army.

Meanwhile, what about Afghanistan?

Given the way the Bush administration relegated Afghanistan to sideshow status, it comes as something of a shock to realize that Afghanistan has a larger population than Iraq. If Afghanistan were in as bad shape as Iraq, stabilizing it would require at least 600,000 troops — an obvious impossibility.

However, things in Afghanistan aren't yet as far gone as they are in Iraq, and it's possible that a smaller force — one in that range of 4 to 10 per 1,000 that has been sufficient in some cases — might be enough to stabilize the situation. But right now, the forces trying to stabilize Afghanistan are absurdly small: we're trying to provide security to 30 million people with a force of only 32,000 Western troops and 77,000 Afghan national forces.

If we stopped trying to do the impossible in Iraq, both we and the British would be able to put more troops in a place where they might still do some good. But we have to do something soon: the commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan says that most of the population will switch its allegiance to a resurgent Taliban unless things get better by this time next year.

It's hard to believe that the world's only superpower is on the verge of losing not just one but two wars. But the arithmetic of stability operations suggests that unless we give up our futile efforts in Iraq, we're on track to do just that.

U.S. Deaths In Iraq Near Peak Months (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 26 -- Unrelenting daily attacks in Baghdad and the western province of Anbar have made October the deadliest month of the Iraq war for U.S. troops in combat since the all-out American offensives on Fallujah in April and November of 2004, according to U.S. military figures. The military on Thursday reported five more American troops killed, raising the toll for U.S. deaths in hostile action so far this month to 92.

The latest reported deaths -- those of four Marines and a sailor -- occurred Wednesday in Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold. The increasing death toll in Anbar comes after months in which U.S. and Iraqi commanders had said that sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites was their prime concern and that Baghdad was the focus of their efforts.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, attributed the resurgence in American deaths in the western province to "very conscious and deliberate operations" in Ramadi, Anbar's capital.

"It's an aggressive, offensive approach to taking back the city of Ramadi, to return it back to Iraqi security forces," Caldwell said on Thursday.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni Arab insurgent groups in the heart of Ramadi on a daily basis since early this year, and Caldwell's words -- "taking back" -- reflected the degree to which guerrillas have asserted control over the city.

The insurgent groups include both foreign-led organizations such as al-Qaeda in Iraq and Iraqi resistance groups. U.S. officers said this past summer that they could claim sure control only over a few blocks immediately around Ramadi's town hall, as well as forward operating bases and other American outposts in the lawless city. U.S. troops, especially since summer, have moved more aggressively out into the city, pushing back against insurgents but also putting themselves at greater risk.

It was not clear whether Wednesday's killings were all in Ramadi, and the military gave no details about how they occurred. Local leaders in Ramadi reported that a series of planted bombs and suicide car bombs had targeted American forces around Anbar on Wednesday.

In 2004, thousands of American troops were involved in two concentrated offensives against Sunni Arab insurgents in Fallujah, and the toll in April of that year also included deaths in heavy fighting against forces of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in southern Iraq. The number of Americans killed in action that month was 126; in November 2004, 125.

In contrast, American deaths this month have come singly or in twos, threes or fours, mostly from roadside bombs and small-arms fire targeting patrols, checkpoints and other day-to-day operations.

Sources within the two militaries, as well as Iraqi militiamen and foreign fighters, cite many of the same reasons for the current increase in violence in Anbar.

After American warplanes killed al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, his successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, called on followers to concentrate attacks on U.S. troops and Shiite militiamen, soldiers and police. In September, Masri urged every insurgent in Iraq to kill at least one American within 15 days.

The Egyptian-born Masri wanted redoubled attacks "to have a great effect on the American elections," said Abu Islam al-Arabi, a local al-Qaeda leader reached by telephone Thursday in Anbar province.

Arabi, an Iraqi, suggested other reasons for the surge in attacks: the desire of guerrillas to have their deaths come in the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, when some Muslims believe martyrdom will earn them special grace in paradise, and what he said was a new influx of foreign fighters, who he said had already made possible dozens of suicide attacks during Ramadan alone.

Except for that last reason, American officers have given all the same possible causes.

Of Iraq's 18 provinces, Anbar is by far the deadliest for U.S. troops: About 1,022 service members have been killed there since the war began, compared with 733 in Baghdad and 281 in Salahuddin province north of the capital, according to the Web site iCasualties.org.

So far in October, not including the most recent American deaths, 35 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar, 42 in Baghdad and seven in Salahuddin, accounting for 88 percent of the U.S. fatalities, according to the Web site.

In all, 96 American troops have died of all causes -- including accidents and attacks -- since October began. The count is the highest overall toll in a year.

American deaths in the war are dwarfed by those of Iraqi civilians and troops, however.

During the recently concluded month of Ramadan, attacks killed about 300 Iraqi police officers, soldiers and other security forces, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. commander in Iraq, said this week.

Civilians have died in even larger numbers. Violence killed more than 2,660 last month in Baghdad alone, reflecting a toll that has more than doubled since late spring. Before the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, the number of victims of violent death received by the city morgue averaged 10 a month.

On Thursday, gun battles in the northern town of Baqubah killed at least five policemen and six civilians. Baqubah is home to many Sunni insurgents, but Shiite militiamen also are reported to have flooded into the area lately, and it was not clear who was responsible for Thursday's fighting.

It appeared, however, that the gunmen might have been attempting to win the release of jailed comrades. Maj. Gen. Shakha Hyllil al-Kabi, an Iraqi army commander, said authorities in Baqubah released 53 detainees, keeping only 10 behind. "This is an answer for all the terrorists: We only keep those involved" in crimes, said Kabi, who said authorities also returned some confiscated cars.

Month's Toll Most For U.S. In A Year (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086943

BAGHDAD -- The number of American troops killed in Iraq in October reached the highest monthly total in a year yesterday after four Marines and a sailor died of wounds suffered while fighting in the same Sunni insurgent stronghold.

The U.S. military said 96 American troops have died in October, the most in one month since October 2005, when the same number were killed.

In other violence, 12 police officers were killed in fighting with suspected militia gunmen in Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad, officials said. Eighteen militants also were killed, police said.

The deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq was November 2004, when military offenses primarily in the then-insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, left 137 troops dead, 126 of them in combat. In January 2005, 107 U.S. troops were killed.

The U.S. military said the five service members killed in the volatile Anbar province included a sailor assigned to the 3rd Naval Construction Regiment. Two of the Marines were attached to Regimental Combat Team 5, and two to Regimental Combat Team 7. All died from wounds suffered in attacks Wednesday.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman, said there had been a marked decrease in violence in Baghdad since the end of Ramadan, the Muslim month of fasting, earlier this week.

Gen. Caldwell said violence has tended to spike during that month, then fall off. He also said increased U.S. patrols and roadblocks in the search for a missing American soldier could be having an effect.

Fighting continued yesterday with clashes between Iraqi security forces and militia groups linked to major Shi'ite political parties, part of an ominous trend adding to the violence wrought by the Sunni-led insurgency against U.S. coalition forces and their Iraqi allies.

At least 12 policemen were killed in fighting near Baqouba with gunmen of the Mahdi Army militia, who are loyal to fiery anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Mahdi militiamen have flooded into the area 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, forcing large numbers of residents belonging to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority to flee their homes. Mahdi fighters killed scores of Sunnis in massacres last week in the nearby city of Balad, forcing U.S. troops to return to the area after Iraqi security forces were unable to stem the bloodshed.

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said that about 300 Iraqi police and soldiers died during Ramadan, and more than 961 Iraqis altogether have been killed in war-related violence this month, the highest level since the Associated Press began tracking civilian deaths in April 2005.

That amounts to an average of almost 40 every day, compared with a daily average of about 27 since April 2005, as more Iraqis fall prey to sectarian death squads affiliated with the militias.

Army To Spread Burden Of Combat (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The prospect of combat in Iraq for at least another four years is prompting the Army to realign its forces to prevent a small slice of soldiers who are shouldering much of the fighting from wearing out.

Pentagon records show one-fifth of the Army's active-duty troops have served multiple tours of war duty while more than 40% haven't been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan.

That disparity is behind the Army's plans to shift some soldiers to high-demand wartime specialties that could ease the burden on combat forces.

The Army announced this month that it plans to maintain its current force level in Iraq through 2010. There are about 105,000 soldiers in Iraq, 15,000 in Kuwait and 16,000 in Afghanistan.

The Army is moving soldiers from specialties such as artillery and air defense to high-demand roles: infantry, engineering, military police and intelligence, Special Forces, civil affairs and psychological operations, said Lt. Gen. Michael Rochelle, deputy chief of staff for Army personnel.

The Army has more soldiers deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan than the other services combined. It expects to complete the realignment by 2011.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged this week that the Pentagon is sending active-duty troops overseas more frequently than it wants to, which is once in three years.

About 42% of the Army's 500,000 active-duty soldiers have not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. They include about 80,000 fresh recruits, most of whom are being trained. More than 90,000 others are in the so-called institutional Army, those who train, equip and manage soldiers.

By 2011, there will be 50,000 more troops available for deployment than in 2001. Part of that will be accomplished by having civilian Army employees take over certain jobs from soldiers, freeing them up to fight.

Five years of fighting have put the Army on the verge of wearing out vital soldiers, said James Carafano, a retired Army colonel and military analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

The Army is still structured to fight Cold War enemies, which prevents it from deploying more troops, he said. "It's not a usable force in terms of mix and composition."

The Army has sent more than 144,000 active-duty, National Guard and Reserve soldiers to Iraq or Afghanistan more than once. Army deployments typically last one year. Some soldiers, including special operations forces, have shorter tours.

Fort Bragg in North Carolina, where many Special Forces soldiers are based, is home to the Army's most-deployed soldier. That soldier, whom the Army declined to identify, has been sent to Iraq or Afghanistan nine times.

That's a "pocket of stress that we need to be concerned about," said retired Army colonel James Martin, an expert on military culture who teaches at Bryn Mawr College in Pennsylvania.

42 Iraqis Die As Insurgents Attack Police Near Baquba (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Kirk Semple

BAQUBA, Iraq, Oct. 26 — Police officers acting on a tip about several kidnapped colleagues rode into deadly insurgent ambushes near here on Thursday, resulting in two intense battles that left at least 42 people dead, including 24 police officers, officials said.

Five American service members were killed Wednesday in Anbar Province, the military command reported Thursday, raising the American death toll in October to at least 96, one of the worst monthly tolls of the war.

The insurgent ambushes came as dozens of police officers converged on an area between Baquba and Baghdad, near a town called Khan Bani Saad. Word had come down late on Wednesday from the Interior Ministry that several Iraqi policemen who had been kidnapped days earlier near Baquba, the capital of Diyala Province, were being held south of there, and province officials ordered a raid. But as the police officers rode out, what they found was a large and well-armed Sunni insurgent force. A spokesman for the joint Iraqi-American command center in Baquba described the clashes as "very violent, brutal and heavy."

Among the dead were 24 police officers, including the police chief of Khan Bani Saad, Col. Abbas al-Amari, according to a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, which oversees the nation's police force. At least seven police officers were wounded, officials said.

According to American military officials in Baquba, 18 insurgents were killed, eight were wounded and 27 were captured.

One fight apparently ended when 18 policemen, each armed with only one or two clips of bullets, ran out of ammunition two miles north of Khan Bani Saad, officials said. Many appeared to have been executed near a canal, shot in the back of the head.

The Americans said the ambush might have been coordinated with the help of an insurgent agent working inside the government's security forces. Col. Brian D. Jones, the senior American commander in the province, called the attack a "setup."

"It was a baited ambush," he said.

Colonel Jones said that the loss of the police chief, Colonel Abbas, was a severe blow. After police officers in Khan Bani Saad walked off the job last month amid worsening violence, American officers envisioned a new, mixed force of 100 Shiite and 100 Sunni police officers under the command of Colonel Abbas, confident that he could produce a stable unit.

American commanders moved additional forces into the area three months ago in anticipation that large-scale military sweeps through Baghdad would inflame the area, whose population is about 60 percent Shiite and 40 percent Sunni.

But the situation became more tense last month, when the Fifth Division of the Iraqi Army staged raids in Baquba that led to the arrest of 400 people, nearly all Sunni Arabs. That deeply angered Sunni leaders, who felt it showed the Shiite-dominated army division had singled out Sunnis while ignoring Shiite criminals.

As local Sunni and Shiite groups have put out calls for help, fighters from the Shiite Jaish al-Mahdi militia have moved north to Khan Bani Saad from Baghdad, said Lt. Col. Thomas Fisher, the commander of the 1-68 Combined Arms Battalion in Baquba. At the same time, fighters from Sunni groups and Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have moved in from the west and north.

Colonel Jones said that it appeared the insurgents in the ambushes on Thursday had advance knowledge of the raid and appeared to have moved in skilled fighters. "These guys were good and committed, not your local-yokel resistance," he said.

Though much of the recent political attention in Baghdad and Washington has focused on Shiite militias and their participation in the cycles of retributive sectarian violence, the Sunni Arab-led insurgency remains formidable. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has been under intense American pressure to disarm the militias, said this week that the main engine of sectarian violence was the largely Sunni insurgency.

The insurgents remain particularly fierce in Anbar Province, the desert region covering much of western Iraq where the American military has taken a large share of its casualties in the past few years.

Officials did not disclose the circumstances of the American deaths that were announced Thursday — four marines and one sailor — except to say they occurred Wednesday as a result of wounds sustained during fighting in Ramadi, a city about 55 miles west of the capital, where American forces have been conducting a four-month, block-by-block offensive intended to wrest control of the streets from the resistance.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the senior military spokesman in Baghdad, said at a briefing on Thursday that American troops in Ramadi were making progress. "They are, in fact, moving forward," he said.

Top American officials in Washington and Baghdad have projected an image of resolve and cooperation with their Iraqi counterparts this week in the face of the relentless violence and eroding public support for the war. President Bush and his two top officials in Iraq, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said in briefings that the Iraqi government had agreed to a timetable for security measures.

But in comments on Wednesday in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki suggested that his handling of Iraq's internal affairs would not be dictated by the American government.

In a news conference in Washington on Thursday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld accused critics of the administration of magnifying the differences between Washington and Baghdad over plans for Iraqis to take a bigger role in security.

"It's a political season, and everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this, and turn it into a political football," Mr. Rumsfeld said. He added that the idea of setting benchmarks for Iraqi progress was "a process, not an event."

In his news conference in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki also cited an American-backed raid early Wednesday that focused on the suspected leader of a Shiite death squad, saying that the Iraqi government was taken by surprise by the operation.

General Caldwell said Thursday that the raid was led by Iraqi forces and concerned a suspect whom the Iraqi authorities had given prior approval to capture. "Notification was made to the government of Iraq," he said, "but it's apparent that it didn't make it to the prime minister."

The general said the American command was reviewing its notification procedures "to understand why the prime minister, as he states, had not been personally notified."

No Easy Answer To 'Kurdish Question' (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

Driving north through these folded, wheat-colored mountains, it is easy to forget you are in Iraq.

Miles to the south, the Iraqi flags disappeared, replaced by the flags of Kurdistan, a state that does not officially exist. Here in the northern mountains, though, even the symbols of the Iraqi Kurdish authority are nowhere to be seen.

DOJ_NMG_0086946

Most of the flags here are those of the Kurdistan Workers Party — the PKK, listed by the U.S. and the European Union as a terrorist organization responsible for the loss of thousands of lives in a separatist campaign across the border in Turkey. Deep in the mountains, all the road checkpoints are operated by PKK guerrillas. A giant portrait of imprisoned guerrilla leader Abdullah Ocalan stretches across a rocky slope.

The fact that much of Iraq's rugged northern borderlands with Turkey and Iran are under the day-to-day control of a militant organization might come as a surprise to those who thought U.S. forces had handed over authority nationwide to a new Iraqi government.

The PKK's guerrilla camps, ordered closed by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki last month, still dot some of the steep valleys and ravines near the group's makeshift headquarters here; at least half the offices of its political affiliate, the Kurdistan Democratic Solution Party, also remain open.

The efforts to rein in the PKK are a new and strategically important front in the Bush administration's campaign to create a new Middle East, and one of the most complicated political problems U.S. forces face in Iraq. Kurdish leaders, for instance, have battled the PKK over the years in various intramural squabbles, but have been reluctant to clamp down on the group because of its deep popularity among the Kurdish public and out of sympathy for Kurds in Turkey.

Founded three decades ago as a violent Marxist resistance movement battling for independence of Kurds in Turkey, the PKK embarked on a concerted paramilitary campaign in 1984. It since has mellowed its politics but continues to field a force of as many as 6,000 guerrillas along the Iraqi-Turkish border, with about 1,000 of them well within Iraq, government officials estimate.

Within Turkey, violence connected with Kurdish separatists has escalated this year. In August, a group calling itself the Kurdistan Freedom Falcons claimed responsibility for several bomb attacks aimed at tourists that killed three people and injured dozens in Turkish coastal resorts. The group is widely believed to be an urban guerrilla offshoot of the PKK. The PKK has concentrated on attacking Turkish soldiers, using bases in northern Iraq as sanctuaries, according to the Turkish government.

In northern Iraq, the PKK militants get training in Shakespeare and Goethe, in the military tactics of the Thirty Years' War and how to operate a Russian-made BKC machine gun and a rocket-propelled-grenade launcher.

"We are here for one reason, and that is to obtain the objective of the freedom of our people of Kurdistan," said a doe-eyed young guerrilla who gave her name only as Ozgur and said she joined the movement when she was 13.

America's Kurdish dilemma stems from the fact that more than 20 million Kurds live straddled across the strategic borders of Iraq, Iran, Turkey and Syria.

Iraq's roughly 4 million Kurds are arguably the United States' strongest allies in the war-torn nation, and U.S. forces would almost surely face a political backlash in Baghdad if they took military action against guerrilla fighters many Kurds see as heroes.

Yet the Kurdish guerrilla force here is battling one of America's bedrock allies in the region — Turkey, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and a stable, secular Muslim state in a region trending in other directions. The continuing failure to end PKK violence coming out of Iraq has driven Turkey toward a stronger security arrangement with Iran, which also faces militant Kurds along the Iraqi border, a relationship that can't help but be worrying for Washington.

"How important is the PKK as an issue? Let me tell you that it's important enough that the president of the United States decided that we needed a special envoy to counter the PKK and to try to get all of our efforts in the United States focused in the right direction, along with those of Turkey and Iraq," retired Gen. Joseph W. Ralston, recently appointed the U.S. special envoy to counter the PKK, said after a visit to the region late last month.

"We all believe that the use of force is the last resort, not the first resort," he said. "But having said that, that does not mean that we will not take military action. Quite the contrary: All options are on the table."

The continuing polarization of Iraq and the mounting sectarian violence there have only exacerbated worries among its neighbors about reverberations within the substantial Kurdish minorities in Turkey, Iran and Syria.

Iraqi Kurdistan has moved steadily to distance itself from the violent skirmishing between Sunni and Shiite Arabs to the south; regional President Massoud Barzani's recent order to pull down the Iraqi flag on public buildings and replace it with the Kurdish flag is only one in a long line of moves to establish a truly autonomous Kurdish republic. Here in the north, there are Kurdish schools, Kurdish broadcast channels, Kurdish cellphone companies and a full-fledged Kurdish regional government.

Militant groups such as the PKK are demanding an end to repression of Kurds elsewhere, recognition of their national status and language and eventually some degree of political autonomy — measures that government leaders fear will open the door to demands for a Kurdish state, discarding the borders of four nations, a recipe for regional war.

That is why solving "the Kurdish question" has become a top priority for the U.S., and why tackling the PKK, its most militant face, has become step No. 1.

After Ralston's visit to the region, Iraqi leaders persuaded the PKK to declare a unilateral cease-fire, an end to the regular cross-border attacks that are claiming the lives of Turkish soldiers on a regular basis.

The PKK agreed, its leaders hoping the expression of goodwill could open the door to significant movement on Turkey's part, starting with an end to what it sees as human rights abuses, recognition of the Kurdish language and possibly amnesty for some PKK fighters who have not been involved in violence.

"I would like to say that the cease-fire has not been announced because of pressure at all," Cemil Bayak, a longtime leader of the group's most militant wing and a member of its ruling council, said in an interview over a lunch of grilled chicken and steaming vegetable stew at his mountain redoubt.

"The most important reason is that we want the Kurdish question to be solved peacefully, politically and by means of dialogue. This is what we want," said Bayak, who believed Turkey's bid to join the European Union would provide the impetus for human rights improvements needed to alleviate repression of the nation's Kurds. "We want violence to be put aside, and a new era to be opened on the issue."

But although the PKK has pledged to end its attacks on Turkish military targets, it is unclear whether the cease-fire will be embraced by other Kurdish militants, including the Falcons.

Turkish officials say the PKK is a terrorist organization that finances its activities through an international network of drug smuggling and human trafficking that reaches to Europe. Turkey is demanding the use of military force to disarm the PKK, but Iraq so far has refused, said Kosrat Rasoul Ali, vice president of the Kurdish regional government and a well-known former Kurdish peshmerga fighter.

"They want us to attack the PKK, they want us to crack down on the PKK," Ali said. "But it cannot be done. In the past we tried, but it was without result.

"We think that this problem cannot be solved with force," he said. "Because they are Kurds. It's very difficult for us Kurds to kill Kurds. In fact, it is impossible."

Ralston has refused to meet with PKK leaders, declaring, "We do not meet with terrorist groups." But Ali said Kurdish leaders hoped to broker a solution in which the PKK would disarm in exchange for guarantees on behalf of Kurds in Turkey.

"PKK is ready to hand over their weapons to the Americans, in return for several political steps by Turkey," Ali said. "Like a general amnesty to be published, to recognize Kurdish existence as a people in Turkey."

At the same time, some Iraqi officials believe Turkey and possibly Iran are behind some of the escalating violence in northern Iraq, especially in the city of Kirkuk, an oil center that Kurds hope to include within their federated republic, whose inclusion could form the basis for a powerful future Kurdistan economy.

In a pointed warning, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said last month that Iraq was prepared to support opposition groups within neighboring nations whose governments it saw as instigating violence in Iraq.

Recognizing that America's prime aim is to discourage the growing closeness of Turkey and Iran at a time when the U.S. is seeking to isolate Tehran, PKK leaders are arguing that solving the Kurdish question — the main issue that Turkey and Iran have in common — is the best way to accomplish that goal.

"If you cannot solve the Kurdish problem in Turkey, you cannot separate Turkey from Syria and Iran," Bayak said. "And so without putting Turkey and the Kurds together, you cannot have the fundamental basis for this project of a new Middle East."

Marine On Trial Tells Of Killing Unarmed Iraqi (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086948

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct 26 — A 20-year-old marine testified on Thursday at his court-martial here that he participated in killing an unarmed Iraqi and knew that the plan for the killing was an illegal act of war.

The marine, Pfc. John Jodka III, who has agreed to cooperate with government prosecutors, pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in exchange for his testimony against members of his squad.

Private Jodka is the youngest and lowest ranked of the eight men charged in the killing of the Iraqi, Hashim Ibrahim Awad, who died of multiple gunshot wounds on April 26 near Hamdaniya, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

In a half-day of testimony, Private Jodka explained how his squad of seven marines and a Navy medic had come up with a plan that the men fully knew sidestepped the rules of engagement.

"I agreed to the plan," he told the military judge, "and I agreed to go forward without objection."

The plan, the marine said, involved kidnapping and killing an insurgent named Saleh Gowad, whom military intelligence officers had identified as a "high-value individual." The plan was to shoot him in a setting that made it look as if Mr. Gowad had been surprised while digging a hole to plant a bomb.

"If anyone asked," Private Jodka said, "we would say that we had seen this man approach with a shovel and begin digging and that he engaged us and that we had lawfully engaged him."

But the squad members ended up kidnapping and killing the wrong man.

Private Jodka, who is to be sentenced on Nov. 15, told the judge that he understood that the killing would bring shame to the Marine Corps.

"Anything reported becomes ammunition," he said. "Anything like this would present an argument against the war."

Private Jodka is the second person to accept a deal in the case. The medic, Hospital Corpsman Third Class Melson J. Bacos, who was court-martialed on Oct. 6, will spend less than a year in prison in exchange for his testimony.

Karzai Orders Investigation Into Bombing By NATO (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 26 — President Hamid Karzai issued a presidential decree on Thursday directing a team of tribal elders and Afghan officials to investigate a NATO bombing Tuesday night in southern Afghanistan that local officials said killed dozens of civilians.

Khalid Pashtoon, an Afghan member of Parliament from the area of the attack, said villagers told him that more than 50 civilians died during the NATO airstrike in the Panjwai district of Kandahar Province. A spokesman for the country's Interior Ministry said that 40 civilians were killed.

If even the lower number proves correct, Tuesday's attack would be the largest civilian death toll in an airstrike since the American-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001.

Mr. Karzai also said in a statement about the attack that it would be discussed on Monday at a meeting of the Policy Action Group, where he and his ministers meet with NATO military commanders and foreign diplomats.

"The meeting will discuss ways to prevent civilian casualties during antiterrorist operations and to ensure better coordination between government and NATO forces," the statement said.

For the last month, NATO has spoken optimistically about the removal of suspected Taliban fighters from the area, hailing it as a decisive victory against resurgent Taliban forces, who have carried out their highest number of attacks in Afghanistan since 2001.

Mr. Pashtoon, the member of Parliament, said villagers told him that hundreds of Taliban militants had recently re-infiltrated the area after being ousted from Panjwai by NATO troops in September.

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, said the military alliance had aimed its attacks at Taliban fighters trying to re-enter the heavily populated area and blamed the insurgents for endangering civilians. He said NATO forces did not know the number of civilian casualties and would cooperate fully with the investigation.

"Re-infiltration is not a surprise because Panjwai is very important for the Taliban," he said, referring to the area's strategic value as a staging area for attacks on nearby Kandahar, southern Afghanistan's largest city. "We are having a lot of success, but it's a very big, very tough and continuing challenge."

Mr. Pashtoon said that NATO should not have carried out an airstrike during the Id al-Fitr holiday at the end of the holy month of Ramadan. He also said NATO did not have enough troops deployed in the area.

"They should have done a proper operation with troops on the ground," he said.

Afghan Officials Say Dozens Of Civilians Died In NATO Military Strike (WP/AP)

By Allauddin Khan

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

LAY KUNDI, Afghanistan, Oct. 26 -- Dozens of civilians were killed in a NATO military strike against suspected Taliban insurgents, Afghan officials said Thursday. Villagers fled the southern region by car and donkey, and hundreds attended a funeral for about 20 people buried in a mass grave.

The civilian death toll, estimated by Afghan officials at between 30 and 85, including many women and children, is among the highest in foreign military action here since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

NATO said a preliminary review found that 12 civilians were killed in the clashes Tuesday in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province. But the alliance could not say if they had died because of Taliban or NATO action.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said as many as 70 insurgents may have been killed in three clashes. The fighting took place in or around the villages of Lay Kundi and Mirwisa Mina. According to Knittig, Taliban fighters attacked NATO forces, drawing return artillery fire and airstrikes aimed at them.

Bismallah Afghanmal, a provincial council member, said fighters fled into civilian houses, which were then targeted by NATO forces.

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, said: "With insurgents who regard the population as a form of human shield for themselves, it obviously makes life very difficult for us, but it does not stop us from making every effort to ensure that we minimize any problems."

But villagers and local government officials denounced NATO and blamed the government for a lack of security. "The people are not forgetting the deaths of their children after a simple 'sorry,' " Afghanmal said.

"Everyone is very angry at the government and the coalition. There was no Taliban," Abdul Aye, who lives in Mirwisa Mina, said through tears at the mass funeral in Kandahar city. He said 22 members of his family were killed. "These tragedies just keep continuing."

Death tolls in remote military action in Afghanistan are difficult to determine, and estimates often vary widely. Also in question is who can be considered a civilian and who is a fighter.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly condemned civilian deaths caused by Western forces. A week ago, after nine villagers were killed during another NATO operation in Kandahar province, he urged the alliance to use "maximum caution" to avoid civilian casualties.

Tuesday's violence in Panjwayi came a month after NATO launched a major offensive in the district. The alliance said more than 500 insurgents were killed in the earlier operation, which the top NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, called a "significant success."

Richards last month said reconstruction and development efforts, which many officers see as critical for winning over Afghans after the military action, would soon begin in the region. But since then, heavy fighting has broken out.

Nato Denies Afghanistan Push In Disarray (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 27, 2006

Nato on Thursday sought to dismiss fears that its operation in Afghanistan was in disarray after a series of bloody and controversial incidents that have seen the alliance come under new pressure in the country's south.

DOJ_NMG_0086950

Nato forces have been accused this week of killing dozens of civilians in an airstrike and have clashed with the Taliban in an area the alliance declared free of insurgents last month.

In a separate development, Ronald Neumann, US ambassador to Afghanistan, criticised a ceasefire deal reached by UK Nato troops and local groups in a town in Afghanistan's turbulent Helmand province.

Nato said its show of force in recent months had put the Taliban on the defensive. Many western officials – such as Sir Richard Dannatt, head of the British army – argue that Nato troops are much better placed to contain the fighting in Afghanistan than equivalent forces in Iraq.

"We have demonstrated that we are strong enough on the combat side to be the winners," Mark Laity, Nato spokesman in Afghanistan, said on Thursday. "After 30 years of fighting, people in the south are nervous of being on the wrong side."

But on Thursday Afghan officials said a Nato airstrike on Tuesday had killed more than 60 civilians after Taliban guerrillas attacked western military bases.

Niaz Mohammad Saradi, district governor of Panjwai district, said 60 people were killed when Taliban fighters took cover inside houses in the village of Zangwat.

However, Bismillah Afghanmal, Kandahar Provincial Council member, said 85 people had been killed in the airstrike, and witnesses said 25 houses had been razed.

Nato said its troops had killed 48 militants in three battles in Panjwai on Tuesday and could confirm only 12 civilian deaths.

In September, Nato concluded operation Medusa, in which hundreds of insurgents were killed in Panjwai district. Nato officials said this had cleared the Taliban from the area.

The attack this week in Panj-wai came as British troops in neighbouring Helmand province withdrew from Musa Qala district, previously the scene of heavy firefights, after negotiating a truce with tribal elders.

This week Mr Neumann told the UK's Daily Telegraph that the "jury is out" on the Musa Qala deal.

"There is a lot of nervousness about who the truce was made with, who the arrangement was made with, and whether it will hold," he said.

Sam Zarifi at Human Rights Watch in New York said Nato's offensive had caused serious resentment among Afghans and been counter-productive.

"The Soviets tried and failed to defeat Afghan guerrillas by using massive firepower so we know clearly that that is not the way to win in Afghanistan. You have to win the populace over, not kill it," he said.

Scandal Hits Germany's Afghan Mission (FT)

By Hugh Williamson In Berlin And Daniel Dombey In London

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

The German army was on Wednesday plunged into a scandal over abuse by Bundeswehr soldiers in Afghanistan that overshadowed the adoption of the most far-reaching review of Germany's military priorities in 60 years.

Bild, the German newspaper, on Wednesday published five photographs that the paper said showed German soldiers desecrating a human skull while on patrol outside the Afghan capital Kabul, The photos show soldiers posing with a skull, in one case with an unidentified soldier holding the skull next to his exposed penis.

The photos date from early 2003, according to a military source quoted by Bild. The newspaper said that, after thorough checks, it was convinced the pictures were authentic. They also show vehicles with German markings and those of Isaf, the Nato-led peacekeeping force.

The photos, which immediately revived memories of the scandal over US military abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, could damage the German military's broadly positive reputation in Afghanistan, military and regional experts said. There are around 2,800 German soldiers in Afghanistan, based in Kabul and the north of the country.

Chancellor Angela Merkel said the photos were "disgusting". Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, said the soldiers' "inexcusable behaviour damages the image of the army and our country". Franz Josef Jung, defence minister, ordered an investigation, and Bundeswehr officials confirmed that two men, a soldier and former soldier, were being investigated. A state prosecutor launched an inquiry into a possible case of desecration.

Despite the scandal, Mr Jung said the cabinet strategy paper adopted on Wednesday was "vital in redefining Germany's security priorities", with the Bundeswehr now primarily acting as an "international intervention force".

The paper, which builds on a restructuring of the Bundeswehr in 2004, identifies terrorism and weapons of mass destruction as chief threats, and says in future up to 14,000 German troops will take part in peacekeeping and other missions, compared with 9,000 today.

The German armed forces association, representing ordinary soldiers, said the strategy paper should have gone further in defining the limits of Germany's responsibilities in joining international missions.

The ruling parties and most opposition politicians said the scandal over the abuse photos would not influence Germany's commitment to its role in Afghanistan, with only the opposition Left party calling for an immediate withdrawal from Afghanistan.

The photos scandal follows an announcement by the German parliament last week of an inquiry into allegations that a Turkish man with German residency had been abused in 2002 by German soldiers while being held in a US prison in Afghanistan.

Nato now has 31,000 soldiers in Afghanistan but is trying to find extra troops for a 1,000-strong reserve battalion to operate in the south of the country, as well as more air support.

Some US officials have called for German soldiers to be dispatched to the south. But Nato commanders have steered away from such a call, arguing that other countries could provide more effective help.

. . . With Forecasts (WT)

By Austin Bay

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

A Pentagon press lunch with the secretary of defense is a rare privilege, especially for a columnist from fly-over country.

I've watched Don Rumsfeld perform on television. He treats stand-up press conferences as sparring rings, where he's the heavyweight champ and reporters are lightweight chumps with glass jaws.

Maybe lettuce and tomatoes mellow Big Don. Mr. Rumsfeld seems much less combative with a salad in front of him. As the lunch and conversation progressed, I noticed he never picked up a knife, but I've no doubt the man can wield sharp cutlery. The glint in the eye is the clue. Sgt. 1st Class Bowen -- the Korean War vet who taught Cadet Austin Bay how to use a garrote -- had the same steely gleam.

I left it to the Beltway journalists to ask those personality-juiced queries that generate sensational gossip. Here's an example: "Mr. Rumsfeld, are you going to resign after the election?"

Since my scribbled notes include a splotch of asparagus soup, I'll have to paraphrase the defense secretary's snarl: "I certainly wouldn't tell you if I were."

Undeterred, I decided to ask a question that goes to the heart of America's ability (or inability) to win long-term, multidimensional 21st century wars.

My question: "Mr. Secretary, based on our experience in Operation Iraqi Freedom, and the limited interagency and nongovernmental organization [NGO] participation in that operation, how do you see 'Unified Action' evolving for future conflicts?"

Forgive the military jargon -- at one time I was Col. Austin Bay -- but the question is essential. It also altered the luncheon ambiance. As I asked it, I saw our very steady chairman of the joint chiefs, Gen. Peter Pace, pass Mr. Rumsfeld a careful stare.

"I'll tell you we're better at it now than we were five years ago," Mr. Rumsfeld replied. He acknowledged that "challenges remain" in achieving Unified Action and that effective Unified Action is critical to winning 21st century wars.

He's right -- we are better at it than we were. However, I know we aren't as good at it as we need to be.

The politically deft defense secretary finessed the question -- and it was finesse, not dodge. The military jargon masked a heavy political hand grenade I was rolling toward the Beltway. You think Harry Reid's land deal or Mark Foley's messages are big stories? How about a stinging pre-election turf battle between Defense and the departments of State, Treasury, Justice, Commerce and Agriculture, complete with zinger accusations of who is or isn't contributing to the war effort?

I know, that's quite a claim, which is why I need to translate the military-speak: Unified Action means coordinating and synchronizing every "tool of power" America has to achieve a political end -- like winning a global war for national survival against terrorists who hijack economically and politically fragile nations and provinces.

People understand the role of soldiers and cops in a war, but in 21st century wars where economic and political development are determinative, an Agriculture Department arborist and a Commerce Department trade consultant can be a powerful contributors to "Unified Action."

Restoring Iraqi agriculture provides an example. Saddam Hussein's economic and political policies damaged agriculture in the land that eight millennia ago spawned the Agricultural Revolution. (Heck of an achievement, huh?) Agriculture, Commerce and several NGOs have expertise and programs that help revive Iraqi farms. Still, problems occur when trying to tailor programs to meet specific local needs -- like, who pays for the program and is ultimately in charge of oversight and coordination.

While serving in Iraq in 2004, I met a young U.S. Army captain who was running a successful small-scale date palm restoration project. What we really need are joint development and security teams, where agricultural and economic specialists work with that captain "in the field" on a sustained, day-to-day basis. We need to decide who is in charge of that team (the captain or the arborist?) and how we fund it.

Our system for "Unified Action" is still largely a Cold War, 20th-century relic designed to prop up governments (so often corrupt and ill-led), instead of helping individuals and neighborhoods become economically self-sustaining and self-securing. Winning war in the Age of the Internet means improving neighborhoods and individual lives. The 2006 Nobel Peace Prize winner and micro-finance whiz Muhammad Yunus understands this.

We are in a long, global war, where economic and political development programs must reinforce security and intelligence operations -- and vice versa.

We've been improvising "joint development and security operations," and we've learned from our improvisation (Mr. Rumsfeld's "we're better than we were").

But it's time to quit improvising. Effective "Unified Action" requires re-engineering 20th-century Beltway bureaucracies -- which means thoughtful, sophisticated cooperation between the executive branch and Congress.

That means getting past the sensational gossip and confronting an essential issue.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monitor Widens His Probe; Earnings Tumble By 65% As Generic Saps Plavix Sales (WSJ)

By AVERY JOHNSON And JOHN CARREYROU

Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s third-quarter earnings were battered by generic competition to its bestselling drug, the blood thinner Plavix, and it disclosed that a federal monitor's investigation into its handling of a dispute over Plavix's patent has broadened to include possible securities violations.

It was unclear whether the widening scope of the probe being conducted by former federal judge Frederick B. Lacey means he has uncovered new wrongdoing in the three-month-old Plavix saga. Bristol-Myers said the development was "not unexpected" and suggested that it was a logical step given Mr. Lacey's duties.

Mr. Lacey has been overseeing the New York drug maker for more than a year on behalf of Christopher Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey. The unusual arrangement is part of a deferred-prosecution agreement that allowed Bristol-Myers to avoid criminal charges last year stemming from a previous accounting scandal.

Mr. Lacey last month made Bristol-Myers's board fire Chief Executive Peter R. Dolan after learning that he didn't keep directors well enough apprised of his attempts last spring to negotiate a deal to keep generic Plavix off the market.

The deal Mr. Dolan brokered with Canadian generic-drug maker Apotex Inc. -- which was intended to resolve Apotex's legal challenge of the Plavix patent -- unraveled this summer when agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Mr. Dolan's office and Apotex used certain binding clauses in the agreement to launch its generic product.

The Justice Department's antitrust division is investigating whether Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis, Plavix's original developer, struck a side deal with Apotex that they hid from regulators. Bristol-Myers has denied the existence of such a side deal.

Bristol-Myers yesterday disclosed that Mr. Lacey's own probe has now moved beyond issues of corporate governance to determining whether the company violated the terms of a consent order it entered into with the Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004. Under that consent order, Bristol-Myers settled SEC charges related to the previous accounting scandal by paying $150 million and agreeing to a permanent injunction against future violations of certain accounting provisions of federal securities laws. Mr. Lacey wasn't available for comment.

"Whenever we see a government investigation expanded, it's not a good thing, and because this company is already on probation, it's even more troubling," said Barbara Ryan, a pharmaceutical analyst at Deutsche Bank.

Bristol-Myers said the generic version of Plavix launched by Apotex on Aug. 8 is likely to have reduced Bristol-Myers's sales of the branded blood thinner by an estimated $525 million to $600 million in the quarter. In a conference call with analysts, the company cautioned that its revenues would continue to be hurt by the generic into the first quarter of next year, as wholesalers dispense to pharmacies remaining supplies of Apotex's product.

After that, branded Plavix sales are expected to bounce back. A federal judge in New York granted Bristol-Myers a preliminary injunction on Aug. 31 barring Apotex from selling any more of its product beyond what was already in the distribution channel. A hearing on an appeal by Apotex of that ruling is scheduled for Tuesday at the Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington.

Bristol-Myers raised back up its earnings outlook for the year from the reduced 95 cents a share it forecast in September to between 97 cents and $1.02 a share. It cited cost cuts, a favorable tax rate and slightly better-than-expected sales of branded Plavix.

In the latest quarter, Bristol-Myers net profit fell 65% to $338 million, or 17 cents a share, from $964 million, or 49 cents a share a year earlier. Sales dropped 13% to $4.15 billion from $4.77 billion.

Sales of Plavix fell 36% to $630 million as the generic captured between 70% and 75% of U.S. prescriptions. However, the sales drop wasn't as sharp as analysts had expected. U.S. prescriptions of branded and generic Plavix grew by 14% in the quarter.

Plavix wasn't Bristol-Myers's only generic headache during the latest quarter. Pravachol, its cholesterol drug, went off patent in the U.S. in April and lost patent protection in France and other European markets in July. The drug's world-wide sales dropped 64% to $192 million. And Taxol, a chemotherapy product, lost market exclusivity in Japan during the quarter, contributing to a sales decline of 22%. Taxol had been off patent in the U.S. since 2000.

Global sales of Bristol-Myers's Reyataz HIV treatment grew 32%, while its Abilify schizophrenia drug grew 20%. Abilify has been slower to pick up in Europe, though.

On a conference call with investors, interim Chief Executive James M. Cornelius tried to dispel speculation that Bristol-Myers will fall prey to a takeover. "On the M&A front, my words to employees have been 'We're not for sale,' " he said.

Bristol-Myers has hired an executive-search firm to find a permanent CEO.

Bristol-Myers shares declined 13 cents to $24.53 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading.

Generic Rival's Inroads Hurt Bristol-Myers Squibb (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Still reeling from a generic assault on its top-selling product, Plavix, Bristol-Myers Squibb said yesterday that it lost up to $600 million in sales of the drug to a Canadian rival during the third quarter, accounting for part of a 65 percent decline in earnings.

The missteps by Bristol-Myers this year in negotiating a proposed patent settlement enabled the Canadian company, Apotex, to flood the market in August with a cheaper generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner.

DOJ_NMG_0086954

Bristol-Myers also disclosed yesterday that one of the federal investigations into its handling of the Plavix matter, a review by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in Newark, had expanded to an examination of whether Bristol-Myers violated securities laws.

The Plavix debacle largely accounted for the company's decline in overall sales to $4.15 billion, compared with $4.76 billion in the quarter a year earlier. It was also partly responsible for sharply lower earnings of $338 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with $964 million, or 49 cents a share, in the third quarter last year.

The 2005 earnings included a significant one-time gain from the sale of the consumer medicines business.

The lower sales and revenues at Bristol came as drug companies have generally been posting improved results for the quarter. GlaxoSmithKline said yesterday that its quarterly earnings were up 15 percent.

Despite the bad news for Bristol, the company gave a slightly brighter outlook for the year than it issued in late summer, just after the generic Plavix flooded pharmacy shelves.

Yesterday, the company raised its earning projections to at least 97 cents a share this year, rather than the 95 cents it previously predicted. That is partly because some orders for Plavix are still coming in.

And yet, during a telephone conference with investment analysts yesterday, Andrew Bonfield, Bristol's chief financial officer, said that there was enough generic Plavix in supply chains to last into early next year and possibly into the second quarter of 2007. That means Bristol-Myers could still be dealing with the inexpensive competition when a trial starts in Manhattan on Jan. 22 to decide whether its Plavix patent is valid.

The outcome of that trial would determine whether Apotex has the right to ship additional supplies of the generic product. Currently, 70 percent to 75 percent of the prescriptions for Plavix are being filled by the generic supplies that Apotex shipped to the United States before Bristol-Myers obtained an injunction to block further shipments.

The company's fumbled plan to settle its dispute led to the generic company's shipments and the dismissal of the Bristol-Myers chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, in September. The company is now led by an interim chief, the former Guidant chairman James M. Cornelius.

Mr. Cornelius, speaking about the company's future during a conference call with analysts, played down continuing speculation that Bristol-Myers was a takeover candidate.

"My words to employees have been we're not for sale," Mr. Cornelius said. "The longer I'm here the more confident I become that Bristol-Myers Squibb has a wonderful future as an independent company."

Bristol-Myers said yesterday that Mr. Christie's office was investigating whether the company violated a consent decree the company signed in 2004 with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The agreement with the S.E.C. was a settlement of claims that Bristol-Myers misled investors about its financial outlook by lying about its wholesale inventories.

The expanded Plavix investigation by Mr. Christie's office is in addition to an investigation already under way by the Justice Department's antitrust division into whether Bristol-Myers tried to hide details of its Apotex negotiations from government antitrust reviewers.

The Plavix problems are coming at a time when demand for the drug is increasing. Prescriptions for the medicine and its generic equivalent were up 14 percent in the third quarter, an increase that is partly related to new advice from doctors that patients who have received drug-coated stents to keep their arteries open should continue Plavix therapy to avoid clotting around the stents.

Plavix sales in 2005 were $3.5 billion in the United States, but probably would have surpassed $4 billion this year if not for the flood of generics. The company also said it had been harmed by generic competition to its cholesterol-lowering drug Pravachol.

Bristol-Myers Profit Falls As Plavix Copy Hurts Sales (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, October 27, 2006

Oct. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s third- quarter net income fell 65 percent after cheap generic copies of its best-selling drug, Plavix, flooded the U.S. market.

Earnings declined to $338 million, or 17 cents a share, from $964 million, or 49 cents, a year earlier, the New York-based company said today in a statement. Sales of Plavix, used to prevent heart attacks and strokes, plunged 43 percent in the U.S. Profit beat analysts' estimates.

``Plavix was down dramatically, but it was not as bad as we thought," said Barbara Ryan, a Deutsche Bank analyst in Greenwich, Connecticut, in a telephone interview today. ``The issue now is we still don't know how much generic Plavix is out there and how much it will impact earnings next year."

The U.S. widened a probe of a deal delaying generic Plavix competition to review possible securities-law violations, Bristol-Myers said today. The company's board fired Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan last month after an accord he brokered collapsed and triggered a criminal antitrust investigation. The drugmaker needed revenue from Plavix to sustain earnings as it introduces new products.

Excluding certain costs, Bristol-Myers said profit was 22 cents a share, beating the 21 cents estimated by Credit Suisse analyst Catherine Arnold in New York, rated with five out of five stars on accuracy by StarMine Corp., and the 20-cent average estimate of 18 analysts in a Thomson Financial survey.

The company raised its 2006 net income forecast to between 97 cents and $1.02 a share from its previous estimate of no less than 95 cents. Bristol-Myers said it now projects full-year profit per share excluding certain costs of $1.02 to $1.07.

Revenue Drops

Shares of Bristol-Myers fell 50 cents, or 2 percent, to $24.16 at 11:26 a.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock was up 6.1 percent this year through yesterday, rebounding from a 22 percent plunge in August as generic Plavix went on sale.

Interim CEO Jim Cornelius said on a conference call that ``we are not for sale" and a search for a permanent chief among internal and outside candidates is under way.

Third-quarter revenue decreased 13 percent to $4.15 billion. Sales of Plavix fell to $474 million in the U.S. Worldwide revenue from the pill dropped 36 percent to $630 million.

Plavix, with $6.3 billion in revenue last year, was the second-biggest-selling drug in the world behind Pfizer Inc.'s cholesterol pill Lipitor.

Apotex Inc., a closely held Canadian generic-drug maker, started selling its cheaper copies of Plavix Aug. 8 after U.S. regulators rejected an accord with Bristol-Myers and marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis SA to postpone generic sales until 2011. A U.S. judge ordered Apotex to halt shipments Aug. 31, pending a court dispute over Plavix patents.

Plavix Probe, Suit

A U.S. Justice Department investigation of whether the Apotex agreement violated antitrust laws ``has been expanded to include a review of whether there was any violation of federal securities laws," Bristol-Myers said in today's statement.

At the end of September, three of every four Plavix prescriptions were being filled with the generic, said Chris Shibutani, an analyst with J.P. Morgan, in an Oct. 20 note.

Sales of generic Plavix will continue to affect revenue for the rest of this year and into 2007, Bristol-Myers said. Cheaper generic copies reduced third-quarter revenue by $525 million to $600 million, the company said.

Generic copies of Plavix will ``likely" run out in the 2007 first quarter, Andrew Bonfield, Bristol-Myers chief financial officer, said on the conference call.

Alabama Suit

An Alabama company sued Bristol-Myers and Sanofi yesterday in New Jersey, saying the two overcharged for the drug and downplayed its health risks. Alexander City, Alabama-based Skilstaf Inc. contends in the federal lawsuit that recent studies show Plavix is no better at helping heart-attack victims ward off future events than aspirin.

Marc Greene, Sanofi's spokesman, wasn't immediately available for comment. Laura Hortas, a Bristol-Myers spokeswoman, said the company was aware of the case and declined to comment.

Worldwide pharmaceutical sales fell 17 percent to $3.2 billion. U.S. drug revenue dropped 22 percent to $1.6 billion, reflecting generic competition for Plavix and Pravachol, a cholesterol-lowering medication that lost patent protection.

New Products

Bristol-Myers has introduced eight new drugs in the last four years and has eight more in the late stages of development.

In June, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration granted accelerated approval for Sprycel, a pill for two rare cancers of the blood and bone marrow. Sprycel had sales in the quarter of $11 million. Bristol-Myers said there are 30,000 patients who might benefit from the drug.

In July, the agency cleared Atripla, a once-a-day pill for HIV combining Bristol-Myers's Sustiva with Gilead Sciences Inc.'s Viread and Emtriva medicines. Atripla and Sustiva had combined sales of $201 million, up 18 percent over the previous year.

Sales of the HIV drug Reyataz, first approved by U.S. regulators in 2003, grew 32 percent to $233 million, the company said. A 300-milligram dose of Reyataz got U.S. approval Oct. 20.

Pravachol, the cholesterol drug that was Bristol-Myers's biggest seller before losing U.S. patent protection this year, had revenue of $192 million, a 64 percent decline.

The cancer treatment Erbitux, which Bristol-Myers markets with New York-based ImClone Systems Inc., recorded a sales increase of 64 percent to $175 million. In March, the drug, already approved in the U.S. for colon cancer, won additional regulatory clearance for treating head and neck malignancies.

Sales of Baraclude, a hepatitis B treatment, tripled to $22 million. Schizophrenia treatment Abilify sales were up 20 percent, to $313 million.

Feds Broaden Probe Of Bristol-Myers (DOW)

By Peter Loftus, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, October 27, 2006

A federal investigation into Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s (BMY) proposed settlement of a patent dispute has been expanded to determine whether the deal violated securities laws, the drug maker disclosed Thursday.

Earlier this year, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis (SNY), which co-market the heart drug Plavix, reached a proposed settlement with Apotex Inc. of Canada to stave off the introduction of a generic version of Plavix until 2011. The deal fell apart after state regulators objected, and Apotex sold generic Plavix for about three weeks in August before a judge's order halted sales.

Bristol-Myers previously disclosed that the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey began an investigation into corporate governance issues related to the company's negotiations of the proposed settlement. Also, the Department of Justice's antitrust unit launched a criminal investigation into the proposed settlement, Bristol disclosed in July.

On Thursday, Bristol-Myers said the U.S. Attorney's office investigation has been expanded to include a review of whether there was any violation of federal securities laws in connection with the proposed settlement. Bristol-Myers said this was in connection with the terms of a consent order entered into with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2004.

Bristol disclosed the development in a press release for its third-quarter financial results.

The 2004 SEC agreement settled charges that Bristol-Myers engaged in a fraudulent earnings management scheme that was unrelated to the current Plavix matter. The settlement required Bristol-Myers to pay $150 million and included a permanent injunction against future violations of certain accounting provisions of federal securities laws.

In a related development in June 2005, Bristol-Myers agreed to pay an additional $300 million as part of a deferred-prosecution agreement with the U.S. Attorney's office in Newark, N.J. Under that pact, federal prosecutors agreed to defer prosecution on a charge of conspiring to commit securities fraud for two years. If at the end of two years, Bristol-Myers has fully complied with the terms, the criminal complaint will be dismissed.

The terms included Bristol-Myers' agreement to submit to an independent monitor, former federal judge Frederick Lacey. It was Lacey's oversight, in connection with the U.S. Attorney's office probe into corporate governance issues surrounding the proposed Plavix settlement, that led to the firing of Peter Dolan as CEO last month.

In recent premarket activity, shares of Bristol-Myers were quoted at $24.75, up 9 cents from Wednesday's close.

SEC Brings Fewer Enforcement Cases (WSJ)

By Judith Burns And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission brought about 10% fewer enforcement actions in fiscal 2006 than the prior year, marking a three-year decline from a record high in fiscal 2003, according to individuals familiar with the results.

The decline in cases comes as the SEC enforcement division is under scrutiny from congressional investigators, led by Sen. Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican. The Government Accountability Office said last week in a letter to Sen. Grassley, who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, that it would grant his request and review the SEC's enforcement and examinations divisions.

The GAO also said it would review the agency's oversight of the self-regulatory bodies at the New York Stock Exchange and National Association of Securities Dealers. SEC spokesman John Heine said the agency welcomes the review.

Sen. Grassley's interest stems from allegations by a former SEC enforcement attorney who says he was fired once he sought to take the testimony of John Mack, a Wall Street chief executive, in connection with an insider-trading investigation involving Pequot Capital Management Inc., a hedge fund. The former SEC attorney, Gary Aguirre, says his supervisors refused to allow him to take Mr. Mack's testimony because of his political connections and clout. Mr. Mack was a major fund-raiser for President Bush during the 2004 election.

The SEC has denied political favoritism. Earlier this month, the SEC notified Pequot and Mr. Mack, now chief executive of Morgan Stanley, that it wouldn't file charges against them.

Securities regulators brought fewer than 600 cases in the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, according to the individuals familiar with the results, down from 630 in fiscal 2005 and 639 in fiscal 2004. The SEC hit its high in fiscal 2003 with 679 cases.

The SEC did set a record for deregistering shares in companies that are late in filing financial results, bringing about 90 such actions in fiscal 2006, nearly three times the level in the prior fiscal year.

Critics say deregistration cases are relatively easy to bring, and some believe they conceal a steep decline in enforcement cases even as the SEC's enforcement budget has grown to support about 1,200 staffers.

The SEC plans to release its enforcement results next week and is expected to point to a hiring freeze and staff turnover as factors in the declining case output.

Mr. Heine said preliminary estimates show the SEC lost 31 "full-time equivalent" positions in enforcement in fiscal 2006, a 2.4% decline from fiscal 2005.

"There's no question that if the staff numbers had not declined in the last few years, we would have been able to bring more cases," Mr. Heine said.

He said the SEC expects an 8% to 10% decline in enforcement cases from fiscal 2005 to fiscal 2006 but noted that year-to-year comparisons "are difficult to make because cases are so different."

Some attorneys say they see no evidence that the SEC's enforcement staff is pulling its punches amid a backlash from business groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which issued a report in March questioning whether the SEC's enforcement program is becoming too punitive and pursuing cases it shouldn't.

"I don't think anybody has pulled back because of the chamber report," said one of its authors, Bruce Hiler, a partner with the law firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft, in Washington, D.C.

Some critics blame SEC management for the drop-off, suggesting top enforcement officials are playing it safe. Others point to the five-member commission, which votes on each action and has been split in the past when a proposed settlement would penalize companies, something opponents say may only inflict additional harm on shareholders.

Faced with potential stalemate on some cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox worked with commissioners to hammer out a policy, announced with great fanfare in January, to help resolve such matters. SEC critics say they see no evidence the agreement has helped the commission sign off on a number of older cases. Others say it has created additional paperwork at the staff level, which has bogged down new cases.

S.E.C. Facing Wide Review Of Practices (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission, under scrutiny for its handling of an insider-trading case involving a prominent hedge fund, will be the subject of a broad review by the investigative arm of Congress, the Government Accountability Office.

Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, last month asked the office in a letter to conduct a review of the commission because he was growing concerned, he said, about whether it is "faithfully adhering to its mission."

The S.E.C. is charged with protecting investors by policing the nation's financial markets and prosecuting violations of securities law by individuals and companies.

Last week, the G.A.O. accepted Mr. Grassley's request that it review two S.E.C. divisions: its enforcement unit, which brings civil securities suits, and the office of compliance, inspection and examination, which oversees money managers, brokerage firms, stock exchanges and other regulated entities.

The G.A.O. will also examine whether the commission adequately monitors self-regulatory organizations — like the New York Stock Exchange and NASD — that refer cases to the commission for possible enforcement actions.

"Congress needs an independent analysis of whether the institutions that are responsible for protecting investors are keeping up in a fast-changing marketplace," Mr. Grassley said yesterday in a statement. "It's been a long time since there's been this kind of thorough review. The integrity of our financial markets and, in turn, the well-being of individual investors depends on checkpoints that stop insider trading and manipulation."

John Heine, a spokesman for the S.E.C., said, "We welcome the review and look forward to any recommendations that might follow."

Mr. Grassley's request comes amid an inquiry by his staff and by the Senate Judiciary Committee into the S.E.C.'s handling of an insider trading investigation involving Pequot Capital Management, a $7 billion hedge fund run by Arthur J. Samberg. That investigation, which focused on a number of profitable trades by Pequot in advance of mergers or other market-moving news, commenced in 2004 and was being overseen in 2005 by Gary J. Aguirre, a staff lawyer at the S.E.C.

Mr. Aguirre has told the Senate that in the midst of his investigation, his superiors blocked him from taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and a friend of Mr. Samberg. Mr. Mack now heads Morgan Stanley.

S.E.C. officials argued that Mr. Aguirre was not justified in taking Mr. Mack's testimony because he could not show that Mr. Mack had inside information or a clear motive for giving it to Mr. Samberg. The investigator said he was simply asking to interview Mr. Mack, not bring charges. Mr. Aguirre protested the decision and was fired in September 2005, a year after he was hired.

Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

During the summer, the S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony. Earlier this month, the agency closed the Pequot investigation, advising Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack that it would not recommend any enforcement actions against them or the hedge fund.

Mr. Grassley wants the G.A.O. to analyze referrals sent to the S.E.C. by exchanges to see how many actually translate into regulatory actions, to examine what types of cases the S.E.C. brings, and how it begins and tracks its investigations.

Mr. Grassley also asked the office to review how the commission ensures that stock exchanges police their members adequately and whether the systems at these exchanges ensure that "influential individuals" cannot gain access to data that are not public.

Mr. Grassley has shown particular interest in the S.E.C.'s policing of possible insider trading by institutions like hedge funds and brokerage firms. Securities regulators in Britain have made insider trading, especially involving hedge funds, an enforcement priority recently.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated, large pools of capital that play an increasingly powerful role in world markets; they control more than $1.2 trillion in assets.

Richard J. Hillman, managing director of financial markets and community investment at G.A.O., said that his organization gets frequent requests to study the commission's operations. In 2004 and 2005, for example, the G.A.O. examined the commission's mutual fund oversight; last year, it reviewed how it assesses and collects fines, penalties and disgorgement in its cases.

S.E.C. officials have not finished compiling data on enforcement cases brought or opened during its most recent fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30. For the 11 months that ended in August, the S.E.C. opened 838 investigations. Full-year figures for investigations opened in 2005 totaled 947, down from 975 commenced in 2004.

SEC Steps Up Scrutiny Of Fund Administrative Fees (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith And John Waggoner

USA Today, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is accelerating a probe of 27 investment company advisers that paid $230 million in mutual funds assets for administrative fees from 1999 to 2004 to a third-party service provider that funneled most of the payments right back to the investment advisers.

The SEC probe gained traction when the contractor, Bisys Fund Services, which performs recordkeeping and other back-office services for the advisers, agreed last month to pay $21.4 million to settle a case against it and to cooperate in the larger investigation.

"Our investigation is ongoing," SEC Pacific regional director Randall Lee said Thursday. The agency has begun to issue letters requesting details of the fee-splitting arrangements. Mutual funds employ investment advisers to manage the funds. These advisers farm out much of the work to third parties.

Although the suspect fund managers have not been identified in agency documents, AmSouth Bank disclosed in August 2005 that the SEC was threatening to bring an enforcement action related to its fee-splitting relationship with Bisys. AmSouth said it voluntarily refunded payments to its AmSouth Funds unit, which it subsequently sold.

Another bank, BB&T, said Thursday that it employed Bisys in a similar arrangement but that it restructured the relationship in late 2004 or early 2005 to reduce the fees borne by fund investors.

"We have worked diligently over time to reduce the expense structure," said Keith Karlawish, president of BB&T Asset Management.

Karlawish said that BB&T had been in contact with the SEC about the relationship and said the bank is reviewing its relationship with Bisys, which still works for its funds, in a lesser role than before. "The whole situation is under review," Karlawish said.

Several other banks, including JPMorgan Chase, which inherited a large contract with Bisys when it acquired the former Bank One in 2004, declined to comment.

The SEC laid out Bisys' secret fee-splitting agreements in an administrative proceeding that Bisys settled without admitting wrongdoing. The SEC said investment advisers contracted Bisys to administer their funds with side agreements that entitled them to a portion of its fees without disclosing the arrangement to fund investors or even the funds' boards of directors.

Bisys kept only about $10 million of the fund assets it was paid over five years, the SEC said. The rest went back to the investment advisers as marketing fees.

Russel Kinnel, head of fund research at Morningstar, said, "In every case where there was a kickback, you know that some senior (officials) gave up their fiduciary responsibility and sold out fund shareholders."

Former Executives Of Delphi To Face SEC Civil Claims (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell In Washington And Jeffrey Mccracken In Detroit

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission approved the filing of civil fraud claims against the former chairman and chief executive of auto-parts maker Delphi Corp. and against its former chief financial officer in connection with accounting improprieties, according to people familiar with the matter.

The five-member commission voted unanimously yesterday to approve a settlement with Delphi, in which the auto-parts maker would settle allegations of accounting improprieties that resulted in a multiyear restatement of earnings, these people said. The company, which is in bankruptcy court protection, won't be subject to a penalty, these people said.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin declined to comment, except to say "Delphi has been cooperating with the SEC investigation."

Meanwhile, the SEC is investigating the role of Delphi's outside auditors during this time period, Deloitte & Touche LLP, these people said. A Deloitte spokeswoman declined to comment.

Former chairman and chief executive J.T. Battenberg III will be named in a civil complaint and is expected to fight the allegations, said the people familiar with the matter. Mr. Battenberg's attorney, William Jeffress, didn't respond to a phone call or email.

Meanwhile, former chief financial officer Alan Dawes also is expected to face claims, these people said. Mr. Dawes has agreed to a settlement, which the commission has approved, these people said. Mr. Dawes's attorney, Elizabeth Baird, declined to comment, saying she "has nothing to say until the SEC has something to say."

The SEC also is expected to file civil claims against several former executives, some of whom are expected to simultaneously agree to settle the allegations. It is unclear which other former executives will face the claims.

Resolving the case could help Delphi firm up its funding prospects to help it emerge from bankruptcy. Delphi, which makes auto parts such as steering systems and satellite radios, is hoping to exit bankruptcy before the middle of 2007.

Mr. Battenberg retired from the company a week before the SEC probe was made public. Mr. Dawes resigned last year after an internal investigation uncovered accounting improprieties.

Also expected to face claims is a non-Delphi executive that was involved in some of the questionable accounting and helped Delphi misrepresent a contract when the supplier was questioned by auditors, said the people familiar with the matter. It is unclear who this executive will be.

At least four other Delphi executives have resigned or lost their jobs in connection with the investigation. Among them were former Delphi controller and chief accounting officer Paul Free and former vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions John Blahnik. An attorney for Mr. Blahnik didn't return a call seeking comment. Mr. Free couldn't be reached.

Attorneys for various former Delphi executives and officials earlier this month asked a bankruptcy judge to force the parts maker to cover legal costs from responding to federal subpoenas and civil lawsuits over the company's accounting woes. Delphi halted such payments when it filed for bankruptcy in October 2005.

Laura Marion, former director of financial accounting, was among other ex-Delphi officials who sought money to cover their legal costs. Her attorney couldn't be reached.

In February, the company's compensation committee denied a request from some of the former executives and employees for legal reimbursement, and "ceased advancement of expenses," the executives and employees said.

The committee provided no explanation for its decision but made it clear that future requests would also be denied, they said. Reimbursements have since ceased to all nine of the executives and employees.

The former employees asked U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain to force Delphi to advance legal fees and costs, or to allow a corporate insurer to advance defense costs. The judge is expected to hear arguments on this issue in late November.

Ultimately, Delphi in its own review found improper accounting for rebates and other lump-sum payments from suppliers, off-balance sheet financings of indirect materials and inventory, and payments and credits for warranty and health-care issues.

SEC To Charge Delphi Ex-execs (DEN)

Detroit News, October 27, 2006

Former leaders of bankrupt parts maker face fraud accusations after 27-month probe.

The Securities and Exchange Commission met Thursday and plans to file civil fraud claims against several former executives of bankrupt Delphi Corp. following a 27-month investigation, according to people familiar with the situation.

The Wall Street Journal reported that two of the executives charged will be former chairman and CEO J.T. Battenberg III and former chief financial officer Alan Dawes. The Detroit News has learned that two others will be John Blahnik, the former Delphi vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions and Paul R. Free, former chief accounting officer.

DOJ_NMG_0086961

Reached by The Detroit News late Thursday, Battenberg's lawyer William Jeffress declined to comment. A person reached at Battenberg's home in Naples, Fla., late Thursday declined to comment. She said Battenberg was traveling and unavailable for comment.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin also declined comment other than to say the company has cooperated with the SEC's investigation.

The charges are likely to be filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit, possibly as early as Monday, one person familiar with the investigation told The News.

The Journal reported the SEC's five-member commission also voted unanimously to approve a settlement with Delphi. The company agreed to settle allegations of improper accounting that led to the restatement of some earnings, it said, adding Delphi won't be subject to a penalty.

Laura Marion, who had served as director of financial accounting and reporting is expected to face civil charges, the sources said.

The News confirmed that SEC officials made several courtesy calls Thursday to lawyers representing former Delphi officials to alert them of the pending charges.

The SEC's investigation has found that Delphi used various improper methods to inflate earnings, cash flow and revenue, which hid the declining health of the company, according to people familiar with the matter.

Several large transactions weren't accounted for properly, including a $237 million payment Delphi made to its former parent, General Motors Corp.

Lawyers for many of the former Delphi executives under scrutiny have argued to the SEC that there is no evidence they personally profited from the improper accounting. They also contend that before the Enron debacle and the 2002 corporate reforms, some of the accounting practices in question were commonplace.

Many of the targets have been in settlement talks with the SEC. The SEC has sought to impose stiff fines against former executives -- in some cases nearly $1 million -- in the Delphi investigation.

It isn't clear if any settlements have been reached or if Delphi will have to pay a corporate penalty.

Prior to Delphi's financial turmoil and the accounting scandal, Battenberg was among the most-respected auto executives in Detroit.

Throughout his career, he held a variety of assignments covering aspects of automotive design, engineering, manufacturing, finance and sales and has worked in both the United States and Europe.

Battenberg's automotive career began as a General Motors Institute (now Kettering University) engineering student in 1961, sponsored by a GM plant in Kansas City, Mo.

He was named to lead the initial public offering and eventual spin-off of Troy-based Delphi in 1999.

Battenberg retired from Delphi in July 2005, a week before the SEC charges became public.

He retired last year when Robert S. "Steve" Miller took over as Chairman and CEO of Delphi and eventually took the company into Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

A criminal investigation by the justice department is ongoing.

Ex-Trader Found Guilty, But Judge Questions Case (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

David Finnerty, a former star trader on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, was convicted of charges that he made thousands of improper trades that cheated investors out of millions of dollars. However, in a move that may bolster any appeal, the federal judge in the case raised questions about the verdict.

After just one day of deliberations, the jury of six men and six women found Mr. Finnerty, 40 years old, guilty of three counts of securities fraud. Mr. Finnerty, a former specialist at Fleet Specialist Inc., now a unit of Bank of America Corp., oversaw trading of General Electric Co., one of the most heavily traded stocks at the NYSE, and prosecutors allege that Mr. Finnerty had more troubling trades than any of the other specialists who have been charged. Mr. Finnerty faces as long as 20 years in prison for each count.

The verdict provided a boost for federal prosecutors in Manhattan, who have lost two similar cases and dropped two others. There are six cases left to be tried. But immediately after the verdict was handed down, U.S. District Judge Denny Chin raised questions about the government's case, saying there "is some fuzziness in the law."

Judge Chin said the trading practice in question appeared to be widespread at the NYSE and that many trading firms had made a lot of money by trading in between public buy and sell orders, which the government alleges harmed investors. The seven NYSE specialist firms paid about $248 million in 2004 to settle civil cases related to the trading. The judge said he wasn't inclined to reverse the verdict but his comments are likely to strengthen any appeal or result in a reduced sentence.

The government had accused Mr. Finnerty of improperly positioning himself between public buy and sell orders more than 26,000 times between 1999 and 2003, generating $4.5 million in illegal profits for his firm and hundreds of thousands of dollars in inflated bonuses for himself.

"Just because everyone cheats on their taxes doesn't make it right," Judge Chin said.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in the Southern District of New York declined to comment.

Fred Hafetz, Mr. Finnerty's attorney, called the verdict "troubling." He said the judge's comments address issues he plans to raise in a motion to have the verdict set aside. Mr. Hafetz argued the trading wasn't criminal and many of the stock trades were mistakes. The entire trading in question amounted to less than 1% of each specialist's volume, he added.

"So what if it's only a small percentage of the time," assistant U.S. Attorney Anirudh Bansal said during his closing argument in Mr. Finnerty's trial. "Does that make it right to steal?"

Prosecutors indicted the 15 elite traders, known as specialists, last year as part of a broader crackdown on white-collar crime, one of the most serious criminal actions ever brought against NYSE traders. Two other specialists have been convicted and two others have pleaded guilty. Convincing a jury that the highly paid traders were engaged in improper trading has been difficult. Much of the evidence was technical and hard to understand.

Stocks Populi (WSJ)

By Arthur Levitt Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Ever since the recount of 2000, partisans of both parties have paid particular attention to everything from who votes to how they vote and how their preferences are recorded. Counting every vote is not only integral to our political life; it is central to our economic life as well. Shareholder capitalism enables our markets to thrive, our companies to grow and our economy to remain strong. And central to this system is the principle that shareholders can have a voice in the running of the companies that they own, that their votes will count.

This fall, the issue has been the focus of a series of court cases, decisions and now potential Securities and Exchange Commission action. How the SEC handles this can have a profound effect on the future of shareholder democracy, corporate governance and the future of our markets. It's a matter of interest to all investors.

For years, shareholder advocates have been working to gain better access to companies' proxies so that they can put forward resolutions and, most importantly, their own candidates for director slots. Even though boards of directors have improved considerably since the passage of new independence standards and disclosure requirements in Sarbanes-Oxley, the ability of shareholders to remove directors is critical when seeking to revive a moribund corporation. Yet currently, board elections are one-party affairs, with the incumbent board's choices winning in virtually every case. Shareholders can only put forward candidates after costly proxy campaigns. A director has a better chance of being struck by lightning than losing an election.

After failing to convince the SEC to pass a proxy access proposal in 2003, shareholder advocates tried to make changes in the bylaws of companies that govern the elections of directors in order to make them fairer. They argued that this was a matter of process under applicable law (that is, did not directly relate to the election of directors, a basis of exclusion), and thus management had to put such a proposal on its proxy card to shareholders. In September, in a case concerning AFSCME, the large public employee union that wanted to put forward these changes at AIG, an appeals court ruled that such a bylaw change was proper and that management would have to open its proxy to proposals regarding how directors were elected. (Full disclosure: I was retained by AIG's board to help restructure its corporate governance; I had no involvement in this matter.)

In response, the SEC rightly decided to re-examine this issue and clarify the law. An open hearing on the topic was scheduled in October but was delayed until Dec. 13. The outcome of this session is critical to the future of shareholder capitalism. The signal the commission sends is an important one. Support of the AIG decision will make it clear that the reforms of the past few years were not ephemeral, and that even though the markets are once again delivering high returns, the commitment to good governance will not falter.

The upcoming meeting is the right time and place for the commission to set expectations for our public corporations. Indeed, an understandable desire for consensus on such a difficult matter is less important than the clarity of the SEC's message. While passing an entirely developed proxy access plan may be too much to ask, the SEC can set a direction by making it clear that it will not ignore the issue of fairness that precipitated this latest litigation and put forward a series of steps that will strengthen shareholder democracy.

Part of this should include safeguards such as a minimum requirement of shares held in order to put forward director nominees. Other changes that can be made are: an increase in the number of exempt solicitations from 10 persons to 20 as long as those solicited are institutions or "accredited investors" so that investors can easily communicate with each other; the electronic transmission of proxy materials to those who desire them in that form, a move that can boost shareholder participation and reduce cost; and an endorsement of the principle of majority rule and schemes that bring this to publicly traded companies. A growing number of corporations have taken this last step, and it's important for the SEC not only to allow but also to affirmatively promote it as a best practice -- even urging the exchanges to include majority-voting among their listing standards.

By setting this tone, the SEC will make a strong statement about corporate governance. It will demonstrate that accountability is a principle that will not be compromised. It will bolster its admirable efforts on executive compensation; after all, disclosure provisions are toothless if shareholders are unable to act upon them. And an endorsement of shareholder democracy will show investors world-wide that in our markets, their voices matter and their votes count.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Special Prosecutor Picks Apart Witness In CIA Leak Case (SDUT/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald took on the first witness in the CIA leak case Thursday, dissecting an expert witness until she acknowledged errors and misstatements in her research.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, hoped the hearing would persuade a judge to let him call a memory expert at his obstruction and perjury trial in January.

At the outset of the procedural hearing, U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton indicated that he was not inclined to allow a memory expert to testify at the trial. Still, he allowed Libby's lawyers to present a witness to bolster their claim that memory experts would help in his defense.

When it came Fitzgerald's turn, the veteran prosecutor launched into a nearly three-hour cross-examination of the witness – psychologist Elizabeth Loftus – that had some members of the audience shaking their heads.

It was the first public courtroom confrontation between Fitzgerald and Libby's defense team and foreshadowed a contentious trial.

Libby wants to use a memory expert to help argue that, when he made false statements to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame, it was because of faulty memory. Prosecutors say he lied.

Loftus testified that many jurors don't understand how memory works and how unreliable it can be.

Fitzgerald challenged the validity of memory research. Citing footnotes in her publications, presenting conflicting statements and questioning her methodology, Fitzgerald got Loftus to acknowledge that a statement in one of her research papers was taken out of context and that a figure in one of her books was incorrect.

Libby's defense team had no comment after court.

Walton did not immediately rule on whether to allow the memory testimony at trial. He closed the courtroom to continue the debate over how much classified information Libby should be allowed to present at trial.

Libby is the only person charged in the leak case. Plame believes the Bush administration leaked her name to reporters as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

In The Libby Case, A Grilling To Remember (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

With withering and methodical dispatch, White House nemesis and prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald yesterday sliced up the first person called to the stand on behalf of the vice president's former chief of staff.

If I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was not afraid of the special counsel before, the former Cheney aide, who will face Fitzgerald in a trial beginning Jan. 11, had ample reason to start quaking after yesterday's Ginsu-like legal performance.

Fitzgerald's target in the witness box was Elizabeth F. Loftus, a professor of criminology and psychology at the University of California at Irvine. For more than an hour of the pretrial hearing, Loftus calmly explained to Judge Reggie B. Walton her three decades of expertise in human memory and witness testimony. Loftus asserted that, after copious scientific research, she has found that many potential jurors do not understand the limits of memory and that Libby should be allowed to call an expert to make that clear to them.

But when Fitzgerald got his chance to cross-examine Loftus about her findings, he had her stuttering to explain her own writings and backpedaling from her earlier assertions. Citing several of her publications, footnotes and the work of her peers, Fitzgerald got Loftus to acknowledge that the methodology she had used at times in her long academic career was not that scientific, that her conclusions about memory were conflicting, and that she had exaggerated a figure and a statement from her survey of D.C. jurors that favored the defense.

Her defense-paid visit to the federal court was crucial because Libby is relying on the "memory defense" against Fitzgerald's charges that he obstructed justice and lied to investigators about his role in the leaking of a CIA operative's identity to the media. Libby's attorneys argue that he did not lie -- that he was just really busy with national security matters and forgot some of his conversations.

When Fitzgerald found a line in one of her books that raised doubts about research she had cited on the stand as proof that Libby needs an expert to educate jurors, Loftus said, "I don't know how I let that line slip by."

"I'd need to see that again," Loftus said when Fitzgerald cited a line in her book that overstated her research by saying that "most jurors" consider memory to be equivalent to playing a videotape. Her research, however, found that to be true for traumatic events, and even then, only 46 percent of potential jurors thought memory could be similar to a videotape.

There were several moments when Loftus was completely caught off guard by Fitzgerald, creating some very awkward silences in the courtroom.

One of those moments came when Loftus insisted that she had never met Fitzgerald. He then reminded her that he had cross-examined her before, when she was an expert defense witness and he was a prosecutor in the U.S. attorney's office in New York.

Libby's defense team declined to comment.

Access To Files Delays Jefferson Probe (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 27, 2006

Action unlikely before primary

WASHINGTON -- With unexpected delays in copying records and computer files taken from Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, it is unlikely the Justice Department will seek an indictment against the eight-term New Orleans Democrat before the Nov. 7 primary, legal observers say.

DOJ_NMG_0086965

The delay may even force the decision past the Dec. 9 runoff that will be held if none of the 12 candidates in the 2nd Congressional District race wins more than 50 percent of the primary vote.

Neither, the Justice Department nor attorneys for Jefferson would comment. Jefferson has denied wrongdoing and has pointed to the lack of indictment after 18 months of investigation as evidence that he has been wrongly targeted.

Since the probe began in March 2005, two former Jefferson associates have pleaded guilty, including Vernon Jackson, CEO of the Louisville, Ky., technology firm iGate Inc.

Jackson said in court documents that he paid more than $400,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help getting telecommunications contracts in Nigeria and Ghana. An FBI raid of Jefferson's Washington home in August 2005, uncovered $90,000 in marked $100 bills in his freezer, money that Jefferson had said in secretly recorded conversations with a government informant was intended as a bribe for the vice president of Nigeria, according to an FBI affidavit.

The issue holding up the case is whether prosecutors should have access to materials seized from Jefferson's Capitol Hill office on May 20 and 21, the first FBI raid of a sitting member of Congress. Experts said that with the final disposition of the documents before the courts, the Justice Department isn't likely to move forward until it either gets access to the material or it is ruled off limits.

And while the Justice Department says it doesn't put much consideration into timing of elections, the agency has never brought an indictment closer than two weeks before an election. The primary is now 11 days away.

Under a process established by a three-judge federal appeals court panel, Jefferson's attorneys are to be given access to the materials taken from his office on a "rolling basis" of between 1,500 and 1,700 pages at a time. They'll have a chance to specify what material should be kept from prosecutors and then Chief District Court Judge Thomas Hogan will make recommendations to the appeals court on whether he concurs or disagrees.

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said that a Justice Department that argued it needed access to evidence in Jefferson's office would not want to proceed with a case against the congressman until it exhausted all efforts to get the material.

Politics also argue against bringing an indictment before the legal status of the search of Jefferson's office is determined.

If the Justice Department were to seek an indictment now, Tobias said, it would signal that the raid, which touched off angry reaction from the Republican and Democratic leaders of the House over what they called violations of the Constitution's separation of powers clause, wasn't necessary.

Political analysts said the likelihood that Jefferson won't be indicted before the primary and perhaps before the runoff is generally good news for his campaign.

"Certainly it helps him if nothing happens before the election," New Orleans pollster Silas Lee said. "It still leaves a question looming over his head. It's a two-part question: Will they indict him before the election and will they ever indict him? Part one has been answered."

There's been no public explanation for the delay in getting copies of the documents taken from Jefferson's office more than five months ago to the congressman's attorneys. Two people familiar with the investigation said that there was a "computer glitch," but could provide no details.

By Rhonda Schwartz And John Yang Report:

ABC News, October 27, 2006

A source close to former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl told ABC News that Arizona Congressman Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) was one of a small number of "problem members" of Congress who page program supervisors complained spent too much time socializing with pages, taking them to dinner or sporting events outside of official duties.

Mark Foley was also on the list.

The source said Trandahl frequently cautioned both congressmen that "adults should hang out with adults, pages should hang out with pages," a message Trandahl also conveyed to pages during their orientation.

Yesterday in Tucson, in his first meeting with reporters since returning from a European vacation, when asked by ABC News about Trandahl's reported allegations, Kolbe responded, "I would love to comment on a lot of these things, but I think it's just appropriate to say we're cooperating fully with all the inquiries."

Kolbe was also asked by reporters to respond to reports that the U.S. Attorney in Phoenix has opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 camping trip Kolbe took with two high school boys, both former pages, following a report by MSNBC that one adult member of the trip was "creeped out" by "fawning, petting and touching" on the arms, shoulders and back of one of the teenagers by Kolbe.

"I know there are a number of inquiries underway, and we're cooperating fully with all those inquiries, and I'm sure at the end of the time it will show that we acted appropriately and did exactly the right thing," Kolbe said.

U.S. Indicts Fugitive Sought As Witness To City Corruption (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Matt O'connor And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 27, 2006

In a fresh attempt to bring a corrupt City Hall contractor back from Mexico to testify against Chicago officials, federal prosecutors announced Thursday that they are again charging the fugitive with a 12-year-old drug crime.

Marco Morales had pleaded guilty to bribery and mail fraud in the Operation Silver Shovel corruption case and had agreed to testify about bribing a high-ranking official in Mayor Richard Daley's administration. But Morales fled to Mexico in 1997 and his lawyers defeated an attempt to have him shipped back to Chicago last year to testify for prosecutors and serve his prison term.

Thursday's superseding indictment against Morales marked yet another front in U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald's efforts to target corruption in the Daley administration.

Morales is believed to be living on Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula, and his lawyer in Mexico City said Thursday that Morales would continue to fight extradition.

If convicted on the drug count, Morales could get up to 40 years in prison and a $1 million fine, authorities said.

"The government intends to ask Mexican authorities to extradite him to face today's cocaine distribution charge," the U.S. attorney's office announced in a prepared statement.

A spokeswoman for the Daley administration declined to comment Thursday.

Morales pleaded guilty to the same drug charge in 1996, but prosecutors agreed to drop the charge as part of a plea bargain. Under that deal, Morales was to serve a 59-month sentence on mail fraud and bribery charges and testify against two city officials, including former Transportation Department deputy commissioner Anthony Pucillo.

Ran pro-Daley group

Pucillo, who has denied wrongdoing, ran a pro-Daley political group of city workers, according to testimony in the recent hiring fraud trial of the mayor's patronage chief.

Morales disappeared before reporting to serve his sentence. He later said he fled after being threatened at gunpoint by two men who warned him to stop helping prosecutors.

Acting on an American extradition request, Mexican authorities arrested Morales in Merida in May 2004. A Mexican appeals court ordered him released a year and a half ago, ruling that the statute of limitations on his bribery and mail fraud crimes had expired.

Federal prosecutors in Chicago had promised at the time to explore their options for seeking Morales' extradition.

A retired federal prosecutor who unsuccessfully sought Morales' extradition in 2005 said the resurrected narcotics charge against the fugitive could yield his return to Chicago.

Joan Safford was the legal attache at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City in 2005 when a Mexican appellate court rejected a U.S. bid to have Morales extradited to Chicago to face the charges. Under Mexican law, Morales had to be arrested within 6¼ years after he was supposed to surrender to federal prison. His arrest came about 2½ months late, Safford said.

DOJ_NMG_0086967

The statute of limitations in Mexico for narcotics offenses, however, is 17½ years, Safford said. The FBI videotaped Morales delivering two pounds of cocaine to a government mole in August 1994.

"His charge for narcotics is still within the statute of limitations for Mexico," Safford said.

But Jaime Tacher, the Mexico City lawyer who repelled the first effort to extradite Morales, said the U.S. government's new effort "is even weaker than the case it had two years ago."

Tacher said Mexican courts were unlikely to extradite Morales because the allegations are so old and because the U.S. government is trying to bring Morales back to face new charges rather than serve a sentence.

"Marco can be declared a political defendant," Tacher said in a telephone interview. "When the Mexican judges see that we won the first time, they will view this new extradition attempt as a vendetta by the U.S. prosecutors."

Tacher said he first learned about the re-indictment from a reporter and he was unable to contact Morales on Thursday. Morales' cousin, Norma Hoyos, who lives in Merida, said Thursday that Morales was traveling in Mexico to sell his paintings..

First in Silver Shovel

Morales, 61, was the first person charged in the Operation Silver Shovel probe. The investigation resulted in the conviction of six Chicago aldermen and a dozen other people as a result of 3½ years of undercover work by John Christopher, a lifelong mob-connected crook whose hundreds of secretly recorded tapes were the underpinnings of the investigation.

Morales originally pleaded guilty to the drug charge in February 1996, a month after the undercover probe went public. Prosecutors eventually restructured the deal so Morales might avoid deportation once he completed his prison term.

Morales pleaded guilty to bribing a Chicago official for lucrative construction contracts and cheating a Laborers Union local out of $160,000 in pension and welfare contributions.

The evidence against Morales on the narcotics charge appears to be rock-solid. As a hidden FBI videocamera captured the scene in Christopher's office, Morales delivered a sample of cocaine to Christopher on Aug. 11, 1994.

Eight days later, Christopher, wearing a body recorder, handed Morales $25,000 in cash as they sat in Christopher's car outside Morales' business.

Morales counted the money aloud, according to Morales' first plea agreement.

Later that afternoon, Morales was videotaped as he delivered two pounds of cocaine to Christopher in Christopher's office.

Since Morales went on the lam, his son's construction company has received tens of millions of dollars in city contracts. Morales has denied that the contracts to his son were given in exchange for his silence.

In a 2005 interview with the Tribune, soon after his release from a Mexican jail, Morales attributed much of his success as a city contractor to cash-stuffed envelopes that he passed to officials who handled contracts for the Daley administration.

Morales said he did not think he was doing anything wrong when he bribed city officials: "Everybody was doing the same thing."

Masilotti Plans To Step Down From Commission (PALMBEACHP)

By Tom Dubocq, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 27, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Under pressure from federal investigators, County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti has informed the county administrator that he will resign Friday — even though his term expires in a matter of weeks.

"I have been advised by an attorney for the commissioner that I will receive a letter of resignation from the commissioner in the morning," Administrator Bob Weisman said late Thursday. "I am to fax it to the governor's office."

Masilotti could not be reached Thursday evening. But in an interview earlier in the day, the beleaguered commissioner said he was on the brink.

"You get to a point of wondering, how are you going to keep fighting this?" Masilotti told The Palm Beach Post. "It's difficult to eat, to sleep, to do anything. It's difficult to get anything done in a storm."

DOJ_NMG_0086968

Masilotti's successor will be elected Nov. 7 and sworn in Nov. 21. Weisman said he alerted commissioners Thursday night of Masilotti's impending departure so they could prepared for a transition. Vice Chairwoman Addie Greene is in line to ascend.

"Frankly, I am kind of shocked to have received the call," Weisman said.

Masilotti said Thursday that federal prosecutors are threatening to charge him with "honest services" fraud, a crime that upon conviction carries a prison term of five to 20 years.

"I thought I was doing right," he said of his involvement in land deals under scrutiny by a federal grand jury. "It wasn't public corruption or kickbacks. ... The U.S. Attorney told me that these things weren't illegal — except that I didn't disclose them."

The "honest services" law is a 28-word federal statute that allows prosecutors to charge public officials with corruption even if there was no direct bribe to secure an official act. In general, it makes it a federal crime for officials to deprive their constituents of their honest efforts to represent them.

"It's more than a cozy relationship, it's a corrupt relationship," explained former U.S. Attorney Kendall Coffey. "Prosecutors are looking for financial inducements that corrupt the motives of a public official. It's not enough to be a lobbyist or a campaign contributor. It's like having someone who is on the take who can give you an inside track. It's a corrupt relationship even if a specific vote is not involved."

Convictions under the law have been overturned in the appellate courts because the law is arguably vague — prompting Masilotti to ponder an aggressive defense.

"I am really not sure. I don't know what to do," he said. "I need the advice of my attorney. I may have to just stand and fight."

Masilotti, 50, a former Royal Palm Beach mayor, first was elected to the county commission in 1998 and was reelected in 2002. Term-limited, he was preparing for a third and final run when he abruptly scrapped his reelection campaign in May and declared he wanted to spend more time with his children.

Before withdrawing from the race, Masilotti had been defending his connection to a multimillion-dollar land acquisition in Martin County reported weeks earlier in The Post — disclosures that eroded his support in the ranks of his Republican Party.

Masilotti at the time maintained that he did nothing wrong, that the stories were an attempt to oust him from office.

"There is nothing inappropriate about buying or selling land," he said from the commission dais. "And in fact I would put out a challenge to the publisher of The Post: If I or any of my family members did anything illegal, I will resign from this post, if in fact the editor of The Post will resign when they admit I did nothing wrong."

A federal grand jury soon was investigating the deal and another in Royal Palm Beach in a probe that has since mushroomed.

The Post reported in April that Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with a $40 million land purchase in Martin County by the South Florida Water Management District in 2003. The family's interest was hidden through a secret land trust and a tangled series of real estate transactions. Although Masilotti insisted he had no direct involvement, interviews and documents obtained by The Post showed he pushed for the water district purchase, without revealing his family's interest.

The grand jury also has subpoenaed records concerning Masilotti's promotion of a second real estate deal in 2003 and 2004 involving two investors who profited from the water district purchase. The investors bankrolled a bid to acquire 49 acres in Royal Palm Beach owned by the Diocese of Palm Beach.

Masilotti met twice with the bishop and wrote letters on Palm Beach County stationery urging the sale, records show. Once the investors had a contract on the property, Masilotti arranged a meeting with the county engineer to resolve a dispute over the proposed development's impact on traffic. Masilotti defended his actions, saying he was merely helping constituents.

Last month, the grand jury subpoenaed Masilotti's older brother, Paul, a building inspector for the village of Wellington, in connection with a land purchase in Brevard County. The 300 acres had been acquired in 2005 for $7.7 million in cash by a limited liability company whose manager was an attorney who also works for Palm Beach Aggregates, a major landowner in Tony Masilotti's commission district.

After the land purchase, Paul Masilotti paid the taxes on the property. Tony Masilotti said Thursday that his brother owned the Brevard County parcel, that he had acquired it from Palm Beach Aggregates in exchange for a property purchase option in Palm Beach County.

"Paul had a purchase option on a piece of property that (Palm Beach Aggregates President) Enrique Tomeu needed," the commissioner said. "Paul was planning to build a horse manure processing facility, but instead he swapped it."

Paul Masilotti's attorney could not be reached Thursday and Palm Beach Aggregates has declined comment on the grand jury matter.

Tony Masilotti said the company's dealings with his brother had nothing to do with his pivotal role in the county's approval of 2,000 homes and up to 50,000 square feet of commercial space on Palm Beach Aggregates' land. Until then, development had been limited to 120 homes.

"I honestly didn't know about it," the commissioner said. "If I had known, I would have told my brother not to buy land in Palm Beach County. I'm sure he didn't intend to hurt me."

Staff writer Hector Florin contributed to this story.

Palm Beach County Commissioner Masilotti Resigns As Feds Investigate (FLSUNSEN)

By Josh Hafenbrack, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 27, 2006

Palm Beach County Chairman Tony Masilotti is resigning from office amid ongoing federal investigations into his potential misuse of power in several secret land deals, the top county administrator said Thursday.

Masilotti will fax a letter of resignation to County Administrator Bob Weisman Friday morning, Masilotti's attorney told Weisman, bringing his eight-year commission career to an end just three weeks before his term expires.

Weisman said he would forward the resignation to Gov. Jeb Bush, who has the power to appoint a replacement. But with only three weeks left in Masilotti's term, Bush may not do anything, Weisman said.

"The (commission) can function with six people," he said. "The election is close."

Masilotti could not be reached for comment Thursday evening, despite messages left on his cell phone. Earlier Thursday, standing in his Royal Palm Beach insurance office, Masilotti declined to talk about whether he was considering resignation, saying he was advised by his attorneys to stay silent.

"At this time, I'd rather not say anything about that," said an uncharacteristically subdued Masilotti, 50, a politician known to jump to his own defense.

The mercurial Masilotti's almost 20-year rise to political power, which began as Royal Palm Beach mayor, ends in scandal. The FBI probe into Masilotti focuses on a government land deal in southern Martin County, in which Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, pocketed roughly $1.3 million. The profit was shielded through a secret trust, but it came to light in the Masilottis' divorce papers in January.

FEDS AIM TO 'BOX' IN UNION BIG (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell And Neil Graves

The New York Post, October 27, 2006

October 27, 2006 -- The feds have more than 100 boxes of evidence in their racketeering case against Queens Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin, officials said yesterday.

Assistant federal prosecutor Daniel Braun said he gathered "over 100 boxes of documents and other materials" that he'll use as evidence that the fallen labor leader stole $2.2 million from taxpayers and the electricians union.

McLaughlin, 54, who made his first appearance in federal court in Manhattan yesterday, had no comment before Judge Kenneth Karas.

Because of the stacks of evidence, Karas set the next court date for Dec. 14.

McLaughlin, who was booted as president of the New York City Central Labor Council, faces charges for allegedly stealing from the state, his union, his political campaign, contractors and even a Queens Little League, federal prosecutors charged last week.

New York Daily News, October 27, 2006

Indicted labor leader Brian McLaughlin is accused of showering gifts on lady friends, but yesterday he had a peck on the cheek for his wife, Eva, when she dropped into a Manhattan courtroom.

During a brief court appearance yesterday, McLaughlin's attorneys got Manhattan Federal Judge Kenneth Karas to agree to loosen the Queens assemblyman's travel restrictions, letting him go to New Jersey and Connecticut, where he has family.

Previously, he was allowed to travel only within New York.

Next week, McLaughlin's attorneys will get a peek at some 100 boxes of evidence that federal and city investigators compiled during their lengthy probe of the former head of the New York City Central Labor Council.

McLaughlin, dressed in a dark suit and blue tie, declined comment after leaving the courtroom with his wife and attorney Michael Armstrong.

Armstrong is a former federal and Queens prosecutor who was appointed last year by Mayor Bloomberg to serve as chairman of the Commission to Combat Police Corruption.

McLaughlin, 54, is accused of stealing $2.2 million in taxpayer funds to pay for fancy cars, country clubs and a Long Island mansion. He's also accused of looting nearly $100,000 from the bank account of a Queens Little League.

And the feds say he took $61,000 from a contractor to pay for a Mercedes-Benz for his wife. He also allegedly gave gifts - including money - to unnamed lady friends.

Ruleville Chief Pleads Guilty To Extortion, Protecting Drug Dealer (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 27, 2006

OXFORD, Miss. - Federal prosecutors said Ruleville Police Chief Ronald Durelle Robinson pleaded guilty Thursday to an extortion charge, admitting that he took cash for not pursuing drug and gambling charges against a person he thought to be a crack cocaine distributor.

As part of the plea agreement, other federal charges against Robinson will be dropped when he is sentenced within the next 45 to 60 days, said James D. Maxwell II, assistant U.S. attorney for north Mississippi.

Robinson faces up to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and up to three years' supervised release, prosecutors said. He remains free on a $20,000 bond.

Robinson, 46, and Ruleville Assistant Chief Larry Mitchell, 33, were indicted by a federal grand jury on July 25, but the indictments were sealed until the men were arrested Aug. 4 in the Delta town of 2,935.

Robinson and Mitchell were suspended without pay and police Lt. Amos Mitchner was appointed to serve as acting chief.

The indictment says that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack dealers and other people Robinson and Mitchell believed to be distributing crack.

The FBI said Robinson was charged with one additional extortion count and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute. The indictment named Mitchell on one additional extortion count and two counts of attempting to aid in the possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine.

Mitchell is set for trial Jan. 29 in U.S. District Court in Oxford before Judge Glen H. Davidson. Maxwell said he could not disclose whether Robinson is cooperating with prosecutors in the case against Mitchell.

Robinson entered his guilty plea before Davidson.

If convicted, Mitchell faces a maximum 40 years in a federal prison and a $2 million fine on the most serious charge. Before entering his plea, Robinson faced the same possible penalties.

Robinson in 2004 told The Associated Press that his yearlong campaign against drug dealers had led to threats against his life and bribery attempts. At the time, his department was responding to protests by some residents who claimed serious injuries suffered by a drug suspect were the result of police brutality.

Robinson had said the suspect injured himself but "a small group of people" wanted to use the incident to force him out of office and end efforts to rid the town of a serious drug problem.

Texas Murder-For-Hire Convict Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A man was executed Wednesday for initiating a murder-for-hire plot that authorities said led to the fatal stabbings of his parents and an uncle.

The lethal injection of Gregory Summers, 48, came more than seven years after the execution of Andrew Cantu, convicted of taking the $10,000 offer and fatally stabbing Gene and Helen Summers, both 64, and Billy Mack Summers, 60. Their home in Abilene was set on fire after they were attacked and their bodies were found in the rubble.

Asked by Warden Thomas Prasifka if he had a final statement, Summers replied "no." Eight minutes later, at 10:16 p.m. EDT, he was pronounced dead.

Attorneys for Summers tried Wednesday to block the punishment by challenging the constitutionality of the injection method, accusing prosecutors of hiding evidence and raising questions about testimony from a trial witness who implicated Summers.

The U.S. Supreme Court three weeks ago refused to review his case. Three appeals went to the high court late Wednesday, and all were rejected.

"These were real people that we all loved very, very much," Arbie McAliley, the victims' niece, said after witnessing the execution. "Justice was served, we believe in our hearts."

Authorities said the 1990 slayings were the result of Summers' parents' frustration with bailing their son out of his financial problems and Greg Summers' attempt to get $24,000 in life insurance.

"His father had come to the end of his rope with Greg and was starting to cut him off financially," said Kent Sutton, who prosecuted Summers. "Greg was going to inherit everything and that was one of the reasons he wanted the house burned."

Prosecutors also showed how Summers previously collected insurance payoffs from fires at his grandmother's house and a vehicle.

"Greg was pure evil. He'd been bleeding them dry for money over the years, and when he realized he couldn't get any more out of them, he figured he could get their insurance," said Miles LeBlanc, Sutton's prosecutor partner.

"He was so cruel in what he did to them and he needs to pay," said Brenda Steele, who lost her aunt and two uncles. "They loved Greg and they overlooked a lot of things they probably shouldn't have."

Cantu, 31, had denied involvement and blamed the killings on two companions who testified against him.

"We were able to find enough circumstantial evidence to piece together a strong case," LeBlanc said. "Greg Summers earned his conviction."

Summers was the 22nd inmate executed this year in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state. At least three other inmates have execution dates over the next four weeks.

Charges Possible In Skid-row Patient Drop-offs In Los Angeles (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, October 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES — A hospital here is under criminal investigation for possibly dumping of homeless patients on skid row — a practice that the Bush administration says is widespread in the USA and "inhumane."

Los Angeles Police Capt. Andrew Smith says "there's a strong likelihood criminal charges could be filed" against Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center after five patients were brought by ambulance Sunday to the city's drug and crime-infested skid row section.

Philip Mangano, executive director of the U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness, called the alleged dumping "abhorrent ... inhumane and horrific."

He says such actions by hospitals and other institutions have contributed to homelessness problems across the country. Stopping the practice and getting people into stable living situations, he said, are goals of agreements that the council has entered into with 281 cities.

Cities with such 10-year-plans to combat homelessness and find permanent solutions include New York, Chicago, Denver, Miami, San Francisco and San Diego.

Los Angeles does not have such a plan, Mangano said. "Inappropriate discharge" by hospitals puts people on the street, he says, fills up temporary shelters and sends its victims into cycles of hospitalization and arrest that are costly to the public.

"Unfortunately, it's all too common a practice around the country," Mangano says. "It's wrong for the person. It's certainly wrong for our society. ... It's wrong for the taxpayer because the taxpayer is the one who is saddled with that person's recycling over and over through the system."

Examples include workers at a mental hospital in Colorado who were accused in 2003 of dumping a discharged patient out of a wheelchair and onto a sidewalk at a Denver homeless shelter. Hospitals around Riviera Beach, Fla., were accused in 2000 of discharging patients into squalid, filthy motel rooms with little food or assistance.

In Los Angeles, police videotaped the ambulance's arrival and interviewed the patients who said they didn't want to be taken there, Smith said. At least two of the patients had homes, one with family and the other at a convalescent home in Pasadena, he said.

The hospital's president and chief executive officer, John Fenton, issued a statement saying "the allegations ... are unfounded" and asking for a meeting with the city attorney to discuss its discharge practices. Fenton did not return numerous calls from a reporter seeking comment.

City Attorney Rocky Delgadillo says he opened an investigation into the dumping of indigent people on skid row a year ago and that the events Sunday are a significant break in the case.

In March, police released videotapes they said showed a 63-year-old woman dropped off on a skid row street still wearing a hospital gown and slippers. The woman had been a patient at Kaiser Permanente's Bellflower Medical Center. Kaiser officials apologized and promised it would not happen again.

Delgadillo said a range of civil and criminal violations could be brought for discharging patients without adequate planning. He said false imprisonment and dependent-care abuse were among violations that would be considered.

Fenton, in his statement, said the hospital does not have an emergency room and is not covered by a federal law that requires appropriate discharge of patients from emergency care.

Delgadillo called Sunday's incidents "very serious" and said skid row — a 50-square-block area — is a dangerous place to leave anyone.

"I can't think of a more perilous situation than the heart of skid row," he said.

D.C. Jury Acquits Jemal Of Bribery (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Douglas Jemal, one of Washington's most prominent developers, was acquitted yesterday of charges that he bribed a city official to get sweetheart contracts and inflated profits at taxpayers' expense.

The jury in U.S. District Court convicted Jemal of one lesser count of wire fraud. But the panel resoundingly rejected the crux of the government's case, acquitting Jemal and two top lieutenants of his company, Douglas Development Corp., of the more serious charges of conspiracy and bribery.

"God bless you all," a tearful Jemal told jurors when he saw them leaving the courthouse. Giving them hugs, he declared: "Thank you, sweetheart. Thank you, dear."

From the start, Jemal, 63, denied wrongdoing in his dealings with the city. When he was indicted along with son Norman Jemal and leasing agent Blake Esherick in September 2005, Jemal said he was looking forward to the chance to clear his name and theirs after nearly two years of overlapping city and federal investigations.

Just before 3 p.m. yesterday, Jemal stood ramrod-straight in the courtroom as the jury foreman began to read the group's decision. When the foreman said, "Not guilty," on the chief counts, Jemal bent forward, his eyes beginning to water and rimmed with red. All told, he was acquitted of six of seven charges.

Prosecutors said Jemal could face up to 20 years in prison on the wire fraud charge. But under federal sentencing guidelines, his sentence could be much lighter, and he could wind up with just probation.

Known as a maverick developer who helped turn the city's East End near the Verizon Center from run-down storefronts into a vibrant area of housing, restaurants and shops, Jemal has an array of ambitious projects ahead, stretching from downtown to the banks of the Anacostia River in Southeast to Richmond. Now he will return to his daily routine -- and his trademark cowboy boots and jeans, which he had ditched for business attire for court.

He, his son and Esherick had recruited a veritable who's who of preeminent Washington defense lawyers to represent them in the trial that began Sept. 11. The jury acquitted Norman Jemal, the company's vice president, of all charges but found Esherick guilty on the wire fraud count as well as two counts of tax evasion relating to underreporting his income from Jemal. The bribery charges were always considered the most toxic in the case, but Esherick's conviction on the three felony counts is a serious blow, carrying the possibility of significant jail time.

Defense attorneys said they hoped to get the convictions overturned.

"We're relieved, of course," said Reid H. Weingarten, the lead defense attorney for Douglas Jemal. "He was charged with horrible crimes, of ripping off the District -- charges that never should have been brought."

U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said the guilty verdicts against Douglas Jemal and Esherick were a "vindication of a majority of our case." He defended the prosecution, saying, "This was a tough case, but given the serious allegations, we had to bring it."

The wire fraud charge stemmed from a document that Jemal and Esherick falsified and then used as a justification to get a mortgage company to release $430,000 in loan proceeds. The money went to a different business deal than the one specified in the mortgage. The defense contended that Jemal had a right to the money and that no one was hurt.

The prosecution's case focused most heavily on the angle of public corruption -- citing exorbitantly priced leases and invoices that a D.C. government property official arranged for the city to pay Douglas Development from 2001 to 2003. The government said Jemal and his team needed those deals to keep the company's overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices and used phony documents and bribes to get them.

The government's star witness, former deputy director of property management Michael Lorusso, testified that he arranged overpriced deals, costing the city millions, for an impoundment lot in Prince George's County and office space at 77 P St. NE. Lorusso said he also authorized payments for nonexistent work.

Lorusso said that his goal was to enrich Jemal and that as payback Jemal's team gave him $10,000 cash in a humidor, a Rolex, trips to Las Vegas and other gifts. Lorusso pleaded guilty to taking bribes in 2004; he could get a lesser sentence in return for his cooperation.

Defense attorneys said Jemal was fiercely loyal to friends and generous with gifts. But prosecutors Mark H. Dubester and Tim Lynch argued that the gifts came with expectations and said that no reasonable person could believe Jemal would give another man a Rolex -- just to be friends -- a few months after meeting him.

Jurors said they saw no proof that Jemal meant to bribe anyone.

"We went strictly on the evidence, and there was none," said juror Stephanie Vasquez, 20.

Defense attorneys argued that Jemal profited on city deals because he was a good businessman.

In some of the trial's most dramatic moments, Weingarten tried to shred Lorusso's credibility. In one withering exchange, Weingarten got Lorusso to admit that nearly every line of the rÃ©sumÃ© he wrote to get his city job was falsified.

Some jurors said they considered Lorusso a "colossal liar."

"Oh, God -- Lorusso, " said juror Rosanne Goodie, 43. "What could you believe with him?"

A female juror who spoke on condition of anonymity said Jemal seemed to be the victim. "A man in high places will probably have people tend to gravitate toward him who want to use him," she said.

Friends and competitors in the close-knit circles of D.C. real estate welcomed the news that Jemal was cleared of the bribery charges.

"I'm happy for him," said Jim Abdo, a major housing developer. "I think what was driving him crazy was that anybody in the development business doesn't like uncertainty. He had this cloud of uncertainty over him. To have that removed is going to give him a significant peace of mind."

Ernie Jarvis, a managing director in the D.C. office of CB Richard Ellis, said: "I am relieved that Douglas was cleared, and I'm hopeful that he will continue to be a presence in our city as well as the local real estate market."

Jemal will be sentenced April 16 and Esherick on March 15.

During his trial, Jemal went into his office on H Street NW at 8 a.m. and worked for two hours before court. He returned to the office in the evenings, returning phone calls and e-mails to brokers, partners and potential buyers and sellers. A longtime supporter of Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), Jemal is a builder and a manager of 10 million square feet of office, retail, commercial and residential properties in 185 buildings in the region.

"I'm very ecstatic to be judged by a jury of my peers, and I'm happy with the outcome. . . . In the end, I don't even know what it was about," Jemal said.

Before leaving the courthouse grounds, Jemal told jurors that he was glad they got his case, then got big laughs and slaps on the back with his parting joke:

"Let's get together every year around this time."

Intelligence Chairman Urges Leak Inquiry (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has proposed a sweeping inquiry into the possible leak of a classified National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq by a staff member, including an audit of staff telephone records and e-mail to identify unauthorized contacts with news media or messages related to the leaked document.

Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), in a paper outlining procedures for the inquiry, said a committee counsel could pursue "any additional information beyond that involving the NIE if it related to improper conduct with regard to classified information by any member of the committee staff."

At issue is the leak of selected contents, harmful to the Bush administration, of a classified National Intelligence Estimate from April titled "Trends of Global Terrorism." The New York Times first published a story about the NIE, with the headline "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat," on Sept. 23 on its Web site and again in its Sept. 24 print edition.

The intelligence committee did not receive a copy of the NIE until Sept. 21, a day after Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), a member of the panel, called the Democratic staff about it. A staff member, Larry Hanauer, arranged for the document's author -- the Office of the Director of National Intelligence -- to deliver a copy to Tierney after it was posted on the panel's classified site.

A Republican member of the intelligence committee, Rep. Ray LaHood (Ill.), wrote Hoekstra to demand an investigation because the story was published two days after a Democratic staff member obtained the NIE.

Hanauer, who has been suspended from the committee by the chairman, signed an sworn affidavit this week saying he had nothing to do with the disclosure.

Murder Trial Juror Booted For Invoking Numerology (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The jury was trying to decide a high-profile murder case when the trouble began. One of the jurors brought numerology into the debate -- a mystical system said to divine truths from a person's birth date and from the sum of the letters in a person's name.

But numerology is nowhere in the jury instructions at D.C. Superior Court. And yesterday, after hearing from the woman's frustrated fellow jurors, Judge Wendell P. Gardner Jr. kicked her off the panel.

An alternate juror was summoned back to the courthouse and is expected to join the jury to begin deliberations anew today in the trial of two men accused of killing 14-year-old Jahkema "Princess" Hansen.

It was the strangest twist yet in a trial that has had more than its share since it began almost a month ago -- almost three years after Hansen was fatally shot in the Sursum Corda housing complex, allegedly because she was a witness to a killing. In addition to talking about numbers, the juror had declared that she was the savior, there to force a mistrial.

From a prosecution witness's apparently testifying while high on marijuana to a juror finding herself followed home by a key figure in the case, the trial has not lacked the unexpected.

Leaving the courtroom after she was dismissed, the juror said she could not say anything because of "the judge's order."

Judges rarely take such steps but can do so when jurors refuse to deliberate or, as in this case, insist on introducing information that wasn't part of the evidence.

A couple of years ago, the judge in a drug-gang murder case in U.S. District Court ousted a juror who refused to deliberate.

But what happened in the trial of Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward was more bizarre.

From the outset, it appeared that the jury's discussions took an acrimonious turn. "How do you have a juror changed," the foreman said in a note to the judge on Monday, a couple of hours into the deliberations.

And then late Wednesday, after the jury had twice reported that it could not reach an agreement, the judge got a note explaining the reason: "One of the jurors refuses to comply with your instructions. Being insulting and argumentative. Will not base statement on fact pertaining to evidence. Making statements of their hidden agenda."

The note led to yesterday's unusual inquiry.

Interviewed by the judge one by one in open court, the jurors said the woman spoke of the significance of everything from dates of birth to the pronunciation of names and the color of people's clothing.

"She was always straying from whatever we were talking about," one juror told the judge.

"It was all made up. It was all a fabrication," another juror said.

When the judge called the juror in question, identified only as Juror No. 15, she spoke so softly that the court stenographer a few feet away had trouble hearing her.

She was not asked what she had said, and she did not volunteer having said much of anything. Asked whether numerology had come up, she said some jurors had been reading the horoscopes that morning. And asked whether birthdates had been discussed, she suggested that they were part of a bona fide discussion of the evidence, contradicting the accounts of almost all of the other jurors.

After questioning the jurors, Gardner scoffed at the woman's statements. "I don't believe one whit of what she's telling me," he said.

With that juror gone, the jury is supposed to start deliberations from scratch, looking anew at the testimony and other evidence laid out over three weeks by the prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Deborah Sines and Michelle Jackson.

Hansen was killed after seeing Ward kill a drug dealer, prosecutors alleged. Ward feared that Hansen -- his sometime sex interest -- would tell police what she had seen, so he hired his friend Thompson to kill Hansen for $8,000, prosecutors said.

Just after 11 p.m. on Jan. 23, 2004, Thompson allegedly burst into a rowhouse in the 1100 block of First Terrace NW and shot Hansen in the back of head.

Ward's and Thompson's were familiar faces in the insular environs of Sursum Corda, where Ward was known as Corleone and Thompson was known as Frank Nitti, after the feared accomplice to Al Capone.

Prosecutors played up the nicknames to the jury, while Ward's attorney, Steven D. Kupferberg, and Thompson's attorney, Rudolph Acree, dismissed the labels as hype.

What was undisputed was that a 14-year-old, living a very adult life, died in harrowing fashion that night.

Malvo Talks With Tucson Detectives (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

Lee Boyd Malvo met yesterday with police from Tucson, Ariz., who are investigating whether Malvo and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad were responsible for a golf course shooting there in March 2002, Malvo's attorney said.

DOJ_NMG_0086976

Malvo spent about two hours speaking with Tucson detectives at the Montgomery County Correctional Facility in Boyds, attorney William Brennan said. Malvo, already serving a life term in Virginia for one of the October 2002 sniper shootings, is in Maryland awaiting sentencing for six sniper killings in Montgomery County.

Mr. Brennan would not discuss the substance of the meeting.

Tucson police have long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, killing of Jerry Taylor, 60, who died from a single shot fired from long range as he practiced on the Fred Enke Golf Course. The case has never been conclusively tied to Muhammad or Malvo.

Capt. Bill Richards, commander of the violent crimes division with Tucson police, declined to comment yesterday, except to say that "we do feel that in the very near future, we'll be able to discuss things ... in a broader sense."

After his arrest Oct. 24, 2002, at a Frederick County, Md., highway rest stop, Malvo told authorities that he had shot a senator on a golf course in Arizona. Mr. Taylor was not a senator. Muhammad and Malvo were visiting Muhammad's older sister at the time, but police didn't have enough evidence to prove they were responsible for Mr. Taylor's death.

In addition to the 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington area, the two men are suspects in earlier shootings that year in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and Washington state and are reportedly linked to shootings in Florida, Texas and California.

Both were convicted of separate Virginia killings in 2003. Muhammad was sentenced to death while Malvo was given a life prison term.

They were sent to Montgomery County last year to stand trial in six killings. Muhammad was convicted in May, a case that included testimony against him by Malvo. Earlier this month, Malvo formally pleaded guilty and is scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 9.

Mr. Brennan said he planned to contact authorities in other jurisdictions where Muhammad and Malvo are accused of sniper shootings to discuss a larger plea deal that would allow Malvo to serve his life sentence in federal prison.

Virginia prosecutors, however, oppose such a deal.

A County Of Bad Ol' Boys (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

HOW bad is Cocke County's lawless reputation?

So bad that its tourism and economic development chief, Donald Hurst, likes to kick off out-of-town business meetings with a self-deprecating joke. All of the visiting Cocke County officials, he tells his audience, are right here in the building — so "rest assured, your home is safe."

To many Tennesseans, Cocke County is the place their parents warned them about, the butt of hillbilly jokes, the last redoubt of an old, untamed Appalachia. For decades this poor and dramatically beautiful area, north of Great Smoky Mountains National Park, was a haven for moonshiners and bootleggers who evaded federal tax agents by hiding in its rugged hills and hollows.

It was also known for its brothels and chop shops, its illegal bars and gambling, its shakedowns and drugs and stadium-sized cockfight pits — and its rampant public corruption. There was a time when people called it "Little Chicago."

And though other mountain communities have seen their wild days lapse into the innocuous category of "colorful past," Cocke County seems doomed to repeat the sins that have long defined it.

In recent months, a state and federal corruption probe has been making familiar headlines here, flushing out the latest round of dirty cops, brothel owners and incorrigible outlaws whom locals call "tush hogs" — a name they also use for wild boar.

County Mayor Iliff McMahan Jr., first elected in 2002 on a promise to attract tourists and new business, hopes this investigation is the final chapter of a long, troubled history.

After all, the Little Chicago nickname has long faded, and moonshining, a victim of increasingly lax Southern liquor laws, has been reduced to the status of a hobby.

DOJ_NMG_0086977

And yet the trouble continues, competing with the good news McMahan and Hurst are spreading about their inexpensive, underdeveloped and untrammeled county — the place their tourism campaign extols as the "real" Smoky Mountains.

"People think we're all barefooted and have three teeth and are playing banjo music," McMahan said. "We do have a tarnished reputation when it comes to public service …

[but] there are a lot of good, Christian people who live here. We are a law-abiding, God-

fearing community."

Jeramy Hux, the owner of a local mountaineering shop, said he hoped the probe would finally break what he called the "good-old-boy web" that had given the county such a bad name.

"It's about time," he said.

But there is also a notable lack of enthusiasm for the investigation, even among some law-abiding residents. Once again, they say, it seems like the federal government is picking on little Cocke County.

Robert Dameron, 64, a retired truck driver, said the FBI should find better things to do. "I don't think [the corruption] is as bad as they think," he said. "They've got that everywhere."

The mayor — who counts a few illicit whiskey makers among his forebears — said a wariness of federal power was deeply ingrained here. In the old days, McMahan said, moonshiners were rarely considered criminals — just people trying to feed their families. When they were busted by federal "revenuers," those families often went hungry.

In the 1920s and '30s, state bureaucrats assembling land for the national park created more bad blood when they pressured hundreds of families to leave their mountain homes. During World War II, the Tennessee Valley Authority moved others off some of the county's best farmland to create Douglas Lake, part of the authority's vast hydropower system.

"We here in Cocke County have always felt the federal government has taken every effort to kick our butt that they possibly could," McMahan said.

ON a pretty day, the Cocke County countryside feels more like heaven than a notorious den of iniquity. Mountains roll to the horizon, clad in green swaths of hemlock and pine. Three rivers — the Pigeon, the French Broad and the Nolichucky — rush through lush, oak-strewn bottomlands. Small farmers grow tomatoes, grass for hay, and a little tobacco.

According to the 2000 census, 22.5% of Cocke County's 34,000 residents live in poverty. The county seat, Newport, is home to 7,000, with a quaint if dowdy downtown and a few suburban amenities: a Ruby Tuesday restaurant, a Lowe's home improvement store.

This is, supporters say, a typical rural county, no better or worse than any other. To some extent, statistics bear them out: In 2005, Cocke County logged about 77 crimes per 1,000 residents. The rate was higher than those reported by nearby Jefferson and Grainger counties, but lower than that of adjacent Sevier County, where tourists flock to miniature golf courses in Gatlinburg, and Dolly Parton's Dollywood theme park in Pigeon Forge.

The federal government launched its investigation in 2001, naming it Operation Rose Thorn. Since then, seven officers from the Newport police and county sheriff's departments have been convicted of crimes that include conspiracy to distribute cocaine, attempted money laundering, perjury, witness tampering, and stealing money from illegal immigrants.

At least 10 other Cocke County residents have been prosecuted on charges including cocaine sales and interstate theft. Brothels and suspected chop shops have been raided without much input from local authorities — presumably because state and federal agencies didn't trust them.

Former Chief Sheriff's Deputy Patrick Taylor, second-in-command at the department, pleaded guilty to conspiring to traffic in stolen goods. He bought what he thought was $9,000 in stolen NASCAR-themed tank tops, hats and other clothing from undercover agents, and planned to sell the merchandise at country fairs out of a deep-fried-onion stand, according to federal prosecutors. He is expected to be sentenced in November.

In court documents, prosecutors accused Taylor of other crimes for which he was not charged. They said he had extorted money from bars, coercing them to buy liquor from the package store he ran with his wife. And they said he had protected a business that supplied bar owners with illegal video poker machines.

Sheriff D.C. Ramsey — Taylor's uncle — resigned in January after 2005 court filings showed he was under investigation on suspicion of receiving payoffs from gambling interests. He has not been charged.

Then there was the Del Rio Cockfight Pit, with enough bleachers to accommodate 500 fans.

Cockfighting had been a felony in Tennessee until 1990, when it was downgraded to a misdemeanor by Cocke County's state representative at the time, Ronnie Davis. (Davis was imprisoned for taking part in a fake-passport scheme in 2004.)

Around the same time, Dist. Atty. Gen. Al Schmutzer raided the pit, but it soon resumed business. Last year, Schmutzer returned with a contingent of heavily armed state and federal agents and issued citations to more than 140 spectators and participants.

Witnesses cooperating with the FBI said as much as $30,000 in wagers would change hands over a single fight — and pits like the Del Rio held dozens of fights in one day. Breeders and fans came from surrounding states and filled up hotels and restaurants, generating thousands of dollars for a historically depressed economy.

They were also upholding what many here see as a proud symbol of their Appalachian heritage. But Schmutzer said the raid was about more than stamping out an old country pastime. "You can't have something going on that's illegal and notorious in your community and expect people to respect the law," he said.

After the raid, Schmutzer was surprised when some locals complained that the young people wouldn't have much to do now.

"You'd a thought we'd raided the Boys & Girls Club," he said.

HURST, the head of an economic development group called the Cocke County Partnership, smiled wearily when discussing the investigation. At one point, he compared the county's recurring issues to the movie "Groundhog Day."

Jimmie Frank Hill, 76, a regular at Newport's downtown barbershop, remembers the 1930s: riding as a child in a van, sitting on a blanket covering his father's cases of illegal whiskey. He talks about the brothel his father built and ran, and the gangsters from Chicago and Detroit who would sometimes hide out there.

In the mountain community of Del Rio, a man who asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation recalled his experiences in the 1960s, when truckers passing through town were considered easy bait. While the truckers were occupied at the brothels, a few men would offer boys $5 to puncture their tires — a boon for the tire distributor.

Schmutzer, who recently retired, said that when he was first elected in 1974, "Cocke County was pretty well wide-open."

It was easy to find a drink of hard liquor in bars despite the fact that it was banned. Prostitution was out of control. Back then, the women were supplied by an organized crime gang from St. Louis. Many of the brothels billed themselves as truck stops, and the prostitutes cooed over CB radios in code, enticing men with $50 "cups of coffee." A few of the places did not bother to install diesel pumps.

Schmutzer eventually drummed the more organized criminal elements out of Cocke County's prostitution business. The brothels crept back into service, although some of them have been shuttered again in the recent probe.

The most extensive chronicle of the county's troubles, focusing largely on the last four decades, was compiled last year by J.J. Stambaugh, a reporter at the Knoxville News Sentinel. Titled Cocke County Confidential, published online at http://www.knoxnews.comunder the header news, it runs to more than 50 pages when printed out.

Stambaugh offers a few plausible explanations for Cocke County's troubles. First came Prohibition, which showed moonshiners there was serious money to be made outside the law. Later, World War II brought an influx of GIs to east Tennessee — and entrepreneurs willing to slake their thirst for booze and sex.

The timeline shows that two Cocke County sheriffs have faced felony indictments since 1970. It describes dumped bodies, moonshiners-turned-pot growers, and mysterious and questionable shootings involving police. And it limns a tangled, multi-generational web of local characters — some of whom are the focus of the current probe.

MAYOR McMahan may understand why some residents are annoyed by the federal investigation. But he doesn't agree with them. Public corruption, he said, is a very real problem in Cocke County.

"It's a culture," he said. "And how do you change it? It's like eating an elephant. You do it one bite at a time."

McMahan, 55, was born in Cocke County — a place, he will remind you, that was named after an Independence-era politician, not a fighting rooster. But he spent much of his life in Washington, D.C., where he worked as a professional stage actor and business executive. He returned home to care for his ailing father in 1995, his accent half-citified, his Cocke County alliances few.

During his first bid for election, McMahan said, he received death threats. These days, he keeps a pistol strapped to his ankle — "because you never know," he said.

After taking office, McMahan saw controversy visit even the most ordinary totems of small-town life. In 2004, the local United Way was kicked out of the national organization, the United Way of America, over questionable bookkeeping. Last year, the county's Fraternal Order of Eagles chapter was decertified by its international parent organization because it had never given any money to charity. Its membership list included many of the targets of Rose Thorn.

Yet in his successful reelection campaign this year, McMahan did not make corruption an issue. Realistically, he said, there was little he could do about it, because the sheriff is an independently elected office.

It also seemed like bad politics: Too many voters, he figured, were kin to someone caught up in it all.

James R. "Russ" Dedrick, the U.S. attorney for Tennessee's Eastern District, declined to speak at length about Operation Rose Thorn. He said he would be more forthcoming when the case wrapped up, in about a month.

He did say, however, that new leadership — including a newly elected sheriff — seemed intent on putting the old ways behind them.

Sgt. Jonathan Morgan said the culture of his department was changing under Sheriff Claude Strange, a former state trooper.

In the last few years, Morgan, 29, has given the FBI evidence about three of the deputies prosecuted in Rose Thorn. His reward under then-Sheriff Ramsey was a transfer from drug investigations to night patrol — in effect, a trip to the doghouse.

Morgan never heard anyone in the department call it retaliation. And he can't say that he blames the ex-sheriff for all of the trouble.

"I don't know if 'blame' is the word," Morgan said. "It's just tradition."

Woman Says She Didn't Kill Social Worker (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, October 27, 2006, 6:04 Am Edt

Long Island Newsday, October 27, 2006

In a jailhouse news conference that she had requested, Renee Terrell said Christopher Luttrell alone was responsible for the death of Boni Frederick, 67, of Morganfield.

"I didn't do anything to her, and I am sorry for her," Terrell, 33, told the Henderson Gleaner. "I guess I hang out with the wrong people.

"I didn't want her hurt. I even said I didn't want her hurt. It wasn't my intention for anybody to get hurt."

Luttrell, 23, told reporters gathered at the Henderson police station on Wednesday that he killed Frederick. An autopsy revealed she died of blunt and sharp force trauma.

Terrell said she was in the house when Frederick was killed but that she didn't see or hear the attack. The couple is accused of taking Terrell's 10-month-old son, Saige, after Frederick had brought the infant for a visit with the mother.

The baby is now in custody of foster parents.

Terrell has four children, and none are in her custody, according to a court document. The other children are ages 14, 9 and 7.

The couple face felony murder, kidnapping, robbery and theft charges.

Terrell said she and Luttrell had developed a plan to take her son, but that the plan didn't include hurting anyone.

"It wasn't until my son got there that I chickened out," she said. "I started thinking better of it and didn't want to do anything to get in trouble with my son," she said.

But a criminal complaint filed with Henderson court officials says that on the night Terrell was arrested, she told police that she had "hit Boni three or four times with the frying pan."

DOJ_NMG_0086980

Luttrell has also claimed in statements to detectives that the woman participated in the killing. He told police that on the day of the killing, he hid in a bedroom closet but kept the door cracked, the court documents said.

Luttrell told police that he, too, used the iron frying pan to beat Frederick and that both he and Terrell hit her with their fists, the court documents said.

FBI agents arrested Terrell and Luttrell on Oct. 19 in a trailer where they sought shelter near Godfrey, Ill., about 30 miles north of St. Louis.

The baby had been removed from Terrell's custody when he was 13 days old because of neglect, police said. Police also said the courts were in the process of permanently removing Terrell's parental rights before Frederick was slain on Oct. 16.

Legal Eagles On Lookout For Fraudulent Contractors (KATC)

KATC-TV, October 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Fraudulent contractors, unlicensed contractors and the bilking of homeowners are reaching epidemic proportions, prompting federal and state agencies to beef up regulatory and criminal enforcement against unscrupulous businesses.

The problems may have not hit their peak, with Road Home money still to be handed out, state and federal agencies said.

The law and license enforcement agencies are coordinating efforts to fine or jail bad contractors.

"The FBI and the U.S. attorney are fundamentally committed to ensure (the use of) recovery (money) is free of fraud, and we are cooperating to include contractors who engage in fraudulent activity," said James Bernazzani, FBI special agent in charge of Louisiana.

Bernazzani said that the disbursement of Road Home loans _ federal money _ gives the FBI jurisdiction, and any contractor stealing or fraudulently taking the money will be high on the FBI's radar.

"If you are a contractor fraudulently (taking) recovery money from homeowners, the FBI will take a very, very hard look at it," he said.

As Road Home money through the Louisiana Recovery Authority begins to be disbursed, the FBI and the Louisiana attorney general's office doubt complaints against contractors have approached the peak.

"I think eventually our active complaints will exceed 1,000 any given month," said Charles Marceaux, executive director of the Louisiana State Licensing Board for Contractors.

Marceaux said he expects that by the end of the year, his board will have held more than 800 administrative hearings since hurricanes Katrina and Rita. In past years, citation hearings have been about 300 to 400 a year, he added.

The citations are for being unlicensed, failing to perform as contracted or performing shoddy work. If egregious enough, the contractor's actions are forwarded to the attorney general's enforcement division, which will decided whether criminal action should be taken.

Isabel Wingerter, director of the general consumer protection section for the attorney general, said she would have expected a handful of consumer complaints in years past.

"We've never seen anything like this," Wingerter said.

Most of the criminal cases involve misappropriations of funds and theft by fraud, she said.

As of Oct. 16, 194 cases had been referred to the attorney general's criminal division for investigation, 65 arrest warrants for theft or fraud had been issued and there were 140 ongoing criminal investigations against contractors. Additionally, 10 civil unfair trade practice investigations involving 140 contractors were pending, Jennifer Cluck, a spokeswoman for the attorney general, said.

Between contractors seeking licenses and consumers making complaints or seeking information, the contractor's board is fielding 80,000 calls a month.

Before Katrina, there had been about 15,000 licensed residential or commercial contractors or registered home-improvement contractors. Now, there are more than 20,000. Marceaux said that since Katrina, 5,397 new applications have been received.

DOJ_NMG_0086981

Commercial licenses are the largest category at 2,648. Before last year's storms, there were 47 licensed mold remediating contractors. There have been 256 applications and licenses issued for mold contracts since the storms.

Marceaux said he's seeking support for legislation to stiffen the fines the board can levy and make it more difficult for a contractor to abandon a project.

Cluck urged consumers to use the attorney general's hotline, 1-800-351-4889, to make complaints. The phone bank is staffed from Monday through Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., but messages can be left anytime for a staffer to return a consumers call.

The FBI's top agent said reports of potential criminal activity can also be reported by calling 1-800-CALLFBI. He was adamant, however, that the hotline is not for generic consumer complaints.

"Please don't call because you're peeved at your contractor," he said, but rather when there is obvious criminal activity. Marceaux asked that consumers file complaints through the licensing board's Web site.

New Orleans May Hire A Public Watchdog (NSDY/AP)

By Becky Bohrer, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- City leaders are pressing for the hiring of a corruption watchdog to send a message that New Orleans -- with its long and colorful reputation for graft and thievery -- can be trusted with the billions of dollars in federal aid pouring in to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

"We have a moral obligation to lead with integrity," said City Councilwoman Shelley Midura, who is among those pushing for the creation of the office of inspector general. "This is something the people are crying for."

At least five of the council's seven members have signed on to the idea, set for a vote Nov. 2.

Some have argued that under the current plan, the inspector general would be too weak, because the watchdog would have no subpoena power. Others are debating whether the inspector general should be a New Orleans insider or an outsider.

Also, Mayor Ray Nagin has come out against a proposal to make city contractors help pay for the office. And decision makers in this cash-strapped city have not yet settled on a budget for the inspector general.

Councilman Arnie Fielkow argued that money shouldn't matter: "I don't think the community can afford NOT to do this right now."

New Orleans has been dogged for years by cronyism, self-dealing, one-hand-washes-the-other politics and wink-and-a-grin thievery. At least two people have pleaded guilty as part of a federal investigation of corruption at the city transit authority under Nagin's predecessor, Mayor Marc Morial, and three Morial associates are awaiting trial on charges they orchestrated a plan to rake money from a lucrative contract. Morial has not been accused of wrongdoing.

Nagin's administration has been largely scandal-free. But stories of wasteful spending, plodding bureaucracy and fraud have dogged the recovery at all levels: Federal officials have been criticized for awarding no-bid contracts and paying more than $1 billion in aid to the undeserving; a state legislator has been under scrutiny because his relatives got a lucrative deal to sell trailers to FEMA; and a parish councilman in a New Orleans suburb resigned in October under indictment on charges he extorted money from the owners of a hurricane debris disposal site.

New Orleans pollster Silas Lee said he believes the Big Easy's reputation as politically corrupt is overblown, suggesting other major cities such as Chicago and New York are just as bad or worse. Still, he said an inspector general is not a bad idea, if the appointee is given the authority and the resources to do the job.

Since 1998, the inspector general's office for Miami-Dade County has led inquiries resulting in over 160 arrests and uncovered more than $50 million in questionable spending, Inspector General Chris Mazzella said.

In Baltimore, Andrew Clemmons' office received 73 complaints in his first year as inspector general, a figure he expects to at least triple this year.

"If you get the right person, they're going to be active," said Roland Malan, executive director of the Association of Inspectors General. "And there will be times the city is embarrassed and times the city is really glad that person is there."

In New Orleans, the idea is to have a politically independent office. Anyone employed by the city within the past five years would be excluded from consideration.

DOJ_NMG_0086982

That is a sore point with the leader of the local chapter of the NAACP, Danatus King, who warned that that would disqualify people with knowledge of the city's inner workings.

But Malan said hiring an outsider would remove any suspicion that the watchdog is beholden politically to someone.

"You need someone who's on a white horse with an impeccable reputation and who's willing to stand up to anybody when it comes to the organization," he said.

Reprimand For A Justice Who Met With Inmates (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

A special panel of the Washington Supreme Court made up of nine substitute judges reprimanded one of the court's justices yesterday for visiting a facility that holds sexually violent predators.

The panel ruled that the justice, Richard B. Sanders, had "created an appearance of partiality" by questioning inmates and accepting documents from them at the McNeil Island Special Commitment Center on a visit there in January 2003. The center holds sex offenders who have completed their criminal sentences but who the courts have found are likely to engage in predatory acts of sexual violence.

A case concerning the constitutionality of the state law under which the inmates were committed was before the court at the time.

In an interview, Justice Sanders said his visit had been useful and appropriate. Judges in Washington are encouraged to visit prisons and similar facilities, he said, and he received continuing judicial education credit for his 2003 visit.

"The whole objective of this facility is supposed to be to treat the prisoners," he said, "and I thought it was a valuable opportunity to ask the prisoners how they were doing. I thought I gained from the experience, and now I'm being punished for it."

The sanction was admonishment, the mildest available punishment.

Justice Sanders, who ultimately disqualified himself from the pending case, said nothing he had learned could have affected the decision.

He added that the prosecutors who complained about his visit had been eager to have him off the case. "They probably think I am too inclined to uphold the rights of the accused," Justice Sanders said.

Washington law requires lower-court judges to sit in when complaints concerning Supreme Court justices reach that high court. In other states and in the federal system, judges sometimes hear disciplinary cases concerning colleagues on their own courts.

Neither choice is appealing, said Stephen M. Gillers, an expert in legal ethics at New York University's law school. Lower-court judges substituting on the state's highest court may fear retaliation from high court judges, Professor Gillers said, and other justices may be disinclined to offend a colleague.

Justice Sanders's visit was prompted by an invitation from several inmates. Other justices considered attending but decided against it. One of them, Justice Faith Ireland, later testified before the state's Commission on Judicial Conduct that she had warned Justice Sanders not to go. "I said, 'Richard, don't do this,' " Justice Ireland testified.

During the visit, Justice Sanders spoke with some 20 inmates, one of them involved in the pending case.

Last year, the commission ruled against Justice Sanders, saying he had failed to promote public confidence in the judiciary.

"The commission strongly encourages judges to visit correctional institutions," the ruling said. But "if a tour is sponsored or originated by prisoners, prison rights advocates or other nonjudicial groups," it continued, judges need to be alert to possible conflicts of interest.

The special panel unanimously affirmed the commission's ruling.

"It was clear," Judge C. Kenneth Grosse of the Washington State Court of Appeals wrote for the panel, "that there was a substantial basis and expectation that Justice Sanders would be in contact with possible litigants who had pending litigation before the court and that this contact would be viewed as improper."

Professor Gillers said the court had ruled correctly.

DOJ_NMG_0086983

"What Justice Sanders is charged with doing is not even debatably acceptable," he said. "Talking to a litigant about a matter within the scope of litigation is wholly out of bounds, and it's the job of the judge to police that."

A lawyer for Justice Sanders, Kurt M. Bulmer, said the ruling left judges with no clear guidance and would discourage them from worthwhile visits.

"You make them afraid to become involved in the process," Mr. Bulmer said. "In these sorts of visits, it's commonplace for judges at all levels to talk to the residents or prisoners. Otherwise, all you get is a walk-through."

Getty Tightens Acquisitions Policy (LAT)

By Christopher Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

Under growing international global pressure after decades of buying artifacts that might have been looted, the Getty Museum dramatically has tightened its acquisition standards.

The move is not retroactive -- if it were, the museum would have to relinquish scores of treasured ancient items from its galleries and storerooms -- but some authorities say it's a turning point in a global confrontation between curators and archeologists over the way museums do business.

With this move, two experts said, the Getty is essentially taking responsibility for making sure an item's recent history is clean, instead of challenging critics to prove it's dirty.

"It's a rethinking of the whole issue of the burden of proof," said Malcolm Bell, a University of Virginia archeology professor and co-director of U.S. excavations at Morgantina, Italy.

The Getty chose 1970 as its threshold date because that's when the United Nations gave its blessing to a convention aimed at preventing illicit movement of cultural property. Although the measure had little immediate effect on the habits of major American museums, several major institutions in Britain adopted standards along the same lines in the past decade. The University of Pennsylvania's art museum has won plaudits from archeologists for taking a similarly conservative stance, but until now none of this nation's foremost museums had signed on.

"We're trying to do what we believe is right," said Getty Museum Director Michael Brand, who added that the move had no direct connection with the ongoing trial of former Getty curator Marion True -- whom Italian prosecutors accuse of knowingly receiving looted items -- or Italian cultural officials' pending demand for the return of 52 items in the Getty collection.

"I suspect that they'll be happy to hear about this, but it's not something we've discussed with them at all," Brand said.

The Getty's trustees, who approved the policy change Monday, "are really taking a very principled stand," said Patty Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePauw University and president of the Lawyers Committee for Cultural Heritage Preservation, based in Washington, D.C.

She predicted that the move would set an example for other institutions. Although New York's influential Metropolitan Museum of Art made headlines worldwide in February when it agreed to return 21 items demanded by Italy, including a prized vase known as the Euphronios Krater, the museum has resisted calls to change its acquisition standards, which match those of the Association of Art Museum Directors.

Both endorse antiquities acquisitions so long as there's no proof of impropriety and the works have been documented for at least 10 years.

Gerstenblith dismissed the 10-year standard as "inadequate," and Bell put it this way: "The reformers are at the gates, and the Met is pouring boiling oil on them. . . . The Getty is recognizing the moral problem, and the Met will have to come to that too."

Met spokesman Harold Holzer sees the issue differently.

"We're not contemplating any change in our policy," he said Thursday. "If you choose one date as your watershed date, it doesn't mean you're any more vigilant than you were before, and the Met considers itself extremely diligent."

Furthermore, Holzer said, the Getty's move "doesn't address the idea of what you do in the case of a fugitive masterpiece that's separated from its original site and may not be traceable back . . . . Does that mean you relegate it to oblivion forever?"

Throughout the 20th century and into the 21st, as major museums scrambled to build collections from the ancient world, curators and directors argued that an antiquity was fair game so long as nobody could prove it had been looted.

Since such evidence is extremely rare, this left museums to enjoy the benefit of the doubt. In the 1980s and '90s, the Getty spent tens of millions of dollars to build an antiquities collection of more than 44,000 items. Although the Getty tightened its standards in 1995 to bar acquisitions that were undocumented before that year, many critics continued to count it among the Met, Boston's Museum of Fine Arts and other institutions with long histories of buying antiquities with misty histories from shadowy dealers.

Under the new policy, the Getty will require at least one of these three conditions:

-- "Documentation or substantial evidence" that the piece entered the U.S. by Nov. 17, 1970, and "that there is no reason to suspect it was illegally exported from its country of origin."

-- Documentation or substantial evidence that the item was out of its original country by 1970 and that it has been or will be legally imported to the U.S.

-- Documentation or substantial evidence that the item was legally exported from its original country after 1970 and that it has been or will be legally imported to the U.S.

InterMune Will Pay $37 Million To Resolve U.S. Probe (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Margaret Cronin Fisk

Bloomberg, October 27, 2006

Oct. 26 (Bloomberg) -- InterMune Inc., maker of a treatment for rare bone and immune system disorders, will pay $36.9 million to settle U.S. claims it illegally marketed the drug for unapproved uses and caused false claims for reimbursement from government health programs.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office said InterMune sold the drug, called Actimmune, mostly for prescriptions to treat pulmonary fibrosis, a fatal lung disorder with no cure that affects 83,000 Americans. InterMune distributed misleading information to doctors and patients claiming the drug could prolong survival knowing the company's studies failed to show significant benefits, prosecutors said in a statement.

``This settlement sends a clear message to the pharmaceutical industry that the Justice Department will not tolerate these deceptive and illegal marketing practices," said Assistant U.S. Attorney General Peter Keisler in a statement.

While doctors are free to prescribe any drug to treat illnesses regardless of FDA approvals, drugmakers are prohibited from promoting medicines for unapproved uses. In the past few years, prosecutors have been cracking down on the practice. Pfizer Inc. agreed to pay more than $430 million in 2004 to settle charges that a Warner-Lambert unit promoted the epilepsy drug Neurontin for other uses.

False Claims Act

InterMune will pay $30.2 million to resolve charges it violated the False Claims Act by causing fraudulent claims to be filed to federal health insurance programs for Actimmune. The claims weren't eligible for reimbursement because the drug was used for purposes not approved by the U.S. Food & Drug Administration. InterMune will pay an additional $6.7 million to state health insurance programs.

InterMune Chief Executive Officer Dan Welch said during a conference call today that the improper marketing practices were actions of former employees.

``We are very happy to put this matter behind us," he said.

The Brisbane, California-based company recorded a $6.9 million charge in addition to the $30 million charge it announced in July in connection with the settlement, he said.

InterMune will pay the $36.9 million plus five percent interest over five years, with the first annual installment of $5 million to be paid this year, Welch said.

Two Years

DOJ_NMG_0086985

The U.S. agreed to defer for two years criminal prosecution against InterMune for one count of violating the Food, Drug and Cosmetics Act. The deferment is contingent upon InterMune strengthening compliance policies and cooperating with investigators, the government statement said.

Actimmune is approved for infections associated with an immune disorder called chronic granulomatous disease, an inherited childhood affliction, and for treating severe osteopetrosis, a rare congenital childhood disorder in which the bones become overly dense.

Allegations of improper marketing of drugs for unapproved uses have sparked civil product liability and racketeering suits against some drug companies.

``These companies pay doctors $100,000 a year to go around and tell other doctors how great this drug is to prescribe for people it hasn't been approved," said Patrick Burns, of Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington group that tracks fraud lawsuits.

In December, Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to pay $36 million to settle an off-label marketing case involving its osteoporosis drug Evista. The government said Eli Lilly was promoting the drug for breast cancer prevention and reduction in cardiovascular risks.

Philadelphia Inquiry

The Indianapolis-based company has said the U.S. Attorney in Philadelphia is investigating marketing and promotion of its antipsychotic medication Zyprexa. Johnson & Johnson announced in March that the same prosecutor was investigating its marketing practices involving a similar drug called Risperdal.

Eli Lilly and New Brunswick, New Jersey-based Johnson & Johnson have denied allegations of improper marketing.

InterMune shares fell 3 cents to $22.93 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading

The case is U.S. v InterMune Inc., 06-00707, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Biotech Company Settles Off-label Marketing Claim (MERCN)

By Steve Johnson

The San Jose Mercury News, October 27, 2006

A Bay Area biotech company, InterMune, agreed Thursday to pay $36.9 million to settle a federal investigation into claims it promoted one of its drugs for an unapproved purpose despite evidence the drug was ineffective for that use.

Under the settlement announced by the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco., InterMune of Brisbane was charged with promoting its drug Actimmune ``with intent to defraud or mislead," a felony under the federal Food Drug and Cosmetic Act.

But the U.S. Attorney's office will dismiss the charge in two years if InterMune complies with laws against so-called off-label marketing, which means promoting drugs for uses beyond what was approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

``This settlement sends a clear message to the pharmaceutical industry that the Justice Department will not tolerate these deceptive and illegal marketing practices," according to statement issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In its settlement agreement, InterMune said it did not contest the claim that ``one or more former InterMune employees violated federal criminal law."

InterMune spokeswoman Pam Lord added that the allegations don't involve any current employees and that the company has been working to reform its drug-marketing practices.

As part of the settlement, InterMune will have five years to pay the money. The company in July announced it was creating a $30 million reserve to settle the case.

Actimmune has been approved by the FDA for treating a bone disorder and a condition that makes people prone to infections. But prosecutors accused InterMune of also promoting it in 2002 and early 2003 as useful for patients with idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis, or IPF, a potentially fatal lung disease for which there is no federally approved treatment.

Despite a study showing Actimmune failed to help keep IPF patients alive, prosecutors accused InterMune of putting out a news release in 2002 claiming the drug had improved the patients' chances of survival.

In addition, ``InterMune sales force personnel were encouraged to inform physicians that Actimmune demonstrated a survival benefit in mild to moderate IPF patient populations," according to the U.S. Attorney's statement.

Keystone Mercy Settles U.S. Lawsuit (PHI)

By Linda Loyd

DOJ_NMG_0086986

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 27, 2006

Keystone Mercy Health Plan, the region's largest Medicaid managed-care insurer, has reached a settlement with the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia to pay $5 million to resolve a benefits-claims dispute.

The Justice Department alleged that Keystone Mercy in 1997 and 1998 failed to return to the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare overpayments for some Medicaid services. Keystone Mercy denied any wrongdoing.

In a statement, the Philadelphia insurer said the agreement ended a dispute "over interpretation of our contract with DPW almost 10 years ago." Keystone Mercy said it agreed to pay $5 million over the next six months to end the "inconvenience and expense of protracted litigation."

The allegations were brought in 2001 by a former Keystone Mercy claims-recovery examiner, who filed a "whistle-blower" complaint. Lorraine Pittelli, the claims examiner, will receive $780,000 from the proceeds of the settlement.

Keystone Mercy manages Medicaid services for more than 273,000 residents in Philadelphia and surrounding Pennsylvania counties.

Mobster Sues, Says He Was Framed (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 27, 2006

Three years ago, a federal judge apologized to Pasquale Barone Jr., saying that his 1993 trial on charges that he killed a man for the New England Mafia was ''fraudulent'' because prosecutors withheld evidence from the defense.

Now Barone, 45, who spent 15 years in prison before he was freed in 2003 amid allegations of government misconduct, is looking for more than an apology.

The North End man has filed a federal lawsuit accusing the government of negligence and alleging that a federal prosecutor, two retired FBI agents, and other unnamed officials plotted to deprive him of a fair trial and orchestrated a malicious prosecution.

The suit is seeking unspecified damages for Barone and his daughter, Consiglia, who was 4 years old when he was sent to prison and, according to the suit, suffered ''severe shock, fear, horror, emotional distress'' and the loss of his companionship.

Barone's suit alleges that the prosecutor and agents conspired to ''intentionally frame'' him.

The suit names Assistant US Attorney Jeffrey Auerhahn and retired FBI agents Michael Buckley and Edward Quinn. The three men could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Three years ago, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the Justice Department had launched an internal investigation into Auerhahn's handling of the case. Thursday, Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for Sullivan, said Justice Department regulations prohibited the government from commenting on the outcome of the investigation or on whether any action had been taken against Auerhahn. She also declined to comment on Barone's lawsuit.

Barone was convicted in federal court in 1993 of murder in aid of racketeering in the 1985 death of his friend, Vincent ''Jimmy'' Limoli, allegedly at the behest of New England mob captain Vincent Ferrara. Barone, who was serving 10 years after pleading guilty to state manslaughter charges in Limoli's slaying, was sentenced to life in prison in the racketeering case.

However, three years ago, US District Judge Mark L. Wolf found that Auerhahn had failed to tell Barone's lawyers that a key witness had recanted before the federal trial and insisted Ferrara had not ordered the slaying.

At the time, Wolf said the evidence ''had the potential to blow the government's case up completely.''

Last year, Wolf also reduced Ferrara's sentence as a result of the government's conduct in the case, setting him free.

While Wolf was weighing a defense request to overturn Barone's conviction, Barone reached a plea agreement with the government. Barone pleaded guilty to racketeering and admitted that he shot Limoli on Oct. 28, 1985, in the North End after Limoli stole drugs from a mobster. Barone also admitted that he helped kill another man, Anthony ''Dapper'' Corlito, on July 21, 1979, and shot a guard in the neck during the robbery of a credit union on Nov. 5, 1982.

In exchange for Barone's plea, the government agreed he should be sentenced to the time he had served, and he was released.

$79.5M In Punitive Damages At Core Of Supreme Court Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Jesse Williams, a Portland, Ore., janitor who smoked three packs of Marlboros a day, died of lung cancer in 1997. His widow, Mayola, sued Philip Morris for fraud and negligence, alleging that any fears her husband had about becoming ill from smoking were eased by the cigarette-maker's publicity campaign that suggested it was safe.

Mayola Williams recalled in court filings that when her husband learned he had inoperable cancer, he said, "Those darn cigarette people finally did it. They were lying all the time."

The lawsuit that Mayola Williams filed was among many claims filed against tobacco companies in recent years, but one of the few to lead to a multimillion-dollar judgment. An Oregon jury awarded Williams $79.5 million in punitive damages. Such damages are intended to punish defendants beyond the actual damages they caused and deter future bad conduct.

Williams' award was 97 times greater than the actual — or compensatory — damages awarded by the jury, and according to court records it was based partly on the jury's consideration of Philip Morris' harm to other smokers in Oregon.

Now, Williams' case is before the U.S. Supreme Court and has become one of the most significant tests ever of how far a jury can go in punishing a civil defendant. The question in the Williams case is whether the punitive damages award is so disproportionate to the injury to Jesse Williams that it violates the 14th Amendment's guarantee of due process of law.

In its appeal, Philip Morris says the Oregon verdict violated due process because it was so much higher than the actual damages caused to Jesse Williams and because jurors were punishing the company for injuries to smokers who were not part of the Williams case.

Mayola Williams' attorney, Robert Peck, says in court papers that the cigarette-maker's efforts to hide the dangers of smoking were "monstrous" and says that if ever a big award were justified, this is the case.

The dispute, to be argued before the high court on Tuesday, is a new round in the court's struggle to draw the line between permissible and unconstitutional punitive damages awards.

Business groups, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, say juries improperly use punitive damage awards to "send a message" to corporate defendants. Consumer advocates and trial lawyers counter that punitive damages help bring accountability to businesses that have a history of abuse.

"The tobacco industry has evaded liability for decades … and the result has been a public health catastrophe," Trial Lawyers for Public Justice says in a court brief filed in the Williams case.

For decades, the Supreme Court considered such jury awards the domain of the states and gave wide latitude to state judges and juries. In recent years, however, the court has begun to rein in awards by setting criteria for punitive damages. The addition of two new justices last term — Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, who replaced the late William Rehnquist and the retired Sandra Day O'Connor — could add a wrinkle to the court's approach.

In the justices' most recent ruling on the issue, in 2003, the majority said any punitive damages that are more than 10 times the actual damages for the injury could be presumed to be excessive. Voting 6-3, the court invalidated a $145 million award levied by a jury that had found that the State Farm insurance company acted in bad faith by not settling claims against a policyholder who was involved in a fatal accident.

In the current case, a key question will be whether Philip Morris' conduct was bad enough to justify a punitive damages award beyond the 2003 guideline.

Rehnquist and O'Connor voted with the majority in the State Farm case. Washington lawyer Mark Levy, who follows decisions concerning punitive damages, says that suggests that their replacements, Roberts and Alito, could tip the court's vote either way in assessing whether the award in the Williams case was excessive.

"The court is on the knife edge," Levy says. If Roberts and Alito join the justices who dissented in the State Farm case and want to leave the matter to the states, Levy says, there would be "a sudden and radical change in this area of the law."

In her case, Mayola Williams claimed that Philip Morris mounted a fraudulent publicity campaign aimed at minimizing the dangers of smoking. After a month-long trial in 1999, the jury awarded $821,485 in compensatory damages and the $79.5 million in punitive damages.

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the award. "There can be no dispute that Philip Morris's conduct was extraordinarily reprehensible. (It) knew that smoking caused serious and sometimes fatal disease, but it nevertheless spread false or misleading information to suggest … that doubts remained about that issue. … The scheme was damaging the health of a very large group of Oregonians — the smoking public — and was killing a number of that group."

In his appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, Philip Morris' lawyer, Andrew Frey tells the justices that the Oregon court misinterpreted recent decisions by the high court, particularly the 2003 ruling. He says the State Farm decision does not allow a company to be punished for harm to people who were not involved in the case. Frey says calculating such damages for injuries to outside parties creates an unfair risk of duplicative and excessive punishment.

Peck, Williams' attorney, says the cigarette-maker is seeking to turn "review of punitive damage awards (into) a simple arithmetic exercise," based on the ratio between actual and punitive. He says the Oregon jury's verdict followed proper criteria "to achieve deterrence" and reverse some of Philip Morris' "ill-gotten profit."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Philly Officials, Hispanic Leaders Object To Election Monitors (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — City officials and Hispanic community leaders objected today to the federal government's plans to put monitors at city polling places on Election Day, saying those efforts could discourage people from voting.

The Department of Justice earlier this month asked a federal judge to authorize appointment of monitors beginning with the upcoming Nov. 7 election and ending in 2009. The government accused the city of failing to provide sufficient election materials in Spanish and not recruiting enough bilingual poll workers.

But City Solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. said at a news conference Thursday that the federal government could not guarantee him that federal monitors wouldn't follow voters into polling booths. It would be better to appoint local monitors, he said.

A spokesman for the Justice Department said he would look into the solicitor's claims but could not immediately comment.

"We're very, very concerned about having Big Brother taking care of us," said local attorney Luis P. Diaz, who also attended Thursday's news conference with other community leaders.

The federal lawsuit contends the city violated the federal Voting Rights Act by allowing only poll workers – some of whom did not speak Spanish – to help Hispanic voters cast ballots. The law permits voters who require assistance to request help from someone they know.

Diaz, the city solicitor, said Philadelphia has been helping to accommodate non-English speakers at the polls for more than three decades. The city plans to recruit about 200 translators to help at the more than 150 polling places expected to need translation services this year, he said.

About 10 percent of Philadelphia's 1.4 million residents are Hispanic, according to 2004 Census figures cited in the suit. But the government estimates that about 36 percent of voting-age Hispanics in the city have limited English skills.

Phila. Opposes U.S. Observers At Polls (PHILINQ)

By Marcia Gelbart

Philadelphia Inquirer, October 27, 2006

Two weeks before Election Day, the city is fighting an attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to appoint federal observers for Philadelphia elections beginning Nov. 7 and lasting past next year's presidential race, until the end of 2009.

The effort to appoint the observers stems from a lawsuit filed by the federal government 14 days ago alleging that the city has violated the rights of its Hispanic voters.

Specifically, it charges that the city hasn't adequately recruited and trained bilingual poll workers, failed to provide sufficient election-related materials in Spanish, and prohibited Hispanic voters with limited English from choosing someone to help them inside the voting booth, which law permits.

"The record in this case clearly demonstrates that the city does not exercise sufficient control over its voting places to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act," the lawsuit states. It alludes to 50 Hispanic city residents who encountered problems in elections here, most since 2003. One, Myrna Cruz, testified that a poll worker forced her to vote for John Street for mayor in 2003, when she wanted to vote for Sam Katz. Others said they were ridiculed by poll workers who asked why they hadn't learned English.

The suit also says the city has no program to identify "the need for or the placement of Spanish-speaking poll workers and interpreters on election day" and that the city has paid people to be interpreters who don't speak Spanish.

City officials have called the allegations unfounded. A hearing has been scheduled for next Friday in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District.

With the election fast approaching, the city has been struggling to implement new federal rules on handicapped access, as well as a new state law requiring dozens of city polling places to be moved (they can no longer be inside bars or elected officials' homes, for instance).

Combined with troubles encountered in May's primary, when hundreds of voting machines malfunctioned, and now the federal lawsuit, the resulting challenges for the Nov. 7 election are perhaps unprecedented, election officials say.

"Everything is culminating at the same time," City Commissioner Edgar Howard said. "Just be glad this year isn't a presidential year," he said, when voter turnout is typically at its highest.

In the case of the federal lawsuit, U.S. Rep. Bob Brady, the Democratic Party chairman, and other local Democrats see partisan politics at work.

He said the suit was filed so close to Nov. 7 "probably to suppress the [Democratic] vote" and help GOP candidates such as U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum.

Michael P. Meehan, general counsel for the city Republican Party, dismissed Brady's explanation. "That's part of the spin machine to generate turnout," he said. "We didn't generate this. We didn't make any complaints."

But both party leaders agree that the proposed federal intervention goes too far.

"That's a disgrace. The Hispanics have no problem with the interpreters," Brady said.

"We do think they are going beyond," Meehan said.

According to the lawsuit, about 6.6 percent of the city's voting-age population is Hispanic, and more than a third of those people - 25,660 - speak only limited English.

Since 1974, the city has provided translators at polling places where census data indicates Hispanics live. The Justice Department wants Spanish language assistance citywide.

"This is one of those issues where the remedy far exceeds any potential need," city Solicitor Romulo Diaz said, adding that in the Nov. 7 election, the city also will provide translations via telephone in 200 languages, including Spanish.

Stressing that federal observers could use their authority to enter polling booths while people are voting, Diaz said: "We think that is not only something that could be misunderstood - it could even have a chilling effect and intimidate the very voters the Justice Department says it is trying to support."

Yesterday, department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said: "No federal observers would ever enter a voting booth unless specifically requested by and with the expressed permission of a voter, and to suggest otherwise is just untrue."

She said there are currently federal observers in 169 municipalities throughout the country, including, most recently, Boston and Springfield, Mass.

In the last two elections, Diaz, at the Justice Department's request, said he had given its officials credentials to access city voting places to observe what bilingual assistance and signage were provided.

Those officials were not granted permission to enter individual polling booths.

"There are still some issues that we need to improve upon," said City Councilman Juan Ramos, Council's only Hispanic member. "But the Latino people don't need federal agents on Election Day to see how they vote or get behind the curtain with them."

A nonpartisan voters' right advocacy group, the Delaware Valley Voter Registration Education Project, held a news conference yesterday opposing the government effort.

The city's nonprofit election watchdog, the Committee of Seventy, also has had concerns about a lack of Hispanic voter participation. During the May primary, the committee recruited local volunteers to survey what assistance Spanish-speaking voters received at polling places in Latino neighborhoods, mainly in the 7th, 18th, 19th and 33d Wards. The committee later shared those results with the Justice Department, which was already conducting its own review.

"I wouldn't call the information we provided them definitive," committee president Zach Stalberg said. But the findings - too few translators, and some with questionable language skills, and not enough bilingual polling-place officials - "suggested there might be problems."

Said Stalberg: "We think there are enough indications of problems here to merit federal observers... . In our view, it won't do any harm."

Problems With Machines, Ballots Trouble Officials (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Eleven days before voters go to the polls, problems from delayed absentee ballots to names being chopped off on voting machines are hampering elections officials.

The problems are not unusual, officials say. But coming after a primary election season in which new electronic machines and state laws confounded poll workers, they are making officials nervous.

The Chicago Board of Election Commissioners has withheld payments to equipment vendor Sequoia Voting Systems until the results are in. In Los Angeles County, officials will conduct a random audit of 5% of the machines used in early voting following questions about their security and accuracy.

“It points to the increased agony being felt around the country by election administrators,” says Kimball Brace of Election Data Systems.

Among the problems:

•In parts of Virginia and Texas, some candidates' names have been cut off on summary pages that confirm voters' selections. Democratic Senate challenger Jim Webb in Virginia is affected. In Austin, Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison appears as “Kay Bailey Hutch.”

•Absentee and provisional ballots have been slow to arrive in Maryland, California, Ohio and Arkansas, among other states. The delays could threaten officials' ability to get absentee ballots out on time or to have enough provisional ballots at polling places for voters whose registrations are contested.

•Missouri has been shaken by the arrival of thousands of questionable voter registration cards. Many include bogus address changes that could cause some voters to be misinformed; others might have to cast provisional ballots rather than regular ones.

The problems should not cause Americans to lose faith in the electoral process, says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

“Our nation's voting equipment, election results and election officials can and should be trusted,” he said this week. “The integrity of the system is not in the hands of hackers, professors, interest groups or politicians in Washington — it is managed by local election officials.”

Elections Pushed, Pressed, Pulled Into 21st Century (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Haunted by breakdowns at the polls during this year's primaries, elections officials across the USA are using technology and other means to make voting on Nov. 7 more reliable and convenient.

From alerts delivered by text message to polling sites at grocery stores, states and counties hope to increase turnout and decrease the number of problems in states such as Ohio and Illinois earlier this year.

DOJ_NMG_0086991

In Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where it took nearly a week to count votes in May, poll workers must pass a four-hour training course and practice on new electronic voting machines. The nearly 30% who fail must repeat the class. "You're imposing a technology on them that they don't understand," elections project manager Tom Hayes says.

Cook County, Ill., which suffered similar delays in March, is paying $500 to equipment technicians willing to train for three days. "The job of these poll workers immediately got about five or six times harder," County Clerk David Orr says.

Among the innovations:

•Electronic updates. Johnson County, Kan., offers election alerts by e-mail, text message or podcast. Only about 500 residents have signed up this year, but the publicity could boost turnout. "It gave us something new to talk about to drive people to our website," Election Commissioner Brian Newby says.

•Voting by phone. Vermont pioneered phone voting for the visually impaired and has now been joined by Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Oklahoma and Oregon. "They're very comfortable with a telephone, and many of them aren't very comfortable with a computer," says Vermont Secretary of State Deborah Markowitz.

•New polling venues. Clark County, Nev., has increased its early voting sites to 18 by including malls, grocery stores and a mobile trailer. Eight are permanent, and 10 move throughout the county. "We're right in the community locations where people go," Registrar of Voters Larry Lomax says.

•Centralized sites. Following the example of Larimer County, 20 Colorado counties will use centralized "vote centers" this year rather than smaller precincts. Voters, who can go to any center, find the system more convenient, says Dana Williams of the Colorado secretary of state's office.

•Election night webcams. Orange County, Calif., lets election junkies watch on the Web as ballot boxes and supplies are returned to a county warehouse. "We're showing them as much of the process as we can," says Brett Rowley of the registrar's office.

Free, Fair Elections? Doubts Still Linger (USAT)

By Julianne Malveaux

USA Today, October 27, 2006

One of the reasons, it is said, that we invaded Iraq was to introduce democracy to a totalitarian nation. But while we are shopping democracy abroad, we have yet to perfect our democracy at home. When people go to the polls Nov. 7, the manifestations of our imperfect democracy will be rife. The non-partisan Election Reform Information Project predicts problems at the polls, and the NAACP says it will monitor elections in 10 states in which irregularities are a possibility.

It is ironic that U.S. monitors travel the globe to ensure "free and fair" elections when we have so many problems here. Maryland's primary election, for example, was botched in large part when some polling places opened late because an election worker forgot to distribute the activator cards to unlock voting machines. Many still wonder about the accuracy of voting machines, especially those that don't provide a paper receipt to ensure votes are tallied correctly.

NAACP President Bruce Gordon singles out Diebold machines as "unreliable," yet there are more than 130,000 of these touch-screen machines in use nationwide. The problem really isn't just one company. Instead, the issue is that six years since a presidential election's outcome hinged on hanging chads, reforms have not been implemented in a way to inspire confidence in the ease, accuracy or fairness of elections.

Electionline.org, a non-partisan website on election analysis and reform, just issued a report that says Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Indiana, Maryland, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Washington are states especially likely to have problems because of legal challenges, procedural changes, close races, new equipment — or a combination of factors.

Even when machines count votes accurately, some people's voting experiences are marred by human error. In some precincts, lines are long enough to test Job's patience because there aren't enough machines or volunteers. Federal election law requires that most polls be open from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. on the first Tuesday in November. But long lines might shorten if we implemented reforms such as 24-hour voting, or considered the possibility of weekend voting.

Voters with flexible schedules are in the minority; most are stuck in long lines before or after work. These are the folks who will leave lines when polling places don't open on time or are too long. The rise in absentee ballots might be a reflection of this inconvenience.

Control of the House and the Senate is at stake in the 2006 elections, and many races are so tight they could be decided on just a few thousand votes. Our democracy depends on free, fair and accurate elections. On Nov. 8, we shouldn't have doubts about whether our votes have been counted.

G.O.P. Moves Fast To Reignite Issue Of Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — The divisive debate over gay marriage, which played a prominent role in 2004 campaigns but this year largely faded from view, erupted anew on Thursday as President Bush and Republicans across the country tried to use a court ruling in New Jersey to rally dispirited conservatives to the polls.

Wednesday's ruling, in which the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples, had immediate ripple effects, especially in Senate races in some of the eight states where voters are considering constitutional amendments to ban gay marriage.

President Bush put a spotlight on the issue while campaigning in Iowa, which does not have a proposal on the ballot. With the Republican House candidate, Jeff Lamberti, by his side, Mr. Bush — who has not been talking about gay marriage in recent weeks — took pains to insert a reference into his stump speech warning that Democrats would raise taxes and make America less safe.

"Yesterday in New Jersey, we had another activist court issue a ruling that raises doubts about the institution of marriage," Mr. Bush said at a luncheon at the Iowa State Fairgrounds that raised $400,000 for Mr. Lamberti.

The president drew applause when he reiterated his long-held stance that marriage was "a union between a man and a woman," adding, "I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended."

The ruling in New Jersey left it to the Legislature to decide whether to legalize gay marriage. Even so, the threat that gay marriage could become legal energized conservatives at a time when Republican strategists say that turning out the base could make the difference between winning and losing on Nov. 7. With many independent analysts predicting Republicans will lose the House and possibly the Senate, President Bush's political team is counting on the party's sophisticated voter turnout machinery to hold Democratic advances enough that Republicans can at least maintain control.

"It's a game of margins," said Charles Black, a Republican strategist who consults frequently with Karl Rove, the chief White House political strategist. "You've got about 20 House races and probably half a dozen Senate races that are either dead even or very, very close. So if it motivates voters in one or two to go vote, it could make a difference."

Democrats predicted Thursday that the debate would not dramatically alter the national conversation in an election that has been dominated by the war in Iraq and corruption and scandal in Washington. But across the country, Republicans quickly embraced the New Jersey ruling as a reason for voters to send them to Capitol Hill.

In Virginia, the court decision could not have come at a better time for Senator George Allen, a Republican whose campaign for re-election had been thrown off course by allegations that he had used racially insensitive remarks. The Virginia ballot includes a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. Mr. Allen supports it; his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, argues that the ban is unnecessary.

On Thursday, Mr. Allen could be found in Roanoke at a rally held by backers of a ballot initiative to ban gay marriage. Victoria Cobb, an organizer of the events, said the New Jersey ruling was giving the cause "a new momentum."

"It's an issue that's going to play a big role in the next 12 days," Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0086993

In Tennessee, another state with a proposal to ban gay marriage, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat running for the Senate, was sparring with Republicans over an advertisement in which the Republican National Committee asserts that Mr. Ford supports gay marriage — an assertion Mr. Ford says is wrong. On Thursday, he responded with his own advertisement, calling the Republican ad "despicable, rotten lies."

Mr. Ford says he will vote for the Tennessee gay marriage ban. With early voting under way, the Republican candidate, Bob Corker, is telling voters that he has already cast his ballot in favor of the gay marriage ban.

And in Pennsylvania, where Senator Rick Santorum, the Senate's leading Republican backer of a gay marriage ban, is fighting for his political survival, conservative advocacy groups were working furiously to revive the gay marriage debate. Pennsylvania does not have a ballot initiative.

"It's an important wedge issue to talk about between candidates where there are two distinct viewpoints on the issue," said Joseph Cella, president of Fidelis, a national Catholic advocacy group that has embraced Mr. Santorum for his views on abortion and gay marriage. Mr. Cella said his organization, which was also working to pass a gay marriage ban in Colorado, was contemplating an advertising campaign.

As of January 2006, 45 states had enacted some form of law — from a simple statute to a constitutional amendment — banning same-sex marriage. In addition to Virginia, Tennessee and Colorado, the states that have proposed constitutional amendments on the November ballot include Arizona, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

For conservatives, the debate brings back memories of 2004, when they rallied in opposition to a Massachusetts court ruling that same sex couples had a right to marry. The issue proved central in places like South Dakota, where Senator John Thune, a Republican, railed against activist judges in his successful campaign to oust Tom Daschle, then the Senate Democratic leader.

This year, by contrast, conservatives have felt frustrated that the debate over gay marriage and the judiciary is no longer front and center.

"I think they've been a little sedate," Mr. Cella said. But in the wake of the New Jersey ruling, he said, conservatives "are really getting motivated, and this is a shot in the arm to propel that."

Democrats, though, insist they are not concerned.

"It's not going to be close to the issue it was in 2004," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "In 2004 they scared people that the court ruling in Massachusetts would just change America and families dramatically. By 2006, it's clear that hasn't happened, and so the scare tactic, what motivated people to go to the polls, just isn't there."

One place the New Jersey court ruling is not likely to have much of a political impact is, paradoxically, New Jersey, a largely Democratic state that does not have a proposed gay marriage ban on the ballot.

The Republican Senate candidate, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., has been distancing himself from his party throughout the campaign, in which he has focused largely on economic issues, domestic security and alleged ethical improprieties on the part of his Democratic opponent, Senator Robert Menendez. A Kean spokeswoman said Thursday that theme is unlikely to change.

"We're going to stick with the issues that we've been winning on this entire campaign," the spokeswoman, Jill Hazelbaker, said. Gay marriage, she said, "is not an issue that he's not talking about, or that he's trying to avoid. But in terms of our marquee issues that we're winning on, I don't think it rises to an issue that's going to define the campaign."

Religious Conservatives Cheer Ruling On Gays As Wake-Up Call (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The New Jersey court decision that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual couples was bad news for social conservatives -- the bad news they were hoping for.

"Pro-traditional-marriage organizations ought to give a distinguished service award to the New Jersey Supreme Court," said the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention.

Land and other conservative religious leaders predicted that the court's 4 to 3 ruling, which was handed down Wednesday, would boost turnout of social conservatives in the midterm elections, particularly in the eight states that have constitutional amendments against same-sex marriage on the Nov. 7 ballot.

"I have to think there are Democratic strategists out there thinking the words of the old Japanese admiral: 'I fear all we've done is wake a sleeping giant,' " said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a Washington-based advocacy group. "They were coasting into an election with a Republican base with dampened enthusiasm. This brings it all back home to the base, what this election is about."

President Bush, at fundraising events in Iowa and Michigan, denounced the New Jersey ruling and called heterosexual marriage "a sacred institution."

Before the New Jersey decision, conservative religious groups tried to rally their supporters around the issue of same-sex marriage, but with far less success than they had in the 2004 elections.

Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, for example, held "Stand for the Family" rallies in three cities in September and October, drawing considerably smaller crowds than anticipated. The first rally, in Pittsburgh on Sept. 20, attracted 3,000 people to a 17,000-seat arena that Focus on the Family had predicted would be full.

The next two rallies, in St. Paul, Minn., on Oct. 3 and Nashville on Oct. 16, were moved from stadium-size venues to smaller auditoriums, and the tickets, which had been on sale for $7, were given away. Each event also drew about 3,000 people, according to Focus on the Family spokesman Paul Hetrick.

"We don't gauge the success by the number of people," Hetrick said, adding: "I don't think it's the rallies [that flopped]. I just think it's more of a challenge to enthuse people about midterm elections."

Evan Wolfson, executive director of Freedom to Marry, a group that supports same-sex marriage, said religious conservatives "have gone to this well too many times, and people are not buying it."

"They attack gay people when the sun rises, and they attack gay people when the sun sets, so no matter what the court had done in New Jersey, they would have said Americans need to shift their attention from the real threats to our country to the alleged threat from gay couples seeking to settle down," Wolfson said.

New Jersey's Supreme Court stopped short of requiring the state to allow same-sex marriage. It said that under the state's constitution, same-sex couples can no longer be denied the rights and benefits that opposite-sex couples receive. It gave the state legislature 180 days to craft a solution, which apparently could include allowing civil unions.

Land said conservative voters were more energized about same-sex marriage in the 2004 elections because Massachusetts had just become the first -- and so far only -- state to legalize it as a result of a state court ruling in 2003.

Since then, opponents of same-sex marriage have been on a roll. Twenty states have passed constitutional amendments banning it. Several courts, most recently in the states of Washington and New York, have ruled against it. Those victories, Land said, may have made some conservatives complacent.

"But whatever wind was pumped out of their sails has now been pumped back in," he said. "I frankly was amazed that the New Jersey judges issued their decision before the election."

Perkins agreed, saying that he "had long anticipated a bad ruling from New Jersey" and was glad that it occurred in time for voters to see the "very real and present danger" that same-sex marriage could spread. He spoke by telephone shortly before holding a news conference to denounce the New Jersey decision in South Dakota, one of the eight states with marriage amendments on the ballot. The others are Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin.

Bush Defines Marriage As Man And Woman (AP-Y)

AP, October 27, 2006

President Bush said the "sacred institution" of marriage between a man and a woman must be defended against what he called activist court rulings.

Bush briefly brought up the topic, unprompted, while raising money here for a Republican congressional candidate, a day after the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that same-sex couples must be given the same rights as married people.

DOJ_NMG_0086995

The court left it up to the state's Legislature to decide whether to extend those rights under the structure of marriage, civil unions or something else.

The president said the ruling "raises doubts about the institution of marriage."

"I believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman," he said. "I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended."

Bush did not say how it must be defended. But he has advocated a federal ban on gay marriage. Earlier this year, a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage failed to win the needed two-thirds support in both the Senate and House.

Gay marriage is legal only in Massachusetts. Other states, including Vermont and California, have laws permitting civil unions or domestic partnerships that offer virtually all the benefits of gay marriage, except the name. New Jersey and some other states have domestic partnership laws that offer fewer marriage benefits.

Twenty states have passed constitutional amendments aimed at blocking gay marriage, mostly by large margins. Eight more states — Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin — will be voting Nov. 7 on constitutional amendments that would ban same-sex marriages and, in most cases, civil unions as well.

Bush Campaigns Against Same-sex Marriage Ruling (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 27, 2006

US President George W. Bush seized on a New Jersey court ruling that may pave the way for same-sex marriage there as a political weapon ahead of November 7 elections.

Campaigning for a struggling Republican congressional candidate here, Bush declared: "We believe in family values, we believe values are important, and we believe marriage is a fundamental institution of civilization."

"Yesterday, in New Jersey, we had another activist court issue a ruling that raises doubts about the institution of marriage," he said at the first of two fundraisers he was to attend.

"I believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended," he said.

New Jersey's Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that gay couples have the same rights as their heterosexual counterparts, in a decision that could pave the way for same-sex marriages in the state.

The ruling stated that preventing such unions is unconstitutional and gave the state legislature six months to decide whether to amend the current marriage laws or create a new framework for same-sex unions.

"Denying rights and benefits to committed same-sex couples that are statutorily given to their heterosexual counterparts violates the equal protection guarantee" of the constitution, the court said in its ruling.

It said that while it did not find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage existed in the state, same-sex couples did not enjoy the same rights as their heterosexual counterparts.

"The unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state constitution," it added.

"The legislature must either amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel statutory structure," it said.

N.J. Boost For Gay Couples Buoys GOP (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

NEW YORK

The political fallout from Wednesday's New Jersey Supreme Court ruling in favor of full rights for gay couples could ripple far beyond the borders of the Garden State.

With control of the House and Senate at stake in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Republican leaders are hoping the ruling will give their wavering conservative base - who would see the court's move as another attack on traditional marriage - a reason to go to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0086996

The New Jersey outcome could suddenly give impetus to voters in eight states where the ballot includes measures to ban gay marriage. In some of these states - Tennessee and Virginia, especially - the races for Senate seats are too close to call. Others, namely Arizona and Colorado, have hotly contested House races that may give a boost to Republican candidates.

The ruling, which found that gay couples in New Jersey are entitled to the same legal and financial protections as heterosexual couples, could tip the national balance, many political analysts say.

"The Republicans are thrilled and the Democrats are furious with those judges, and that tells me all I need to know," says Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia. "Both sides understand this is a boost for Republican turnout among social conservatives, many of whom were very discouraged and probably were not going to vote because of the [Mark] Foley scandal and Iraq."

Some analysts, though, disagree. Gay marriage has lost some of its salience as a galvanizing issue, they say, in part because Americans are so focused on the war in Iraq.

"The country seems very, very centered on Iraq, and ... it's very unlikely that something that happened in New Jersey is going to energize social conservatives," says Cliff Zukin, a professor of public policy at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "Every poll I've looked at suggests that Iraq remains the defining issue."

In backing full rights for gay couples, New Jersey's high court gave the state Legislature 180 days to expand existing laws or to adopt new ones that will guarantee gay couples equal rights. But it stopped short of requiring use of the word "marriage" to define gay-couple unions, leaving that decision to the Legislature. Some analysts suggest that makes the issue less compelling for conservatives, for now.

"I'm sure the extreme right would very much have preferred the court have said we get marriage," says David Buckel, senior counsel for Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, who argued the case for gay marriage before the New Jersey court. "That is one of the ironies of where we are now politically. The court did not take the constitutional promise the entire way. And since we're in abeyance now and have to wait for the Legislature to act, it's hard to see what kind of impact it will have outside of New Jersey, at least on elections."

Eight thousand gay couples have been married in Massachusetts, and civil unions are commonplace in Vermont and Connecticut - developments that Mr. Buckel says may have made some Americans feel less threatened by the issue. "Not one volcano popped its lid, the weather patterns did not dramatically alter," says Buckel. "I think America sees that in the end, whatever anxieties there were, a few families were helped immensely by getting things like medical coverage and no families were hurt."

Opponents of gay marriage say the ruling will put the issue back on the front pages - and energize the most conservative voters. "New Jersey is a key state, and the papers are covering this, word is spreading," says the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition in Washington. "This raises a level of awareness. It takes away the negatives from the Foley scandal and the war, and reminds people that the family is an important issue."

Mr. Sheldon, whose public-policy think tank is supported by 43,000 churches, is urging voters to find out where their candidate stands on the gay-marriage issue and to vote. "This underscores the urgency for Congress to act on a constitutional amendment that truly defines marriage as between one man and one woman and doesn't give away the rights and privileges through civil unions and domestic partners," he says.

To date, polls show Democratic voters have been more energized than Republicans this election cycle - a reversal from the past few elections when Republicans were gung-ho and Democrats lackluster.

"Republicans haven't dropped off the map, but their interest in voting is lower than it usually is," says Thomas Patterson, a political analyst at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "This is the kind of issue that can give them a reason to vote, and they haven't had many. This might be enough to get them to think, 'Ah, I'll get out of my chair,' at least for those on the margins."

In New Jersey, where Republicans see their best hope of taking a Democratic Senate seat, the ruling is not expected to affect the close race between incumbent Sen. Robert Menendez (D) and Tom Kean Jr. (R) - in part because a majority of voters there favor gay marriage.

'We Have Decided' (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0086997

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

This week's New Jersey Supreme Court's judicial diktat on same-sex-somethings (name to be determined later) is a remarkable arrogation of power by the judiciary. The court's belief that it is empowered to embark on social experimentation in the field of marriage is embodied in the words -- "We have decided that our State Constitution guarantees that every statutory right and benefit conferred to heterosexual couples through civil marriage must be made available to committed same-sex couples . . ." (our emphasis).

Along its merry way, the decision does strive for a semblance of humility and rigor, perhaps out of a troubled conscience about judicial overreach. "The great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process," the court avers. The justices also quote a lower-court ruling to the effect that "a constitution is not simply an empty receptacle into which judges may pour their own conceptions of evolving social mores."

That this is disingenuous, however, is made plain by the fact that the justices are willing to trust "the democratic process" only with the semantic question of what to call these unions: "The name to be given to the statutory scheme that provides full rights and benefits to same-sex couples, whether marriage or some other term, is a matter left to the democratic process." Apparently New Jersey voters are supposed to be grateful that their judicial overlords have delegated this policy ornamentation.

Ironically, however, the court held that the decision of the state legislature to pass a law in 2004 recognizing "domestic partnerships," and specifically distinguishing them from marriages, weighs in favor of same-sex-somethings. It seems that a political compromise arrived at democratically does not satisfy the justices' desire for the legislature to act as a "great engine of social change." So the justices gave the engine orders from their headquarters.

And while declining to identify a "fundamental right" to same-sex marriage, the court simultaneously declared that "the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our State Constitution." All in all, the ruling reveals judges writing law entirely on their own but trying to cover their political tracks.

If many on the judicial and political left get their way, those tracks will soon extend to the rest of the country as well. We've opposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution banning same-sex marriage on grounds that this is an issue best settled by state legislators. However, most liberals would be only too happy to impose the New Jersey standard on every other state through the Constitution's "full faith and credit" clause.

The Defense of Marriage Act, signed by Bill Clinton in 1996, is supposed to protect against this sort of cross-state social imperialism. But watch as activists and many Democrats now seek to use the New Jersey ruling to coax the U.S. Supreme Court to overrule that legislation. When cultural revolutions are in the liberal saddle, democratic formalities always seem to get stomped by "We have decided."

Clinton Wouldn't Block Law If Albany Backs Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton told a group of gay elected officials Wednesday night that she would support a gay marriage law in New York if a future governor and Legislature chose to enact one, according to three participants at the meeting.

Mrs. Clinton has long opposed same-sex marriage and instead favors civil unions for gay couples, a position that has drawn sharp criticism from some gay advocacy groups. But she has also said that each state should decide the issue for itself.

The Democratic candidate for governor of New York, Eliot Spitzer, who is well ahead in the polls, has pledged to fight to legalize gay marriage, and Mrs. Clinton made it clear on Wednesday that she would go along with a gay marriage law.

“If our governor and our Legislature support marriage in New York, I’m not going to be against that,” Mrs. Clinton said, according to an article about her remarks yesterday in Gay City News. “I feel very comfortable with being able to refute anybody who tries to pit us or pit me against Eliot.”

Participants at the meeting, which was closed to reporters other than those at gay media outlets, confirmed the account of Mrs. Clinton’s remarks, which were made to the gathering at a private apartment in Manhattan.

Mrs. Clinton also appeared to back off her past remarks that characterized marriage’s history as an exclusively heterosexual institution, according to the Gay City News article.

"Obviously my friends and people who spoke to me — we've had many long conversations and I think — and which I believe — that the way that I have spoken and I have advocated has certainly evolved and I am happy to be educated and to learn as much as I can," Mrs. Clinton said.

The senator listened and spoke for more than an hour with the three-dozen officials from New York, as they sat down — by coincidence — two hours after the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that gay couples were entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples.

Participants said it was a warm, constructive meeting, and that some in the group had cried as they told stories of frustrations about not being able to marry or have the same benefits of other long-term couples who are heterosexual.

They said Mrs. Clinton described supporting the federal Defense of Marriage Act as a strategic decision to help derail a constitutional amendment that would have banned gay marriage. She also said that it was not fair that the gay partner of a late congressman from Massachusetts, Gerry Studds, was not receiving his benefits, participants said.

Corzine Tells Legislators He Backs Civil Unions Over Same-Sex Marriage (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 26 — Gov. Jon S. Corzine told legislative leaders on Thursday that he would prefer that New Jersey enact a civil unions law for gay couples rather than allow them to marry.

That prompted attacks from the state's leading gay-rights advocate, who said Mr. Corzine expressed support for same-sex marriage to a gay audience two weeks ago and had repeatedly done so during his 2000 primary campaign for the United States Senate.

Steven Goldstein, who was co-manager of Mr. Corzine's Senate campaign and now heads the gay-rights group Garden State Equality, said on Thursday that Mr. Corzine had clearly expressed a preference for gay marriage, over gay unions, in "numerous conversations." Mr. Goldstein said the governor "expressed his full support for marriage equality" in a conference call with 100 advocates for gays earlier this month.

But Mr. Corzine said on Thursday afternoon in an interview that he had "advocated on a consistent basis for civil unions." He said that he would sign a bill allowing gay marriage, but "it's not my preference."

Assistants to the governor said he had outlined his preferences to Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts Jr. and Senate President Richard J. Codey on Thursday morning, a day after New Jersey's highest court ruled that gay and lesbian couples are entitled to all the legal rights and financial benefits of their heterosexual counterparts.

The court gave the Legislature 180 days to decide whether to accomplish that by allowing gay men and lesbians to marry or by expanding New Jersey's domestic partnership laws. Lawmakers, though, said they had made no plans to take up the issue.

"It's much too early," Mr. Codey said, pointing out that lawmakers already had a heavy schedule this fall dealing with the issue of property taxes.

Still, they seemed to have settled on the middle road that the majority of the court prescribed. They said they would not allow a vote to overturn the ruling with a constitutional amendment, but also discounted prospects for a law extending the term "marriage" to same-sex couples.

"I don't see, at this point in time, a majority of both houses being in favor of marriage as opposed to civil unions," Mr. Codey said. "It's more likely to be civil unions."

He added, "I couldn't at this point guarantee civil unions."

Mr. Goldstein said on Thursday that gay-marriage advocates were pressing legislators to support a bill that would extend the word "marriage" to same-sex unions, in part through a public-relations campaign. He said that his group had spent about $10,000 on advertising time on News 12 New Jersey, a cable station, to run commercials supporting gay marriage and arguing that civil unions are inadequate.

Opponents of gay marriage said they had no immediate plans to run commercials countering that theme.

"We don't need to persuade the public," said John Tomicki, chairman of the New Jersey Coalition to Preserve and Protect Marriage. "They share our views about marriage being for a man and a woman."

Mr. Tomicki said his group would focus on trying to amend the State Constitution to ban same-sex marriage, but he acknowledged that legislative leaders were not enthusiastic about that approach.

Assemblyman Reed Gusciora, a Democrat from Princeton, said on Thursday that he had agreed to sponsor a "Marriage Equity Act" but that such a bill had not been drafted and could not be introduced before the next Assembly session, scheduled for Nov. 9. Even Mr. Gusciora was dubious about its prospects, saying, "When you talk about civil rights, sometimes you have to do things incrementally, and that might have to do that another day."

Senator John Adler, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said he did not expect to see a bill fully legalizing gay marriage, nor much resistance to extending marital rights and benefits to same-sex couples. "We've already made that conceptual leap," he said.

New Jersey adopted domestic partnership legislation in 2004 without much organized dissent, and a bill adding some legal protections passed in January.

But while New Jersey's Supreme Court specifically charged the Legislature with deciding how to categorize gay unions, Mr. Corzine's position is likely to carry significant weight. In addition to occupying one of the nation's most powerful governorships, Mr. Corzine accumulated a great deal of political capital earlier this year when he stood firm against the Legislature during the budget battle, forcing the state government to close down for a week.

A review of a dozens of newspaper articles about Mr. Corzine's Senate campaign in 2000 turned up 10 that stated flatly he supported gay marriage. He is not quoted directly, however; he is simply described as supporting gay marriage during debates and on the campaign trail. Other articles from 2000 cite Mr. Corzine's support for civil unions.

Mr. Goldstein said Mr. Corzine had clearly stated during the Democratic primary in 2000 that he preferred gay marriage, but that he began openly embracing civil unions during the general-election campaign to appeal to the wider electorate.

Anthony Coley, Mr. Corzine's spokesman, said the newspaper stories from 2000 indicating support for gay marriage were not consistent with Mr. Corzine's responses to questionnaires to gay groups in 2000 and 2005, the year he ran for governor, or with other newspaper stories.

"It seems that some folks are confusing his opposition to a federal amendment to the Constitution banning gay marriage with support for gay marriage," Mr. Coley said. "The two are not the same. During his run for the Senate in 2000, Jon Corzine was for civil unions, and that remains his preference today."

Mr. Corzine, in an interview on Thursday at Warren E. Sooy Jr. Elementary School in Hammonton after a tour of after-school programs, said of support for civil unions but not gay marriage: "It's my own view that that's where our society is at this moment in time. I personally have a traditional view, but I believe that should be framed in equal rights for everyone, and that's exactly what the court argued."

Mr. Goldstein said his camp did not contact the governor or his aides on Thursday. "He always comes to the correct view," Mr. Goldstein said. "We want to give him time."

The Hitch (WSJ)

By Darren R. Spedale And William N. Eskridge Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

On Wednesday, the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights and benefits that the state confers upon married couples. While some other courts have also favored gay marriage, it faces an uphill battle among the voters. This November, for example, eight states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- have initiatives on their ballot that would amend their state constitutions to prevent recognition of same-sex marriage (and in some states, civil unions as well). To date, not a single such initiative has failed; 19 states now have constitutional amendments prohibiting recognition of gay and lesbian marriages within their borders.

The proponents of these initiatives have been successful, in significant part, because they have convinced voters that the legalization of same-sex marriage would destroy, or at least significantly harm, the institution: Heterosexuals would lose faith in marriage, family structures would be weakened, and more children would be raised out of wedlock as a result. But would these things actually happen? * * *

These are no longer hypothetical questions, because same-sex marriage is no longer just a theoretical possibility. Denmark was the first country to extend the rights and responsibilities of marriage to same-sex couples in 1989; and although the law used the name "registered partnership," straight as well as lesbian and gay Danes have generally equated these partnerships with marriage. Norway followed the Danish example in 1993, Sweden in 1995. While the actual title of "marriage" has been granted to gay couples elsewhere in the world only within the last five years, the Nordic countries have provided us with a rich source of information, and a 17-year history, as to what actually happens in society when gay and lesbian citizens marry.

Social conservatives suggest that legal recognition of same-sex couples has harmed society. Sen. Bill Frist has stated that "years of de facto same-sex marriage in Scandinavia has further weakened marriage"; similar claims have been made by Sens. John Cornyn, Rick Santorum, James Inhofe and Sam Brownback.

However, there is no evidence that allowing same-sex couples to marry weakens the institution. If anything, the numbers indicate the opposite. A decade after Denmark, Norway and Sweden passed their respective partnership laws, heterosexual marriage rates had risen 10.7% in Denmark; 12.7% in Norway; and a whopping 28.8% in Sweden. In Denmark over the last few years, marriage rates are the highest they've been since the early 1970s. Divorce rates among heterosexual couples, on the other hand, have fallen. A decade after each country passed its partnership law, divorce rates had dropped 13.9% in Denmark; 6% in Norway; and 13.7% in Sweden. On average, divorce rates among heterosexuals remain lower now than in the years before same-sex partnerships were legalized.

In addition, out-of-wedlock birthrates in each of these countries contradict the suggestion by social conservatives that gay marriage will lead to great increases in out-of-wedlock births and therefore less family stability for children. In Denmark, the percentage of out-of-wedlock births was 46% in 1989; now it is 45%. In Norway, out-of-wedlock births jumped from 14% in 1980 to 45% right before partnerships were adopted in 1993; now they stand at 51%, a much lower rate of increase than in the decade before same-sex unions. The Swedish trend mirrors that of Norway, with much lower rates of increase post-partnership than pre-partnership.

Is there a correlation, then, between same-sex marriage and a strengthening of the institution of marriage? It would be difficult, and suspect, to establish a cause-and-effect relationship between these trends in heterosexual marriage and marriage rights for gays and lesbians. But the facts demonstrate that there is no proof that same-sex marriage will harm the institution of marriage, or children. An optimistic reading of the facts might even suggest that the energy and enthusiasm that same-sex couples bring to the institution of marriage may cause unmarried heterosexual couples to take a fresh look at marriage as an option.

Our research has also uncovered additional social benefits. In dozens of interviews with partnered couples and through other sources, we found that marriage rights had an important beneficial effect not only on the couples themselves, but on their local and national communities as well. Couples reported that their relationships were stronger and more durable, that relationships with family members had deepened, that co-workers had become more tolerant and supportive, and their children felt greater validation by having married parents. Many couples reported a greater emphasis on monogamy, which may be reflected by the fact that national rates of HIV and STD infections declined in each of the Scandinavian countries in the years after they passed their partnership laws.

Finally, what about the "slippery slope" argument -- that same-sex marriage would start a dangerous movement toward legal recognition of socially unacceptable relationships? This hasn't happened in Scandinavia; 17 years later, there are still no calls for recognizing polygamy, incestual marriage or marriage to animals. Danes you ask about the slippery slope think you are joking. They realize that same-sex marriages serve essentially the same goal as opposite-sex marriages: lifetime commitment to your better half, the person who completes you.

In short, the sky hasn't fallen. Rather than scapegoating gay couples as the attackers from which marriage needs "defending," pundits and politicians alike should look to no-fault divorce, prenuptial agreements and legal recognition of heterosexual cohabitation as the real culprits of weakened marriage. As the evidence indicates, societies where gay couples have the rights of marriage seem to be doing just fine.

Where's Judicial Restraint? (USAT)

By Peter Sprigg

USA Today, October 27, 2006

The New Jersey Supreme Court has professed respect for judicial restraint by refusing to change the definition of "marriage." But they have imperiously commanded the state Legislature to either redefine marriage itself, or create a "statutory structure" (such as "civil unions") to grant 100% of the legal rights and benefits of marriage to same-sex couples.

This is not judicial restraint. Courts have no power to command the legislative branch to enact a particular law. That the court has given the Legislature a choice (the frying pan or the fire) in no way mitigates this violation of the separation of powers.

The New Jersey Legislature should therefore simply ignore this command. Indeed, we urge them to go further and follow the lead set by 19 other states, by amending the state constitution to define marriage as the union of a man and a woman (and to make clear that only the Legislature may determine and distribute the "benefits of marriage").

The court based its ruling in part on protections against "discrimination" and limited "domestic partnership" rights already granted to homosexuals by the Legislature. This rationale — that because the state offers limited "rights," it must offer more expansive ones — turns logic on its head. It should, however, serve as a cautionary tale for politicians who think that such measures to appease homosexual activists will forestall the counterfeiting of marriage itself. Instead, they merely accelerate it.

Society gives benefits to marriage because marriage gives benefits to society. Therefore, the burden of proof must rest upon the advocates of homosexual unions to demonstrate that such unions benefit society (not just the individuals involved) in the same way and to the same degree as marriage between a man and a woman. Because homosexual unions never result in natural procreation and never provide children with both a mother and a father, this is a burden they simply cannot meet.

A Dangerous Amendment (WP)

EVEN IF YOU oppose same-sex marriage and think its prohibition should be enshrined in state laws and constitutions, there are ample compelling reasons to oppose Virginia's Ballot Question No. 1 on Nov. 7. The amendment, intended to forbid a practice that Virginia already forbids, is vague and fraught with potential for unintended harm to gays and straights alike. Its adoption would herald a season of chaos in the state's courts.

If the proposed amendment simply defined marriage as between a man and a woman, we would still disagree, but at least it would represent no major change from the status quo, since Virginia law has outlawed same-sex marriage for 30 years. But the amendment as written is far broader and murkier. It forbids the government and courts from granting any "legal status" to unmarried couples whose relationship "intends to approximate the design, qualities, significance or effects of marriage" or confers the "rights, benefits, obligations, qualities or effects of marriage."

Among those who might pay the price for this ill-conceived, sloppily drafted measure are: unmarried victims of domestic abuse, whose protections under existing state law could be undercut and challenged in court because of the amendment; Virginia corporations whose efforts to attract top talent can hinge on the benefits they extend to employees' domestic partners; children of unmarried couples, whose parents' private agreements setting out their obligations might be held invalid; and sick people whose medical coverage could be rejected by hospitals because of their domestic arrangements. In general, legal rights and protections would be imperiled for an estimated 130,000 unmarried couples in the state, nearly 90 percent of whom are heterosexual.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and scores of legal scholars and lawyers in Virginia have warned of the judicial mayhem that might result from this amendment. They are not being alarmist: A similar constitutional amendment in Ohio has been fought over in state courts for months and remains in limbo. Virginia voters can avoid such a mess by rejecting this unneeded, pernicious measure.

Ballot Questions 2 and 3 should pass, however. Question No. 2 would strike language from the state constitution banning the incorporation of churches. A federal judge ruled in 2002 that the language violated the U.S. Constitution, making this measure a case of overdue typographical cleanup.

Question No. 3 involves whether to allow local jurisdictions to offer partial property tax exemptions for both new construction and improvements to existing structures in areas of economic blight. Currently, they can give such exemptions only for improvements.

Beyond those ballot questions, bond issues in Arlington, Fairfax, Loudoun and Prince William counties deserve support. Of particular importance are transportation improvement bonds in Arlington, Loudoun and Prince William that would provide desperately needed funding for roads and rail in traffic-choked Northern Virginia -- especially welcome in the absence of significant state assistance. Residents of Loudoun, with its booming school-age population, should also vote for a number of school construction bonds.

Finally, Prince William voters face a special election for state delegate in the 50th District to replace the late Harry J. Parrish. Jeanette Rishell, the Democratic candidate, is the one to choose. Among other strengths, she strongly supports a dedicated source of funding for transportation projects in Virginia; her Republican opponent, Jackson H. Miller, does not.

Single-Sex Schooling (WP)

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

STUDIES OF single-sex education are all over the map, with no one really knowing how effective it is. Still, the decision giving public schools greater freedom to offer all-boys and all-girls instruction is right because of one known certainty: Traditional schools just are not working for a large number of children.

Single-sex education largely disappeared from public schools as a result of the landmark 1972 Title IX law that banned sex discrimination in federally funded education programs. Single-sex instruction was largely limited to gym and sex education classes. Schools for one sex were allowed if a similar school existed for the other sex. The Education Department, in rules announced this week, opened up the field by saying schools can offer single-sex education as long as enrollment is voluntary and if "substantially equal" coeducation is offered to the excluded sex.

Civil rights groups and women's advocates are right to be concerned about possible abuses that could arise from differing assessments of what is "substantially equal," a phrase that, in truth, does give one pause. The past is rife with instances of separate not being equal. But with appropriate safeguards and oversight, communities should have the option to meet the growing demand for single-sex schools. Parents should be able to obtain the appropriate schooling for their children without always having to pay the high tab for private school.

No doubt same-sex schooling is not for everyone and should be offered only under well-thought-out conditions. There is, for example, serious dispute over who would benefit most. Some believe that girls are disadvantaged in traditional classrooms and perform better by themselves. Others contend that low-income children would be helped, while another school of thought argues that high school boys would do better if separated from girls. Such uncertainty points up the need for better research.

Local school districts that want to experiment with single-sex instruction should be encouraged to adopt a meticulous research protocol to demonstrate what works or doesn't work. Then a serious discussion can begin.

The Promise Of Single-Sex Schools (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

The government's long war against single-sex schooling ended Tuesday, when the Department of Education published rules that will make it easier for public educators to offer girls-only and boys-only schools or classes without running afoul of Title IX. That section of the 1972 Education Act barred sex discrimination in all education programs and activities that receive federal funding. While it most famously kicked doors open for female college athletes, it also compelled men-only public universities to admit women.

More recently, however, Title IX has been used to bludgeon elementary- and secondary-school educators who are trying to improve learning opportunities for girls, as well as boys. Inspired by evidence that some children learn better in sex-specific classrooms, more than 240 public and charter schools around the country have begun offering single-sex education (although not all provide it for every course). Most significantly, the typical student is from a low-income, minority family. Parents compete fiercely, often by lottery, for the chance to give their kids the kind of learning environment that wealthier parents regularly pay for at all those single-sex private schools.

Such desperate scrambling might not be necessary if Title IX hadn't banned most single-sex education as discriminatory. The Young Women's Leadership School in East Harlem, which recently sent 100% of its graduating class to college, has thrived largely due to overwhelming community support and political protection -- Hillary Clinton is a champion of it -- that have kept Title IX watchdogs at bay. The threat of ACLU legal action hangs over all single-sex schools and has kept some from ever opening.

As of this week, however, educators can contemplate opening single-sex schools or classes without running afoul of the law. The Education Department now officially says that Title IX does not make single-sex education discriminatory, so long as it is voluntary and takes place in an environment that also includes comparable coeducational schools and classes.

Tom Carroll, chairman of the Brighter Choice Charter Schools in Albany, N.Y., told us that single-sex education is only one tool among many possible approaches that parents and educators can use to improve the nation's troubled public-school system. But he also says that a third of Albany's K-4 public elementary students -- or about 1,150 children -- applied for Brighter Choice's 50 single-sex places last year.

No wonder. Kids at Brighter Choice's single-sex schools (about 98% of whom are minorities) are standouts. They are top scorers in both math and reading-and-writing tests also taken by coed public-school children. Brighter Choice's longer school year and greater number of classroom hours obviously help, Mr. Carroll says. But so does its ability to tailor instruction according to the needs of children at different stages of maturity and development.

In their early years, girls, for instance, often lag behind boys at mastering math concepts. On their own at Bright Choice, they have zoomed forward. Boys, meanwhile, surged ahead of their male counterparts at coed schools in literacy. Mr. Carroll adds that freeing kids from certain notorious distractions in coed classrooms not only helps them concentrate on studying. It can be liberating as well. Girls, who often "won't assume leadership positions in the classroom if there are boys there they want to impress," grow bolder. And "without girls to impress," he adds, it's easier to get boys to "recite poetry" and explore "visual and performing arts."

You might think that the National Organization for Women would applaud efforts to empower young girls. Or that Sen. Edward Kennedy, the product of a boys-only private school, would want to see the opportunities he enjoyed extended to young disadvantaged males. Yet they, like the ACLU, see the Education Department's new rules as a green light for "discrimination" and "stereotyping" and, in Sen. Kennedy's words, "a setback for civil-rights protection."

For many parents, though, clinging to this liberal ideology is not an option. They want the real fruits of equality for their children, and an important civil right that is currently being denied to them: a decent education.

Gilead Gets Antitrust OK For Myogen Deal (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 27, 2006

Government Ends Antitrust Waiting Period Early for Gilead Sciences' Purchase of Myogen

FOSTER CITY, Calif. (AP) -- Biotechnology company Gilead Sciences Inc. said Thursday that the customary waiting period needed for its purchase of Myogen Inc. has been terminated early by federal regulatory officials.

The Federal Trade Commission terminated the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 before its expiration date, according to Gilead Sciences.

Earlier this month, the company announced plans to buy Westminster, Colo.-based Myogen Inc. for $2.5 billion. Gilead Sciences previously stated that its tender offer and associated withdrawal rights will expire Nov. 10 unless extended. The company expects the tender offer to close by the end of the fourth quarter of 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0087004

Shares of Gilead Sciences Inc. fell 15 cents to $69.20 in after-hours trading, following an earlier close at $69.35 on the Nasdaq. Shares of Myogen Inc. rose 18 cents Thursday to close at $52.30 on the Nasdaq.

Clear Channel Race Spotlights Limits Posed By Ownership Rules; 'LBOing Of Western Civilization' (WSJ)

By DENNIS K. BERMAN And SARAH MCBRIDE

Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

With a growing list of radio, newspaper and television assets on the auction block, some new players are on the verge of assembling the conglomerate of the 21st century: the private-equity media empire.

That became all the more apparent when Clear Channel Communications Inc., one of the nation's largest owners of radio stations and outdoor billboards, put itself up for sale on Wednesday. Buyout groups are hungry to get control of the San Antonio company, which has a stock-market value of $17.5 billion.

Yet many of the same private-equity players chasing Clear Channel are either in the hunt for other media assets or already partial owners of them. That could complicate matters, because of federal rules aimed at making sure no one voice controls too many media outlets.

Private-equity firms, which purchase businesses with an eye toward improving and selling them for a profit, are on an unprecedented binge, buying up bigger and bigger companies. Their interest in media companies comes as the firms become ever more powerful players in many American businesses, from doughnut outlets to auto-parts makers, and are the subject of increasing scrutiny. The firms already are facing a Justice Department inquiry into whether any colluded with each other to drive down prices they pay for companies.

The latest buzz-phrase among Wall Street bankers who arrange leveraged-buyouts is telling: "The LBOing of Western Civilization."

Indeed, the media-buyout frenzy involves lots of overlapping players. Providence Equity Partners is part of a group trying to win control of Clear Channel's 1,150 radio stations and other assets. Earlier this year, Providence was also part of a group that purchased Univision Communications Inc., which owns radio stations and the Univision Spanish-language TV network. It's also part of a group weighing a bid for Tribune Co., which owns newspapers and TV stations.

Providence already owns stakes in movie library Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc., Warner Music Group and Freedom Communications Inc., publisher of the Orange County (Calif.) Register newspaper.

Even if Providence ends up with just part of Clear Channel, it would have a huge interest in big markets around the country. Consider Miami, where Clear Channel owns seven radio stations, and Univision owns four radio stations plus two television stations.

A three-member consortium consisting of Providence, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., and Blackstone Group, has been in discussions with Clear Channel for weeks, people familiar with the matter say. In recent days, the group offered $35 a share, said a person familiar with the matter. Clear Channel, which was up yesterday $3.13, or 9.7%, at $35.48 a share in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange, rejected the offer.

Clear Channel said on Wednesday that it was exploring "strategic alternatives" -- essentially an open invitation to bidders. At least two other groups are considering offers: One includes Thomas H. Lee Partners, Texas Pacific Group, and Bain Capital. The other includes Cerberus Capital Management and Oak Hill Partners. Bids are due Nov. 10, and still other bidders could emerge.

Cerberus and Oak Hill wouldn't have any problem with Federal Communications Commission media-ownership rules. But the other two might, given their existing media holdings.

These rules prohibit a single company from owning more than eight radio stations in any one market and generally ban cross-ownership of daily newspapers and broadcast assets in any one market.

For private-equity investors, there are ways to avoid triggering the rules, legal experts say. They can set up their interest in the target media company as a limited partnership and formally insulate the limited partners from involvement in the management of the business. One person close to the Providence-led group said that it was considering the use of a "trust" structure to guard against problems with media-ownership rules.

The FCC rules are strict on this point, media lawyers say. The limited partnership's governing documents must include provisions prohibiting partners from providing services, becoming employees and communicating on day-to-day business affairs with the underlying broadcast company.

Private-equity companies specialize in trying to make companies more profitable, so most would want to have a direct say in the target companies' operations. They might be banking on something else: The FCC is revisiting the rules, with comments from interested parties due earlier this week and replies due in December. A private-equity suitor could likely win an 18-month waiver on ownership requirements, and hope that the rules will be loosened in the meantime.

That rules process, however, could take a while and could get bogged down in court challenges. And if Democrats take control of one or both chambers of Congress, they might resist the Republican-controlled FCC's efforts to loosen ownership limits.

If necessary, the media companies could sell off less valuable assets in markets where the ownership rules came into play. Besides bringing them into compliance, such sales would help fund the pricey buyouts.

Private ownership would create a lower-pressure environment for slow-performing media companies, giving them a chance to prime their businesses for better growth. "I've seen my company grow every year, because I've been able to invest in technology and marketing," says Peter Smyth, president and chief executive of Greater Media Inc., one of the largest privately held radio companies in the U.S., who thinks he couldn't have made the necessary investments under public scrutiny. "You have to have a long-term vision, and Wall Street is not conducive to long-term visions."

Merger Dents Sprint's Results (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Sprint Nextel's customers, fed up with dropped calls and a service that hasn't kept up with the features offered by mobile phone competitors, left the company in droves last quarter.

That, alongside a tumbling stock price and dramatic changes in the executive lineup, led to a disappointing three months for the Reston company.

It posted a profit of $247 million (8 cents per share) on revenue of $10.5 billion for the quarter ended Sept. 30. That compares with $516 million profit (23 cents) for the same period last year on revenue of $7.83 billion.

One year after Sprint and Nextel merged, the firm is investing in a faster, more advanced network and working on partnerships to sell more of its services. Still, during a conference call yesterday, president and chief executive Gary D. Forsee acknowledged the troubles, which largely stem from thousands of the core customers defecting to competitors because of poor service.

Sprint lost 2.4 percent of its customer base every month during its third quarter -- a rate much higher than that of Cingular Wireless, which lost customers at a rate of 1.8 percent a month and last week posted a 280 percent increase in its net income.

Overall, Sprint, the country's third biggest carrier, landed 233,000 new customers during the quarter. It lost about 188,000 customers who are on contract plans and pay monthly, but offset that loss with gains elsewhere, including those who use month-to-month prepaid services.

Verizon Wireless is expected to announce its third-quarter results next week.

"Our operating results are not what we and you expected," Forsee told Wall Street analysts during the conference call.

The company spun off its local phone division, Embarq, and now operates a wireless and long-distance division.

Cingular and Verizon Wireless are benefiting from Sprint's decline because they haven't made Sprint's missteps, said Jonathan Atkin, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets. Those companies invest more consistently in their networks, and have offered a greater array of new phone devices, as well as package deals that appeal to families, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0087006

Sprint plans to release a hybrid phone next month that works on both Sprint's and Nextel's networks, a move that could reduce customer dissatisfaction, Atkin said.

"[Sprint is] in rebuilding mode, and they're going to be in rebuilding mode for a while," particularly in 24 markets like Los Angeles and New York, where the Nextel network is overtaxed and dropping calls, Atkin said.

When the two companies merged in August 2005, the company's executives set high expectations that the marriage of two wireless companies would produce a powerful behemoth that would partner with cable companies and deliver a host of new services. But the company has struggled to manage two very different mobile phone networks, as well as combine two very different corporate cultures.

"We know the challenges . . . we operate two wireless networks, manage the Sprint and Nextel brands, and . . . integrate the cultures," Forsee said. "There remains substantial work ahead of us."

During the most recent quarter, Sprint did invest more in the development of an advanced high-speed network called WiMax, Forsee said. Sprint is also trying to market itself as a wireless wholesaler, and has partnered with 12 cable companies to sell wireless and Internet-phone services.

"The question is: Can they stabilize the bleeding at this point?" said Christopher King, senior analyst with Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. "It's certainly going to be a challenge for Forsee."

In August, the company ousted chief operating officer and longtime Sprint executive Len Lauer.

Then, earlier this month, company chairman Timothy Donahue, the ruddy, pep-talking former chief of Nextel who led that company through its entrepreneurial years, announced plans to leave the board by the end of the year. Donahue, who previously said he would stay on the board until August 2007, would have been an ideal person to oversee the launch of the new advanced network, King said.

Shares of the company closed up $1.18 yesterday at $18.90 a share, a boost analysts attributed to a hope that the company has hit its nadir.

Bunge Reaches Pollution Settlement (AP)

By Jim Suhr, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

ST. LOUIS --Oilseed processor Bunge North America Inc. and three of its subsidiaries agreed Thursday to pay $13.9 million in a pollution settlement with the federal government, the Justice Department announced.

As part of the deal, the government said, the St. Louis-based unit of Bunge Ltd. will clean up emissions at 11 soybean-processing plants and one corn plant in eight states, eventually cutting more than 2,200 tons of harmful pollution emissions a year.

The settlement, outlined in a consent decree filed by the Justice Department in federal court in Urbana, Ill., follows others with fellow oilseed processors Cargill Inc. and Archer Daniels Midland Co. The decree will be subject to a 30-day public comment period and subsequent judicial approval.

According to the government, Bunge or a subsidiary violated the federal Clean Air Act at some or all of the dozen plants with "major" modifications of those sites without getting permits or adhering to pollution controls, the Justice Department said.

In settling the matter, Bunge will spend an estimated $12 million on emission-curbing projects and pay a $625,000 cash penalty, which will be divided among the U.S. government and the eight states.

The company will spend more than $1.25 million on community-based environmental projects in the affected states, including removing mercury, lead or asbestos from Louisiana schools and retrofitting diesel school buses and other vehicles in Indiana, Ohio, Kansas, Iowa and Alabama. Bunge also will provide environmental education in Kansas and residential lead abatement in Illinois.

"This agreement acknowledges the steps Bunge has taken and will take to ensure that we meet or exceed all applicable environmental regulations," said Carl Hausmann, Bunge North America's president and chief executive. "Bunge is committed to being a good citizen in the communities we serve, which includes operating our business in a safe and environmentally responsible manner."

The Environmental Protection Agency "expects companies to act responsibly and within the law when it comes to protecting public health and the environment," Granta Nakayama, the EPA's assistant administrator for the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance, said in a statement.

The settlement covers soybean-processing plants in the Illinois communities of Cairo and Danville; Delphos and Marion in Ohio; the Indiana cities of Decatur and Morristown; Decatur, Ala.; Marks, Miss.; Destrehan, La.; Emporia, Kan.; and Council Bluffs, Iowa. Also affected is a corn plant in Danville, Ill.

Shares of Bunge rose $3.83, or 6.5 percent, to close at $62.69 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange, then dipped 24 cents in aftermarket trading.

State-federal Water Deal Draws Criticism (AP)

By Susan Gallagher

AP, October 27, 2006

HELENA (AP) — Montana water rights for the U.S. Forest Service are in a proposed agreement that state and federal officials tout as a major step forward, but a leading conservation group opposes.

The Montana Reserved Water Rights Compact Commission and the Forest Service unveiled the agreement this fall and have been taking public comment at meetings, the last of them scheduled for Monday in Billings. Officials, who will accept written comment until Nov. 15, may tweak the document before submitting it to the Legislature for action this winter. Approval by the Legislature, the governor and the federal Agriculture and Justice departments is needed for the agreement to become final.

It lays out water rights for the Forest Service, rights agreed upon through negotiations that began in 1992 and accelerated with the hiring of a mediator last fall.

Forest Service needs include water for ranger stations, work centers, tree nurseries, road construction and firefighting. The agreement encompasses those needs, and for 77 streams it establishes what are known as “in-stream flow rights” for fish-inhabited waters that pass through national forests.

Commission Chairman Chris Tweeten of the state attorney general’s office called the agreement a “good deal for Montana,” and Forest Service spokeswoman Paula Nelson said the state and the Forest Service “have both come out winners.”

Fish conservation group Trout Unlimited has a different view.

“It’s a really, really bad proposal,” Bruce Farling, the group’s executive director for Montana, said Thursday. Problems include inadequate in-stream flow rights, according to Farling, who said Trout Unlimited may propose amendments during the legislative session.

Besides establishing rights for the 77 streams, the agreement sets up a process for the Forest Service to apply for future rights on hundreds of other streams, Nelson said. Given that it took years to agree on the 77, it appears unlikely that seeking timely action for hundreds more will be a Forest Service priority, Farling said.

“We now have a process to do the others,” Nelson responded. “Our plan wold be to prioritize the streams as soon as the Legislature and that process is over, and move forward.”

Another group with a stake, the Montana Stockgrowers Association, said state and federal negotiators appear to have done a good job. But the association has some concerns, which include ensuring that holders of national forest grazing permits are not precluded from sending stream water through small pipelines to supply cattle, lawyer John Bloomquist said.

DOJ_NMG_0087008

The agreement addresses water rights tied to congressional or presidential action that reserves lands, such as those in the national forest or national park systems. Such rights must be addressed either in the courts or through negotiation of an agreement.

"It's important that this has been dealt with outside the courts, and we hope that means it saves the taxpayer an awful lot of money," Nelson said.

Written comments on the agreement can be submitted via the Web site of the Montana Department of Natural Resources and Conservation.

'Treatment Wetlands' Clean Up Some Cities' Sewage (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Cleaning up America's dirty water usually requires loads of chemicals, vast concrete tanks and huge pipes. Now some communities are turning to a more pleasant method of coping with sewage and polluted runoff: wetlands, complete with greenery and birdsong.

Cities are installing systems that send partially cleaned sewage to wetlands, which suck up even more pollution from the water. Local authorities are also turning to wetlands to store and cleanse the filthy water that runs off highways and pavement after a rainstorm.

Such "treatment wetlands" not only soak up pollution but also provide habitat for birds and other wildlife. And they require less energy and manpower than traditional sewage treatment systems, so they're often cheaper to operate.

"Wetlands are nature's amazing cleaning machines," says Benjamin Grumbles, chief of water issues for the Environmental Protection Agency. "Whether natural or manmade, they can do a lot of work, and we're encouraging their use increasingly."

Some places where treatment wetlands are under consideration or construction:

•West Palm Beach, Fla. The city's new sewage treatment system and treatment wetland will be officially dedicated on Thursday. Treated sewage will flow through 1,600 acres of wetlands that will remove chemicals that act as fertilizers. Such chemicals are harmful to the ocean and the Everglades, where native vegetation can be killed by low levels of fertilizer.

The city is restoring a wetland that was overgrown by foreign plants that crowd out native species. The city also built boardwalks and trails through it to encourage residents to visit.

•Chicago and its suburbs. The regional sewage agency is investigating whether to build a treatment wetland next to an expanding sewage plant. The plant will be required for the first time to cleanse the sewage of a chemical that acts as a fertilizer, and a wetland could do so naturally, says Dick Lanyon, head of the Metropolitan Water Reclamation District of Greater Chicago.

A wetland would be cheaper, too, "because you won't have any pumps or piping involved. You don't have any expenditures for chemicals," Lanyon says. "We'd be letting the wetlands do their work."

•Phoenix. A small wetland built as a test project has been helping scrub the city's sewage for more than a decade. The cattails, bulrushes and other plants in it host microbes that help break down waste products. Sunlight and exposure to the air also help.

The city now hopes to build a 1,500-acre wetland to help scrub away fertilizing chemicals from the water. The wetland would also cleanse the treated sewage of medications, which sewage plants do a poor job of removing.

The city wanted "more than just more concrete-and-steel treatment plant out of this," says Alice Brawley-Chesworth of the city's Water Services Department. The new wetland, which will be built when Congress allocates the funds, will also provide wildlife habitat, flood control and recreation.

Despite the high hopes, the EPA's Grumbles warns that wetlands are not a panacea for America's water pollution. No wetland can handle large volumes of raw sewage, he says, or water contaminated with industrial chemicals. Wetlands excel at wiping the last traces of pollution from sewage but aren't suited to tackling water direct from the nation's toilets and sinks.

Even with those limits, wetlands are drawing interest from environmental officials in small towns and large cities alike. In Louisiana, local agencies are even hoping to use wetlands to avoid costly repairs to a sewage treatment plant damaged by Hurricane Katrina. The remaining fertilizers in the treated sewage would also help rebuild the devastated marshes on the coast.

Environmental officials are also enthusiastic about wetlands' ability to deal with water that runs off paved surfaces after a storm. Such runoff carries huge loads of pollution to rivers and streams and even changes the shape of riverbeds.

If runoff is channeled to wetlands, the water can be stripped of motor oil, road salt and other contaminants before it washes into natural waterways. And a stop in a wetland slows runoff, making it less prone to cause erosion.

Officials in Independence, Mo., are looking into transforming an abandoned sewage lagoon into a wetland, to trap the water that rolls off a nearby highway. They'd do some excavation for better water flow and add native plants.

"If we can use nature to help us, that's what we want to do," says Dick Champion, the city's director of water pollution control and president of the association for sewage agencies.

BLM Says Counties Haven't Proved Road Claims, Case Should Be Dismissed (SLT)

By Joe Baird, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 27, 2006

A federal judge on Thursday heard arguments calling for the dismissal of a lawsuit Kane and Garfield counties have filed against the Interior Department over the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument land-use plan.

Attorneys for the Justice Department and a coalition of environmental groups told Judge Ted Stewart that the counties' claims to roads and water rights in the monument were overly broad - and deserve to be rejected.

Justice Department attorney Tom Snodgrass said the counties have failed to prove any of their road ownership claims in the monument beyond four routes that were recognized in the land-use plan. And he defended the Bureau of Land Management's decision to restrict the use of off-highway vehicles on those roads, arguing that they fell under the scope of the BLM's larger land management responsibilities.

Snodgrass also said the county fell short in proving its water rights have been thwarted, noting the BLM's authority to protect the monument's water resources is backed by federal law.

"It's not enough to disagree [with the land-use plan]. They have to show they are being injured - and they have not," he said of the counties' arguments.

Attorney Shawn Welch, representing Kane and Garfield counties, argued that the agency's refusal to recognize their larger road ownership rights has compromised the counties' transportation system. And he challenged the BLM's ability to halt what he called a legitimate diversion of water that would not impair monument resources.

"That's a decision for the Utah state engineer," Welch said.

Stewart took the arguments under advisement, but was openly skeptical of the federal government's claims during the one-hour hearing.

"There has been a long history of the BLM and the counties working together," Stewart said. "Acknowledgements [of county claims] were made," during the planning process.

Should the agency now, he asked, "pretend that this doesn't exist?"

Stewart's presence on the bench Thursday was notable, because he has often recused himself from public lands cases.

A former director of the Utah Department of Natural Resources, Stewart was openly critical of the creation of the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument when it was established by President Clinton in 1996.

"That was a day of infamy for some of us," Stewart told The Salt Lake Tribune in 1996, when he was Natural Resources director.

Calif. Fire Started By Arsonist Kills 4 (HC/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle, October 27, 2006

POPPET FLAT, Calif. — A wind-whipped wildfire started by an arsonist killed four firefighters Thursday and stranded up to 400 people in an RV park when flames burned to the edge of the only road out, officials said.

"Everybody is hunkered down here. They're fighting the fire around us. It's across the street from us," said Charles Van Brunt, a ranger at the station at the entrance to Silent Valley Club, the recreational vehicle park near Palm Springs. The residents were in no immediate danger, he said.

Authorities asked people in the RV park to stay put to leave roads clear for firefighters. Hundreds of others in the area were forced from their homes.

Fire officials said the blaze was deliberately set around 1 a.m. and had blackened 10,000 acres within 12 hours. Fire Chief John Hawkins said the arson "constitutes murder."

It was the deadliest wildfire firefighting disaster in the United States since July 10, 2001, when four firefighters were killed in Washington's Okanogan National Forest. They died after becoming trapped by flames on a dusty dead-end road in a remote canyon.

The Forest Service crew was trying to protect a house as dry desert winds of 25 mph or more blew a wall of flames down on them in the hills northwest of Palm Springs.

"They had left their truck to do structure protection when the fire overran them," said Forest Service spokesman Pat Boss, adding that the flames came down so quickly they had no time to retreat to their engine or use protective sheltering.

Three firefighters died at the scene, and two were hospitalized in critical condition. One of those two died several hours later. The other had burns over 95 percent of his body, Boss said.

The surviving firefighter had severe respiratory damage, said Dr. Dev Gnanadev, a trauma surgeon at Arrowhead Regional Medical Center.

"Overall, the chances of survival are low when you have that bad of an injury," he said at a news conference.

Thursday's deaths brought to 19 the number of California firefighters killed in the line of duty over the past year, according to statistics kept by California Professional Firefighters, a lobbying organization.

Boss said the Forest Service pulled all its personnel off the fire after the deaths so they could "gather their thoughts, say their prayers."

Another official believed the blaze was set just as the winds picked up in order to maximize destruction. Riverside County Sheriff Bob Doyle dispatched homicide detectives to the scene to work with FBI agents during the investigation.

Authorities planned to offer a $100,000 reward in the case.

"Turn that scum in, please," Riverside County Supervisor Marion Ashley said.

The fire blackened nearly 16 square miles and destroyed at least five homes. The weather service had issued a "red flag" warning for extreme fire danger because of the high winds and dry conditions.

Thick smoke blanketed the small RV park, where as many as 400 people were stranded, authorities said. TV footage showed some vehicles racing through flames and smoke just before firefighters closed the road.

Van Brunt said people were advised to "watch the news and stay comfy."

The fire was stymied by a firebreak created around Poppet Flat and the RV park years earlier, sheriff's Cpl. Todd Garvin said.

"This is a safe haven here. That was cleared about six years ago and it still works. It's amazing," Garvin said.

Some residents of Poppet Flat sought shelter at the RV park, officials said.

The fire started early Thursday, burning in a valley with a few scattered ranch homes. The hamlets of Poppet Ranch and Twin Pines were evacuated along with a juvenile detention center, Twin Pines Boys Ranch.

In all, nearly 700 people were evacuated, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger told reporters in Sacramento.

Construction contractor Charlie Miner suffered minor burns when he drove his backhoe through the flames to escape in Twin Pines. "It was so intense I was screaming," Miner said. "Sparks were flying everywhere."

The firefighters who were killed were members of a five-person crew based in the nearby town of Idyllwild, Boss said. Their names were not immediately released.

"I knew probably all of them," he said. "They were very personal friends."

As news of the deaths spread, friends stopped at the Idyllwild ranger station to express their sympathies.

DOJ_NMG_0087011

"You guys are our saving grace," said Emily Pearson, as she hugged Boss. "It shouldn't have happened." Pearson said she had lived in the area 35 years, and her family knew all five firefighters.

The strong winds fed the blaze oxygen and dried out the region's already parched vegetation, Hawkins said.

The fire could be seen burning along ridgelines, with flames leaping as high as 100 feet into the air. Pillars of smoke were quickly blown away, and at one point, smoke could be smelled on the Pacific coast, 100 miles away.

Timo Hargu, 61, said he rushed from his hilltop home with his two dogs after he looked out a window and saw fire burning toward him in a valley.

"The whole thing was ablaze with flame," he said. "It was the most spectacular view. A terrible view, but spectacular."

By nightfall the fire's main front was pushing west toward Lambs Canyon, a sparsely populated, rugged area with brush several feet high, said Diana Newcomb, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Forestry.

Residents of Poppet Flat were told they could leave the RV park and go home. Visitors who came in RVs were told to stay put because firefighters did not want motor homes clogging the road.

Rigs On The Skyline And Gas Far Below (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

FORT WORTH, Oct. 20 — Boston had the Big Dig. Now Fort Worth has the big drill.

Under golf courses, schools, parks, libraries, airports and dozens of neighborhoods, some of the nation's leading independent energy companies are scouring the city in search of the best locations to recover one of the largest concentrations of natural gas in the United States.

Everyone seems to be lining up for a share in the bonanza. The American Cancer Society recently made $5 million just by selling its mineral rights to land that had been donated years ago. The Girl Scouts leased their mineral rights for drilling under a summer camp for an undisclosed amount.

It may not be a rerun of "The Beverly Hillbillies." And energy executives say it will not tear up the heart of the city, as Boston's trouble-plagued highway construction project did.

But it is a replay of sorts of the oil drilling booms that roused and remade Los Angeles and Oklahoma City in the 1920's and 1930's. And with rigs lighted up like Christmas trees on the city's periphery at night, it is the biggest urban drilling boom in the nation today.

The surging interest in tapping gas trapped in the so-called Barnett Shale that veins through Fort Worth is only the beginning of a new far-flung search by wildcatters now exploring Alabama, Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Texas for a big new source of shale natural gas.

The new drilling wave comes not only at a time when domestic gas production has stalled and demand for cleaner gas energy is increasing, but when new drilling technologies and relatively high gas prices make the exploitation of shale economically feasible for the first time.

Not everybody in Fort Worth is happy about the prospect of all this drilling. But this time the advances in exploration technologies mean that most residents are not going to hear, smell or even see the drilling under their land.

That is because the holes are dug as much as a mile away, and the drills, thousands of feet down, reach out horizontally — not straight down — to the shale gas underneath the city. Only a few people are actually going to get rich, but there will be a lot of money floating around.

"It's manna from heaven!" said Bishop Kenneth B. Spears of the First St. John Baptist Church, whose predominantly black neighborhood in southeast Fort Worth suddenly finds itself in the middle of one very big energy play.

Still, some in the neighborhood fear potential accidents, while others are suspicious of the motives of rich energy companies.

For all his enthusiasm, Bishop Spears, who recently received a $21,000 signing bonus to allow Dale Resources to drill for natural gas in the underground shale directly beneath his church, acknowledges the mixed feelings. He promises to use any new church riches to start a fund that will help people get out of debt and start businesses in the neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0087012

He also leads a Y.M.C.A. across the street, which got an even fatter check, and Dale money is going to fix up a baseball field down the block as a good will gesture to the neighborhood.

In a recent sermon, Bishop Spears compared Dale's payments to the gifts given by Joseph to his brethren in the Old Testament. "I got a lot of 'amens' and 'hallelujahs', but there was also a loud 'hmm,' " he recalled in an interview. "It's just not every day a white guy comes up and wants to give any black a check. People are concerned that 'someone is going to come and take what I own.' "

The big "hmm" reflects an anxiety in Fort Worth neighborhoods of all races that drilling could bring some kind of explosion or accident that could ruin drinking water. Trucks carrying water to the rigs could disrupt sleep, many fear, and some claim the companies are not paying residents fairly.

Fears grew when a gas well explosion in April killed a drilling company employee in Forest Hill, a suburb. Several other suburban neighborhoods are upset over new wells appearing almost in their backyards and that concern has spread to urban communities.

One neighborhood association in Morningside Park, another black neighborhood, has rejected all drilling under a three-block area. So far the organized opposition has been small, but some politicians and activists predict protests may pick up as drilling in the center of the city becomes more intense.

"Money isn't everything," said Paul Moss, 62, an aluminum factory supervisor who lives in Morningside Park. "Peace of mind is better than money."

But the anxiety is joined by an equally, if not more powerful money-loving giddiness from the drilling boom that has hit this sprawling city of 700,000, which often lives in the shadow of nearby Dallas.

"If you don't have a gas well, get one!" exclaims a yellow billboard along a Fort Worth stretch of Interstate 30. Residents are receiving fliers offering them $200 and $300 bonuses and promises of royalties for years to come if they allow energy companies to drill several thousand feet under their homes.

The city's gas riches are "not only going to benefit this generation but generations to come," said the mayor, Mike Moncrief, who happens to come from a family of traditional wildcatters. "It is without question allowing us to float everyone's boat higher."

He said the city government had received $10.4 million in bonuses and royalties from 613 wells in various stages of development around the city, just in the last year or so. And "we've only just started," he said.

The Barnett Shale gas field was discovered in 1981 and stretches over 15 North Texas counties. Its 5,000-square-mile reservoir is already the second-largest-producing land-based domestic natural gas field after the San Juan Basin in New Mexico and Colorado.

The first drill in Fort Worth came online in July 2005, and the city has leased more than 2,400 public acres alone for natural gas development.

The changes are unsettling to some. "I love prairies and I hate to see them gobbled up by development and gas drilling," said Don Young, a local activist. "There's a big dark secret nobody's talking about: Real estate will go down the tubes and there will be an environmental impact."

The United States Geological Survey now estimates that the entire Barnett Shale field contains 27 trillion cubic feet of gas, about what the nation consumes in 15 months. Recent studies suggest the core of the shale field may rest precisely beneath the city's high-rise banks, trendy restaurants and some black neighborhoods that have never benefited from oil and gas before.

Estimates of the size of Barnett Shale's reserves are rapidly increasing; the field is starting to make a big impact on the nation's gas business at a time of declining domestic production and projections of rising demand. Gas executives predict that the current production of 1.5 billion cubic feet a day — 2.5 percent of the national output — has the potential to climb to 3 billion to 4 billion cubic feet a day in a few years.

"It is providing security to the national energy picture," said Stephen J. Hadden, senior vice president for exploration and production at Devon Energy, the biggest driller in the Barnett Shale field. This North Texas gas, he said, "will mitigate to a degree some of the decline we see coming from the more mature gas resources around the country. It may temper prices."

DOJ_NMG_0087013

The reserves of natural gas are caught in the cracks and crevices of an underground shale structure that runs as deep as 7,000 feet. They were generally inaccessible until a new process developed in the 1990's and known as hydraulic fracturing or simply fraccing allowed drilling companies to use high-pressure blasts of water and sand to release the gas.

And the advent of horizontal drilling allows producers to build drilling pods from which mile-long spokes of pipes spread thousands of feet under residential neighborhoods.

The early successes have led drilling companies to start exploiting other shale fields around the country.

Companies had been reluctant to drill inside Fort Worth's central city. The technical and political challenges of exploring in an urban area were large. But Lawrence B. Dale, president of Dale Resources, a small independent drilling company in Dallas, decided to take a chance.

With 23 years of exploring widely for natural gas, Mr. Dale, now 53, said that he had decided to spend more time with his family and drill closer to home.

Three years ago, he began selling off his East Texas production wells. He then leased about 90 sites around Fort Worth where drilling would stir less of a protest: areas in or abutting industrial zones close to pipelines.

"It was completely a wildcat venture," he said, noting that seismic work could not be done under a dense urban area. "We didn't know. We thought, but we didn't know."

Mr. Dale's company has already invested $100 million in the field, but he said he realized that it would take much deeper pockets than he had to develop the city's gas potential fully.

Having already sold some wells to Chesapeake Energy, a bigger gas company, he said that in the future "we will enter into strategic alliances and partial property sales with larger companies that have the capital, the equipment and the balance sheet to develop a major field like this."

Mr. Dale was quick to locate and buy up most of the good drilling sites — those that are relatively unobtrusive to gas-rich neighborhoods but in easy reach of them.

Mr. Dale said he was well aware of local concerns, and was working to address them. His company constructs high berms and sound blankets and develops green spaces around rig sites to ameliorate disturbances. Signs are put up in affected neighborhoods with the phone number of his director of community affairs who is available to answer questions, listen to complaints and even make house calls any hour of the day or night.

"I sleep in my cowboy boots," joked David Buchanan, Dale's director of community affairs.

Most neighborhoods appear ready to go along. The City Council recently tried to calm concerns by setting minimum distances between wells and existing residences and stiffened rules over hours of operation and noise.

But the jitters persist.

People became alarmed a few weeks ago when signs went up in the small central city black neighborhood of Greenway Place stating that Dale would soon establish a rig site on the other side of a local park. Most had already signed up to have drilling done under their homes from a separate rig, but they did not like the surprise.

Dale sponsored a barbecue to explain.

"I can barbecue at home," said the Rev. Raymond Oliver of the Progressive Missionary Baptist Church, who had been an early supporter of Dale's efforts before the new signs went up. "You telling me we don't get paid for a well on my front door and we don't get royalties? I got a problem about that."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Home FBI Gets Ritzy While Others Lack Crime-fighting Funds (SH)

By DAN K. THOMASSON

Scripps News, October 27, 2006

At a time when taxpayers are being socked millions of dollars a day for Iraq and national security initiatives, the FBI _ America's front line against terrorism _ is spending $32 million on a new subheadquarters on a onetime Northern Virginia horse farm that is being dubbed the "Taj Mahal" by its own agents because of its opulence.

The building will house 150 agents and various support personnel who are an extension of the bureau's Washington Field Office and who are responsible for the southern suburbs of the nation's capital. The justification for this move is that the close-in Fairfax County space that had housed the operations had become too cramped and that changing demographics made moving further south attractive.

But here's the rub: Most of the bureau's business in this area still is in the densely populated environs just on either side of the beltway. The agents now will be miles and many traffic jams (not to mention gallons of gas) away in Prince William County at the very edge of the metro complex. While that area has grown substantially, it will be several decades before it reaches the size and importance of the closer suburbs.

This once again emphasizes an FBI trend to move out of traditional government space both for security and to further establish its independent image _ one removed from the Department of Justice. That concept was first established when the bureau departed the department's Pennsylvania Avenue building and set up shop in a monolithic fortress-like structure it constructed down the block, removing itself from the shadow of the attorney general and his staff.

In the late 90s the bureau, because of congressional indulgence, found itself with an excess of funds that permitted it to begin abandoning federal building space it shared with other agencies throughout the country. It contended that the Oklahoma City bombing had shown these structures to be security risks. It began constructing its own field and residential office buildings from coast to coast, including even in Anchorage, considered one of the more remote posts. One residential office that was assigned responsibility for only a few counties in a Midwestern state moved into an elaborate structure that has remained half empty when there was ample space in a nearby federal building, prompting one wag to crack that "they were building for the new century _ the 25th century."

Most of this questionable use of money appears to have fit not only the bureau's paranoia, but also former director Louis Freeh's idea of a cabinet level FBI separate from and equal with the department. His efforts to abolish and absorb other federal law enforcement agencies and to establish a large international presence were no secret.

The FBI's building spree has caused increasing concerns about the creation of a national police force with sweeping power, a concept this nation has sought to avoid despite the bureau's steady encroachment on responsibilities assigned other state, local and federal agencies including drugs, firearms, explosives, gang organizations and even prostitution. The one area with which it seems not to be terribly comfortable is the most important _ counter intelligence. Official inquiries since 9-11 have found the bureau seriously deficient in that area despite promises of reform.

It seems amazing that the bureau's keen sense of public relations would not foresee bad publicity over the announcement of a new building with soaring atrium and terrazzo floors and engraved elevator doors particularly at a time when other federal agencies have trouble finding the funds to carry out their efforts in fighting rising levels of violent crime. The 15-acre campus will have jogging and hiking trails and picnic tables, for heaven's sake. Even anonymous agents quoted in news reports of the project voiced some embarrassment while others expressed frustration over the prospect of having to travel as far as 40 miles to carry out some duties.

The responsibility for this arrogant disdain for fiscal prudence lies both with Congress and the administration. Both have all but abandoned oversight of the bureau. Every FBI-excess is excused in Congress as though J. Edgar Hoover and his secret files still were hanging over Capitol Hill. Down the block at the Justice Department the attorney general would seem to roll over for any bureau demand. Even before 9-11, that was the case unless we have forgotten Waco and Ruby Ridge.

Perhaps the agents housed in the Taj Mahal on the former farm can ride their horses to and from town when things get jammed up on Route 66 or I-95, which happens daily at most any hour. But then they would have to build an elaborate, bombproof stable in which to house them.

Daytona Man Gets 11 Years In Meth Case (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, October 26, 2006

Orlando -- A federal judge on Wednesday sentenced a Daytona Beach mechanic to nearly 11 years in prison for his role in a methamphetamine drug ring in Volusia County.

DOJ_NMG_0087015

Phillip "Yeta" Crimi, 54, is the only one of 22 co-defendants who chose to go to trial after raids and arrests by federal, state and local agents as part of Operation Speedway II in August 2005.

In 2003, 14 people were prosecuted in the first phase of the investigation by a Drug Enforcement Administration-led task force.

U.S. District Judge Gregory Presnell also ordered Crimi to serve five years on probation.

He was convicted after a three-day jury trial in March and faced testimony from former partners and associates, most of whom reached plea agreements with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

They include Mark Schuster, Crimi's one-time drug-business partner who is serving a four-year prison term; Shannon Marrs, a fellow motorcycle mechanic who received 31/2 years in prison; and acquaintances Michael Moore and Christie Ray Corzine, both of whom are serving a year in prison.

Others received sentences ranging from two years of probation to nearly six years in prison.

A confidential informant, identified in court as Herschel Wornack, did not face prosecution while he cooperated with federal authorities and set up undercover methamphetamine buys from Crimi.

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, Robert Perez, Christine Dellert, Ramsey Campbell and Etan Horowitz of the Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

Man Guilty In Officer's Shooting (AC)

Annapolis Capital, October 26, 2006

Severn man belonged to drug gang dubbed 'Pioneer City Boys'By ERIC HARTLEY, Staff Writer

A Severn man was convicted in federal court yesterday of shooting a county police officer in 2004 and being part of a crack cocaine-dealing organization called the "Pioneer City Boys."

Calvin Ignatius Savoy, 29, faces a mandatory sentence of life with no possibility of parole.

After a seven-day trial, a U.S. District Court jury in Baltimore found Savoy guilty of both charges he faced, conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine and use of a firearm in relation to a drug-trafficking crime.

He'll be sentenced Jan. 5.

Officer William Hicks, who was shot in the arm after he stopped to check on a fight in Odenton on Sept. 11, 2004, has recovered and returned to duty.

The fight started outside Kim's Lounge, a bar on Route 175 across from Fort Meade.

Officer Hicks was trying to wrestle a gun away from a man who'd been firing into the air when Savoy walked up and tried to shoot the officer at point-blank range, said M. Virginia Miles, a county prosecutor who worked on the case.

The gun misfired at first, but later went off and hit Officer Hicks in the arm.

Ms. Miles said Savoy had shown off a gun inside the bar and later tried to cover up evidence of the shooting by using bleach on his clothes and urinating on his hands.

Savoy's lawyer, Melissa M. Phinn, said Officer Hicks never saw who shot him in the chaos, and she said the testimony it was Savoy came from an unreliable witness.

As county police investigated the shooting and saw the ties to drugs, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Drug Enforcement Administration joined the case. People in the Pioneer City Boys sold guns to undercover officers.

Nearly a year after the shooting, a federal grand jury indicted Savoy and six other members of a drug operation prosecutors said had been around since 2002.

Ms. Miles told jurors last week the gang used violence and intimidation to keep competing dealers out of Severn and silence people who might be thinking about calling police.

The message "stop snitching" was spray-painted on the street, walls or mailboxes in neighborhoods including Pioneer City, Stillmeadows and Meade Village, she said.

Ms. Phinn told the jury in her opening statement Savoy wasn't part of any big-time drug operation and there was no proof he was responsible for the intimidation.

DOJ_NMG_0087016

"They took individual arrests of individual people and they've made this big 'conspiracy,' " Ms. Phinn said of prosecutors.

But prosecutors noted Savoy has three past drug convictions, which is why he faces an automatic life sentence on the cocaine conspiracy charge. He could also get a consecutive life term for the shooting.

All six of Savoy's co-defendants pleaded guilty to drug charges in the case, and some testified against him.

The six face prison terms of 25 years to life. They are:

Lowell Joseph Braswell, 22, of LaPlata

Tony Maurice Horne, Jr., 25, of Glen Burnie

Troemaine Herbert Storey, 27, of Glen Burnie

Paul Eugene Turner, Jr., 31, of Severn

Jerome Otto Waters Jr., 26, of Annapolis

SEVEN MEN FACE FEDERAL CHARGES IN RICHMOND DRUG RAID (BCNW)

Bay City News Wire, October 27, 2006

OAKLAND (BCN) -- U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said today that seven men face federal drug trafficking charges stemming from a raid in Richmond by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies.

Ryan said the men are accused of distributing cocaine base and methamphetamine to informants who recorded these purchases using covert video and audio recording equipment.

Three of the men were indicted by a federal grand jury and the other four were charged by the U.S. Attorney's Office in criminal complaints, Ryan said.

Six of the defendants were arrested in Richmond Wednesday and arraigned in U.S. District Court in Oakland today. One of the men was arrested today and will be arraigned Friday.

Ryan said, "These charges are an effort to make North Richmond a safer community for its residents by prosecuting alleged drug dealers in the area. I thank the federal and local investigative agencies for their continuing effort and strong collaboration."

Stephanie Douglas, an FBI Acting Special Agent in Charge, said, "These arrests are the result of over two years of joint federal, state, and local investigation and constitute another step toward ending the stranglehold of gang violence in North Richmond and the wider Bay Area."

Douglas said, "The FBI remains committed to working with our state and local partners to ensure the safety of all our communities."

During the operation, agents and deputies executed federal search warrants at ten locations in Richmond and one location in Vallejo.

As a result of the searches, agents and deputies seized large quantities of suspected cocaine base, methamphetamine, and cocaine, as well as a shotgun and more than $10,000 in cash, authorities said.

Prosecutors identified the defendants as Antonio Latauris Hendrix Jr., 30; Warren Steven Smith, 38; Michael Louise Black Jr., 33; Jeffrey Eugene Brown, 37; Fred Leon Wiggins, 26; Carl Leon Nix, Jr., 35; and Dosie Dee King, 37.

According to the U.S. attorney's office, the seven men, if convicted, face maximum federal prison terms ranging from 20 years to life and fines of between $1 million and $4 million.

Graham Aide Speaks To BALCO Grand Jury (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

The top assistant to track coach Trevor Graham has testified to the federal grand jury investigating BALCO and its distribution of performance-enhancing drugs, Graham's attorney confirmed Thursday.

But Randall Evans did not provide any incriminating testimony against Graham, who once trained five-time Olympic medalist Marion Jones, the attorney said in a statement given to The Associated Press.

"Randall Evans agreed to speak with us about his appearance at the grand jury," Graham's attorney Joe Zeszotarski said. "Based upon our interview of him, it is clear that Mr. Evans did not testify 'against' Trevor."

DOJ_NMG_0087017

Evans is the top assistant to Graham at Sprint Capitol USA, the Raleigh, N.C.,-based organization that has produced some of the world's top sprinters, including Olympic champion Justin Gatlin.

Zeszotarski said Evans "told the grand jury that he knows nothing about Trevor being involved in the distribution of illicit substances."

Evans' attorney Johnny Gaskins did not return a telephone message left by the AP. Gaskins told ESPN.com, which first reported Evans' appearance before the grand jury, that Evans spent nearly two hours before the San Francisco-based grand jury last week.

Evans' appearance indicates the grand jury is at least interested in Graham as part of its probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative and the lab's distribution of steroids and other illegal performance-enhancing drugs.

Several of Graham's athletes have tested positive for banned substances. The most recent case came when 100-meter co-world record holder Gatlin -- a leader in promoting a drug-free sport -- tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April. In August, the U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers, and Nike terminated its contract with the coach.

Graham helped launch the federal investigation of BALCO three years ago by anonymously mailing a vial containing "the clear," a previously undetectable steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. At the 2004 Athens Olympics, Graham acknowledged mailing the drug.

Graham steadfastly has denied ever providing banned performance-enhancing drugs to his athletes. He did not return a message left on his cell phone.

His attorney said Evans' grand-jury testimony backed up the coach.

"Mr. Evans has informed us that he answered all of the questions of the investigating agents and the grand jury, and that he has never seen Trevor Graham ever involved in any way in the distribution of illicit substances," Zeszotarski said. "Mr. Evans' statements directly contradict the false claims being made about Trevor, and show that Trevor is telling the truth, which is further confirmed by Trevor having passed a polygraph test about these false claims."

Ecuador's Correa Has No Plans To Break Off US Relations (DOW)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, October 27, 2006

QUITO (Dow Jones)--Leftist Rafael Correa said Thursday that he will not break off relations with the U.S. if he is elected president Nov. 26, but he will exercise a sovereign government.

"I will not break off relations with the United States, but Ecuador's international policy will be sovereign, we will condemn the errors that the whole world recognizes, like the invasion of Iraq in search of weapons of mass destruction that did not exist," he told journalists.

Correa also accused U.S. President George W. Bush, together with Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, of trying to involve Ecuador in the U.S.-backed drug eradication and counterinsurgency strategy known as Plan Colombia.

Correa said he expects his opponent, businessman Alvaro Noboa, to throw his support behind Plan Colombia.

"Noboa has already said that with Alvaro Uribe he will combat the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or Farc, of course his children will not die on the border, it will be our humble soldiers, who lose their lives," said Correa.

Noboa, a billionaire widely considered Ecuador's wealthiest man, will compete against Correa in a second round of voting after no candidate won 50%, or at least 40% with a 10-point lead in the first round on Oct. 15.

In the latest polling data, Noboa is leading Correa by 13 to 15 percentage points.

Noboa Thursday reiterated that he will break off relations with Cuba and Venezuela if he is elected.

Noboa also said he has no plans to debate Correa in the second round, in the midst of a campaign that is increasingly violent and politicized.

With Beheadings And Attacks, Drug Gangs Terrorize Mexico (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

URUAPAN, Mexico — Norteño music was blaring at the Sol y Sombra bar on Sept. 6 when several men in military garb broke up the late night party. Waving high-powered machine guns, they screamed at the crowd to stay put and then dumped the contents of a heavy plastic bag on the dance floor.

Five human heads rolled to a bloody stop.

"This is not something you see every day," said a bartender, who asked not to be named for fear of losing his own head. "Very ugly."

An underworld war between drug gangs is raging in Mexico, medieval in its barbarity, its foot soldiers operating with little fear of interference from the police, its scope and brutality unprecedented, even in a country accustomed to high levels of drug violence.

In recent months the violence has included a total of two dozen beheadings, a raid on a local police station by men with grenades and a bazooka, and daytime kidnappings of top law enforcement officials. At least 123 law enforcement officials, among them 2 judges and 3 prosecutors, have been gunned down or tortured to death. Five police officers were among those beheaded.

In all, the violence has claimed more than 1,700 civilian lives this year, and federal officials say the killings are on course to top the estimated 1,800 underworld killings last year. Those death tolls compare with 1,304 in 2004 and 1,080 in 2001, these officials say.

Mexico's law enforcement officials maintain that the violence is a sign that they have made progress dismantling the major organized crime families in the country. The arrests of several drug cartel leaders and their top lieutenants have set off a violent struggle among second-rank mobsters for trade routes, federal prosecutors say. The old order has been fractured, and the remaining drug dealers are killing one another or making new alliances.

"These alliances are happening because none of the organizations can control, on its own, the territory it used to control, and that speaks to the crisis that they are in," said José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, the top federal prosecutor for organized crime.

Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca said a steadily rising tide of drug addiction within Mexico had spurred some of the murders, as dealers fought for local markets. At the same time, more and more honest police officers are trying to enforce the law rather than turn a blind eye to drug traffickers, often paying with their lives, prosecutors say.

But those assessments, other authorities say, are overly rosy and may explain only part of the picture. Some experts say the Mexican police forces, weakened by corruption and cowed by assassinations, are simply not up to the task of countering the underworld feuds unleashed by the arrests of cartel leaders over the last six years.

Many of the dead made their living in the drug trade and perished in a larger struggle for territory between a federation of cartels based in Sinaloa, on the Pacific Ocean, and the Gulf Cartel from the northeastern state of Tamaulipas, federal prosecutors say.

The five men beheaded in Uruapan, in Michoacán, were street-level methamphetamine dealers, addicted themselves to the synthetic drug. They were linked loosely to the Valencia family, which once controlled most of the drug trade in the state and is a part of the Sinaloa group, the police say. The killers came from a gang called The Family, believed to be allied with the Gulf Cartel.

A day before, the killers had kidnapped the five men from a mechanic's shop they had been using as a front for selling "ice," as crystal methamphetamine is called on the street. They sawed their victims' heads off with a bowie knife while they were still alive shortly before going to the bar, law enforcement officials said.

"You don't do something like that unless you want to send a big message," said one United States law enforcement official here, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0087019

The beheadings, in fact, have become a signature form of intimidation aimed at both criminal rivals and federal and local authorities. In the tourist town of Acapulco, killers from one drug gang decapitated the commander of a special strike force, Mario Núñez Magaña, in April, along with one of his agents, Jesús Alberto Ibarra Velázquez.

They jammed the heads in a fence in front of the municipal police station. "So you will learn to respect," said a red note next to them.

"This year has been one to forget, a black year," said Jorge Valdez, a spokesman for the Acapulco police. "It's the most violent year in the last 50 years, and the acts are barbaric, bloody, with no trace of humanity."

The violence is by no means limited to Acapulco. In mid-July, about 15 gunmen attacked a small-town police station in Tabasco State at dawn with grenades, a bazooka and machine guns in an attempt to liberate two of their gang members, who were arrested after a bar fight the night before.

Two police officers died in the assault. The authorities said the attackers were dressed in the commando outfits of federal agents and belonged to the Zetas, former soldiers who work for the Gulf Cartel.

One reason for the wave of law enforcement killings is that the Mexican police do a poor job of protecting their own. Arrests have been made in only a handful of the assassinations of police officers this year. The overwhelming majority remain unsolved because witnesses fear testifying against drug traffickers. Even seasoned investigators are afraid to dig too deep into the murders.

"There is an atmosphere that affects us, of distrust, of terror inside the police force," said Jesús Alemán del Carmen, the head of the state police in Guerrero, where 22 law enforcement officials have been brutally assassinated this year.

One of the officers killed was Gonzalo Domínguez Díaz, the state police commander in Pátzcuaro, Michoacán. In February, he received a death threat from a local businessman who law enforcement officials say has links to the Valencia crime family.

The threat came just minutes after Commander Domínguez arrested two men on weapons possession charges. He arrived home that night pale and shaken, said his widow, Fanny Carranza Domínguez. His anxiety grew over time, after prosecutors released the men he had arrested, for a lack of evidence, his wife said.

In early May, he told his wife that he had heard on the street that gunmen were looking for him. "He said, 'I know that if I arrest them I am risking my life,' " she recalled. " 'I bring them to the capital, and they let them go.' "

On May 8, a car cut off Commander Domínguez's police car as he was driving home alone about 6:30 p.m. Within minutes, he was shot point blank in the head with a 12-gauge shotgun and twice in the chest with an AK-47. He never unholstered his sidearm. So far, prosecutors have made no progress in solving his murder. He was 47, the father of three.

"I think the commanders that haven't been killed are in the game, and the ones that have been killed, it is because they attacked crime," Mrs. Carranza Domínguez said.

"The prosecutor seems asleep here," she added. "He doesn't do anything but collect his salary and go home."

Commander Domínguez was one of 16 state and federal police commanders assassinated this year across Mexico, along with 2 judges handling drug cases and 2 federal prosecutors. Local police chiefs have also been targets. Eight have been murdered, most of them in Michoacán.

Most were ambushed in their cars or outside their homes by men with machine guns. A few were kidnapped by men posing as federal agents. In these cases, the bodies were found later, shot full of holes, often showing signs of torture.

Commander Cándido Vargas, 40, the second in command of the state police in Uruapan, died that way in August. Prosecutors say he was walking to his car when he was surrounded by about 15 heavily armed men dressed in black commando outfits like those used by federal agents. It was 3:30 in the afternoon, and he was just 100 yards from the police headquarters.

The men hustled him into one of their vehicles and sped off. He was found the next day on a nearby ranch, shot 25 times. A sign next to his body read: "For playing with two bands."

No one from the police department visited his wife and three children, who live in another town, to tell them of his death. "We found out through the newspaper," said Paula Vargas, his wife of 23 years. "It was as if the whole world fell down on me."

The state prosecutor in Uruapan, Ramón Ponce, says he has found no evidence of Commander Vargas's being corrupt. Neither does he have any leads, he said. "The atmosphere is very tense," Mr. Ponce said. "It's very difficult."

DOJ_NMG_0087020

While attacks on the police have risen, they have been far outpaced by grisly gangland killings. In Michoacán, The Family is believed to be responsible for the beheadings of a dozen people besides the ones they delivered to the Sol y Sombra bar. The heads have often been accompanied by cryptic messages declaring the killings divine justice, accusing the victims of crimes, or daring their rivals to send more henchmen.

Nearly every day, new victims are found in states along the major drug shipment routes, especially Quintana Roo, Michoacán, Guerrero, Tamaulipas and Baja California. Most are bound, gagged and shot to death, their bodies dumped on lonely roads.

In the towns hardest hit by the gangland warfare, the fear is palpable. For two years now, Nuevo Laredo has been the main battleground for a fight between gunmen loyal to Joaquín (Chapo) Guzmán of Sinaloa and the remnants of the Gulf Cartel, whose leader, Osiel Cárdenas, is in prison awaiting trial.

"I wouldn't be human if I said I wasn't afraid," acknowledged Elizabeth Hernández Arredone, a state prosecutor in Nuevo Laredo who has taped to her door a photograph of a female judge who recently disappeared.

The effects are everywhere. Many local journalists have stopped covering drug violence for fear they may become targets themselves. Tourists used to spill across the border from Laredo, Tex., to swig tequila, buy trinkets and run wild. Not anymore.

Church attendance is down, said the Rev. Alberto Monteras Monjarás of Santo Niño Church, because even a Sunday morning can be dangerous.

"People used to sleep outside on the porch if it got too hot," he said. "Not anymore. You stay inside, and you put three or four locks on the door."

Marshals' Artifacts May Go To Staunton (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

STAUNTON The U.S. Marshals Service, best known for dogging fugitives in the old West, is on a different kind of quest these days.

It wants a place to store its antique badges and arrest warrants for the ruthless and the wanted.

As part of that search, a committee toured the Shenandoah Valley and its major attractions for several days last week. Also in the running is Fort Smith, Ark.

Staunton received a vote of confidence during the tour: Three former directors endorsed the city. Stanley Morris, John Marshall and Henry Hudson all are backing Staunton over Fort Smith.

The agency's director, John Clark, is expected to select the museum site by the end of the year.

"It's a great way for the American people to know about the background of law enforcement," said Robin Boylan, former FBI lawyer and member of a local committee to land the museum.

The Marshals Service got its start with 13 appointments from President George Washington in 1789. One of those appointments fell to Edward Carrington, picked to watch over Virginia from his headquarters in Staunton.

"There's a lot of historical ties to the U.S. Marshals Service here," Mayor Lacy King said. "Staunton and this area was the beginning of the western movement."

During the Civil War, the job of hunting down Confederate spies was assigned to the marshals.

The agency's traveling bicentennial celebration exhibit was located in Laramie, Wyo., from 1991 to 2003. Some of its artifacts date back more than 200 years.

Soon after the museum closed in 2003, a committee was created to find a permanent home. A warehouse of the agency's history is the brainchild of former U.S. Marshals Director Stanley Morris, now a member of the Staunton committee tasked with luring the museum here.

"Being known as a place where you can learn about history has a really good ring to it," Staunton spokesman Doug Cochran said.

Staunton is the home of the Woodrow Wilson Presidential Library and has the Frontier Culture Museum, which interprets early settlements in the Shenandoah Valley.

While Staunton has strong ties to the Marshals Service, its competitor also has bragging rights.

Fort Smith was a frontier town with a federal judge and U.S. marshals who enforced the law in the Indian territory. Fort Smith was home base for the whiskey-sipping marshal Rooster Cogburn in the novel "True Grit," played by John Wayne in the movie. And many people currently living in Fort Smith are descendants of U.S. marshals.

Bush Signs Bill Authorizing 700-mile Fence On Mexican Border (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush wanted an exchange of workers with Mexico to bring order to the border, but he wound up signing a law Thursday that approves walling off 700 miles of the USA from its southern neighbor.

"Unfortunately the United States has not been in complete control of its borders for decades and therefore illegal immigration has been on the rise," Bush said

He called the border-fence bill "an important step in our nation's efforts to secure our borders."

The centerpiece of Bush's immigration policy, a "guest worker" program, remains stalled in Congress. A handful of House Republicans are at the brakes, blocking negotiations with the Senate for a comprehensive immigration bill.

Still, Bush argues that it would be easier to get his guest-worker program passed if Republicans keep their majorities in the House and Senate after the Nov. 7 elections. His proposal would allow legal employment for foreigners and give some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the USA a shot at becoming citizens.

The measure Bush put into law Thursday offers no money for the fence project covering one-third of the 2,100-mile border.

Its cost is not known, although a homeland security spending measure the president signed earlier this month makes a $1.2 billion down payment on the project. The money also can be used for access roads, vehicle barriers, lighting, high-tech equipment and other tools to secure the border.

Outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox, who has spent much of his six years in office lobbying for a new guest-worker program and a chance at citizenship for illegal immigrants now in the USA, calls the fence "shameful" and compares it to the Berlin Wall.

Others have doubts about its effectiveness. "A fence will slow people down by a minute or two, but if you don't have the agents to stop them it does no good. We're not talking about some impenetrable barrier," T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a labor union representing Border Patrol agents, said Wednesday.

Customs and Border Protection statistics show that apprehensions at border crossings are down 8% nationally for fiscal year 2006, Bonner said. Apprehensions were up in the San Diego sector, he said, an area of the border that has the most fencing.

Sens. John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison, both Texas Republicans, wanted to amend the fence bill to give local governments more say about where fencing is erected. They lost that battle, but Republican leaders assured them the Homeland Security Department would have flexibility to choose other options instead of fencing, if needed.

Cornyn said he voted for the fence because he wanted to help demonstrate that Congress was serious about border security. He is opposed to providing citizenship to some people already in the USA illegally, as Bush wants.

"The choice we were presented was: Are we going to vote to enhance border security, or against it?" Cornyn said. "I think that's how the vote was viewed."

Bush Signs A Bill To Build A 700-mile Fence Along The Mexican Border (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush signed legislation on Thursday to create a 700-mile border fence that would stretch along a third of the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border.

The barrier is to be constructed in tandem with a high-tech surveillance network known as the Secure Border Initiative, which the Boeing Corp. is developing for the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0087022

The Republican-controlled Congress approved the fence on Sept. 29, but it hasn't approved funding for the four-state project, estimated to cost at least $2.2 billion.

DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said the department will begin developing plans for the reinforced fence after Congress appropriates funding. Lawmakers have approved $1.2 billion for border security, but most of that money will be used for the Secure Border Initiative, Knocke said.

Even with the uncertain timetable for construction, Republicans hope to use the new law as a vitally needed political boost in the days remaining before the Nov. 7 congressional elections, citing the fence as dramatic evidence that they're getting tough on border security and taking aggressive steps to combat illegal immigration.

Republicans are in danger of losing control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate because of a voter backlash over Iraq, disappointment with Bush, high energy prices and a spreading perception of corruption in the GOP-led Congress. GOP strategists believe the border-security message could make a difference by energizing conservative voters, although some analysts said it may be too little, too late.

"It's awfully late in the game for Republicans to make a significant impact in some of these races, but it never hurts to try," said Nathan Gonzales, political editor of the Rothenberg Political Report. "Republicans view immigration as a winning issue by rallying the base."

The government of Mexico on Thursday issued an "emphatic rejection" of the barrier, which also has met opposition from numerous U.S. towns and cities along the border. They fear it could hurt local economies and create ill will with neighboring communities in Mexico.

"I can't believe that Bush as a Texan really believes that bill would do anything good," said Jay J. Johnson-Castro, 59, a bed-and-breakfast entrepreneur in Del Rio, Texas, who walked 205 miles in 14 days to protest the fence.

Leading Republican lawmakers, however, previewing their message to the voters, hailed the fence as a big step toward protecting the border and charged that Democrats are weak on border security.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said two-thirds of House Democrats voted against the bill and "have forcefully attempted to thwart border security efforts."

In turn, Democrats renewed their assertion that Republicans passed the fence bill merely to bolster their fortunes in the elections. Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, a former Border Patrol supervisor, said the measure "represents the worst in election-year politics" and will do little to protect the border.

The bill calls for three sections of fencing in Texas: a 51-mile stretch from Del Rio to Eagle Pass, 176 miles from Laredo to Brownsville and 88 miles stretching from El Paso westward to Columbus, N.M. The largest single section would run 361 miles from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz. A 10-mile section is planned near San Diego.

About 75 miles of fencing is currently located on the southern border, primarily in populous areas known for smuggling or illegal immigrant traffic.

Bush signed the measure in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., the chief House sponsor of the bill.

Bush Signs Bill Authorizing 700-Mile Fence For Border (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

WARREN, Mich., Oct. 26 -- President Bush signed a measure Thursday authorizing the construction of a fence along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border, an action that conflicts with his own stated vision of immigration reform but one championed by many Republicans facing reelection in November.

Speaking at a White House ceremony before a day of campaigning for GOP candidates in Iowa and Michigan, Bush said the barrier will help the United States plug the porous Southwest border.

DOJ_NMG_0087023

"Unfortunately, the United States has not been in complete control of its borders for decades and, therefore, illegal immigration has been on the rise," Bush said. "We have a responsibility to address these challenges. We have a responsibility to enforce our laws. We have a responsibility to secure our borders. We take this responsibility seriously."

Bush portrayed the measure as a key step toward comprehensive immigration reform, but the fence bill passed by the GOP-controlled Congress put him in a tight squeeze with international allies and his own immigration principles on one side, and the electoral needs of his party on the other.

Bush has said that immigration reform would work only if stepped-up enforcement is accompanied by a guest-worker program that would create a legal path for large numbers of low-skill workers to enter the United States. The president has also endorsed providing the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the United States a chance at citizenship, saying such a humane vision of immigration is in keeping with the nation's history and traditions.

But those positions were rejected by congressional Republicans, who advocated tougher enforcement to slow the flood of illegal immigration that is overwhelming many communities, particularly in the West and Southwest. They passed legislation that would do as much.

"Today marks another step forward in making America safer and in stemming the tide of illegal immigration," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in a statement. "The American people demand border security, and this Republican Congress and President are committed to achieving operational control of the border through an enforcement-first approach."

The government of Mexican President Vicente Fox made it clear that he wanted the bill vetoed. A statement by Mexico, and signed by 27 other Organization of American States members on Wednesday, expressed concern about the bill, calling it "a unilateral measure that goes against the spirit of understanding that should characterize how shared problems between neighboring countries are handled and that affects cooperation in the hemisphere."

Such concerns were outweighed by the pleadings of congressional Republicans eager to back up their tough talk on border security with a legislative accomplishment. The president's signing ceremony was followed by a blizzard of statements from GOP lawmakers hailing the law.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) called it "a major victory in Republicans' efforts to make a real difference in securing our borders."

The fence bill is a far cry from the comprehensive measure that cleared the Senate, which would have paired tough border security provisions with new paths to lawful work and citizenship for foreign workers and the nation's illegal immigrants. It is a small piece of the more modest House bill that included a fence and measures to crack down on the hiring of undocumented workers.

Democrats dismissed the legislation as pointless. Only a fraction of the billions needed to finance the fence has been appropriated, and much of the construction might not be feasible. In swaths of Arizona, the fence would have to climb steep, desert crags and plunge into deep ravines.

Without border agents to patrol the barrier, smugglers would blast holes in remote stretches, some critics have said. "The bill the president signed today represents the worst in election-year politics," said Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.). "It is an empty gesture for the sole purpose of sending a false message about the security of our nation."

Though he signed the measure into law, Bush emphasized that other immigration changes are needed. "We have more to do," he said. ". . . We must reduce pressure on our border by creating a temporary-worker plan. Willing workers ought to be matched with willing employers."

Though the new law authorizes the construction of a 700-mile fence, it remains far from clear how much fencing will be built.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke declined to say if the department is committed to building a 700-mile barrier. Instead, he cited the DHS commitment to test by next year a $67 million, 28-mile "virtual fence" that includes physical walls, vehicle barriers and remote monitoring south of Tucson.

Analysts, meanwhile, debate the effectiveness of a fence.

DOJ_NMG_0087024

Since the United States began building a 66-mile barrier in San Diego in 1990, illegal immigration has been rerouted to more remote areas, with many migrants now being funneled through the treacherous desert south of Arizona.

Later in the day, Bush traveled to Iowa, where he campaigned for GOP congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti, a state senator who is trying to unseat Rep. Leonard L. Boswell (D). Campaign officials said the luncheon raised $400,000.

Bush then traveled to Michigan, where he headlined a fundraiser for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, who is trailing incumbent Debbie Stabenow (D). That event raised $700,000, officials said.

Weisman reported from Washington. Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington contributed to this report.

Border Security Law Fails To Stem Debate Critics Call Signing Ceremony An Election-season Show (AJC)

By Ken Herman

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday signed into law a border security bill, touching off a debate over whether the timing — 12 days before the midterm elections — was politically motivated and whether the measure will be effective.

Some GOP lawmakers called the legislation, which authorizes securing 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border, a step toward stemming the flow of illegal immigrants. Democrats called it a publicity stunt aimed at making GOP candidates look tough on immigration.

Bush called it a start on a much larger task.

"We have more to do," he said at the White House signing ceremony. "Meaningful immigration reform means that we must enforce our immigration laws in the United States."

Though referred to as the "fence bill," the measure actually gives the Department of Homeland Security leeway to determine how best to secure the border. Among the options are two-layered fencing in several key areas, as well as more cameras, ground sensors, lighting and unmanned aerial vehicles.

A separate measure, previously signed by the president, included $1.2 billion to pay for fencing, barriers and other infrastructure. But estimates of the cost for the 700 miles of fencing range from $2 billion to $7 billion, and many lawmakers and immigrant advocates doubt the project will ever be fully funded.

At the bill-signing ceremony, Bush renewed his call for a temporary worker program, a concept approved in the Senate but blocked by House Republicans who liken it to amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"Willing workers ought to be matched with willing employers to do jobs Americans are not doing, on a temporary basis," Bush said. "We must face the reality that millions of illegal immigrants are already here."

He said he would work with Congress to reach a "middle ground" between "granting an automatic path to citizenship for every illegal immigrant and a program of mass deportation."

Republican hard-liners indicated there may be no middle ground.

"Far be it from me to criticize an obsession," said Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, "but President Bush's unhelpful fixation in giving amnesty to 12 million illegal aliens has done nothing to help us in this debate."

In addition to the intra-party skirmish, Bush took flak Thursday from Democrats, who called the bill a "political stunt designed to cater to the far-right-wing base" of the GOP as the election nears.

"Although the bill passed Congress several weeks ago, the do-nothing GOP congressional leadership held the bill until now so that they could use the publicity for electoral gain heading into the upcoming elections," the Democratic National Committee said in a statement.

Congress completed work on the bill on Sept. 29 but did not send it to the White House until Monday. Bush had 10 days from then to sign the bill, guaranteeing it would get his signature in the closing days of the congressional election campaigns.

The White House denied any politically motivated effort to delay the bill signing.

"The president always planned to sign the bill," said spokeswoman Dana Perino. "We just received the bill [recently]. Anyone who wanted to talk about their vote in favor of the fence bill has been doing so since it passed."

DOJ_NMG_0087025

Though he got far less than what he wanted on immigration, Bush played the starring role — with GOP leaders on hand — at the White House signing ceremony.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) called it "a major victory in Republicans' efforts to make a real difference in securing our borders." But Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon, during a state visit to Canada, condemned that barrier.

"The wall will not solve any problem," Calderon said. "Humanity made a huge mistake by building the Berlin Wall, and I believe that today the United States is committing a grave error in building the wall on our border."

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a union representing Border Patrol agents, called the bill signing a "political ploy to show the public they are serious about securing the border."

"Nothing could be further from the truth," Bonner said, predicting increased assaults on Border Patrol agents.

"This is some type of job screening," he said. "If you can climb a ladder [to get over the fence] you can climb scaffolding at construction sites and climb ladders to pick apples."

Many Texas farmers and ranchers who have land that touches the Rio Grande, the natural boundary between that state and Mexico, fear a fence will cut through their properties and create an irrigation obstacle.

Bobby Sparks, who owns farm land that touches the river in the town of Progreso, said he's fed up with thieves coming across the river to steal batteries and other equipment.

"If they put it right on the bank of the river it would cut us off from our water, we don't want that. Other than that, if they gave me access to my water, I'm for a fence," Sparks said.

Rick Glancey, executive director of the Texas Border Sheriffs Coalition, said he hopes law enforcement officials and U.S. Customs and Border Protection are in charge of determining where the fence goes.

"Many bureaucrats in Washington, D.C., have never seen the rural border and don't understand the unique problems we face," Glancey said. "Please don't let a policy wonk in D.C. decide."

Bush Signs Law To Build Border Fence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed a law committing to build nearly 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border -- although less than 24 hours earlier, he told conservative writers that he doesn't see immigration as a major issue in this year's campaign.

His signature, coming less than two weeks before the midterm elections, delighted congressional Republicans, who said it is about time that the government gets serious about border enforcement. But it infuriated Democrats and illegal alien advocacy groups, who said Mr. Bush has abandoned his earlier commitment to a more lenient immigration policy.

"This bill will help protect the American people. This bill will make our borders more secure," Mr. Bush said at a morning ceremony with top Republicans in the Roosevelt Room of the White House. "It is an important step toward immigration reform."

Congressional Republicans had fought hard to get a public-signing ceremony and see the law as a major campaign issue. Every major Republican congressional leader and many of the party's top-tier candidates issued statements lauding the fence and criticizing Democrats for opposing the fence.

"Make no mistake: House Republicans are answering the public's cry for border security," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, adding that the law provides a sharp distinction between Republicans and Democrats heading into the election. "Regrettably, House Democrats -- over two-thirds of whom voted against the Secure Fence Act -- have not only ignored the public's cry for border security, but have forcefully attempted to thwart border-security efforts."

Mr. Bush, however, said he sees the issue differently. He has avoided talking about immigration on the campaign trail and didn't mention it while stumping in Iowa yesterday, instead returning to his themes of tax cuts and the war in Iraq as central to U.S. security.

DOJ_NMG_0087026

In an interview with conservative columnists Wednesday, Mr. Bush was asked why he didn't campaign on immigration, and he said it doesn't appear to be a high priority for voters.

"Immigration is an issue. I don't hear it being discussed much out there," he said, according to a White House transcript posted by National Review Online.

That stands in stark contrast to what Republicans report from the campaign trail, where candidates from first-timers to the speaker of the House say they hear about it.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, recalled a forum in a park in Geneseo, a town in his district, and said that other than one woman, of the 150 constituents who showed up, "every one of those people said secure the border first. It was amazing."

The fence is an immensely popular idea in some areas. In recent opinion surveys from polling firm Strategic Vision, support for building a wall to prevent illegal immigration won 86 percent support among Pennsylvania voters and 82 percent in Michigan, though just 43 percent in Washington state.

Yesterday's signing ceremony was the end of a two-year debate over immigration, won by House Republicans, who insisted on an enforcement-first policy.

The bill authorizes 698 miles of double-tiered fencing and support roads along some of the most porous parts of the U.S.-Mexico border, including much of Arizona. Currently, the border has 75 miles of fencing, with 42 miles under construction, according to the Bush administration.

Mr. Bush said his administration has taken other steps to clamp down on illegal immigration, including committing to hiring thousands more U.S. Border Patrol agents, buying more bed space to hold illegal aliens so they can be deported rather than continuing what critics have dubbed a "catch-and-release" policy and deploying the National Guard to assist the U.S. Border Patrol.

Illegal alien advocacy groups such as the National Council of La Raza and the Catholic Church had urged Mr. Bush to veto the bill, and the Mexican government has threatened to file a formal protest with the United Nations over the fence.

Democrats said the bill signing was all about politics and ridiculed covering just 35 percent of the 1,951-mile-long border. They said that the border situation has only gotten worse under Republican leadership and that Mr. Bush blew a chance to do something about it.

"This new law is nothing more than a cynical, vain attempt by Republicans to try to show some accomplishment on border security where they can claim none," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat. "This new law is a quintessential example of the Republican Party's political grandstanding and empty rhetoric. The truth is, this Republican Congress has failed to even fund the construction of this 700-mile fence."

But if Democrats said the bill was pure politics, Republicans said it was good politics.

"Although I'm leaving the Senate in fulfillment of the pledge I made 12 years ago, I'll be fighting to ensure that every inch of the fence authorized today is [funded] fully and constructed promptly ... and so should my fellow conservatives throughout America," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican and a potential presidential candidate, wrote on his blog at www.volpac.org.

Still, it's a complicated issue for both political parties.

Even as Democrats attacked Republicans for allowing illegal immigration, most of them voted against the fence -- the one bill that had a chance of passing this year.

Meanwhile, Republicans are sharply split.

Many are adamant about an enforcement-first policy, arguing that illegal immigration must be stopped before the nation deals with current illegal aliens or future workers.

But Mr. Bush and a minority of Republicans want to couple enforcement with a plan to offer citizenship rights to most illegal aliens.

"There is a rational middle ground between granting an automatic pass to citizenship for every illegal immigrant and a program of mass deportation. And I look forward to working with Congress to find that middle ground," Mr. Bush said at yesterday's ceremony.

Bush Signs Off On 700 Miles Of Border Fencing (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Legislation authorizing 700 miles of fencing along the southern U.S. border was signed into law by President Bush Thursday at a ceremony that underscored Republican divisions over immigration policy and left unanswered questions about whether the entire barrier will be built.

Flanked by House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and other Republicans who blocked his bid for a broader overhaul of immigration law, Bush used the opportunity to push back. "We have more to do," the president said during the low-key event.

Promises by GOP congressional to alter the law when lawmakers reconvene later this month and a lack of funding specifically set aside for the fence have cast doubt on how long it ultimately might be. Changes to the measure likely would include giving local governments and private property owners the chance to raise objections to the fence's location.

Bush did have words of praise for the fence bill, calling it "an important step toward immigration reform."

But he made clear that he opposed the enforcement-only position taken by the House and favored instead the approach embraced by the Senate: a combination of tougher border security and work site enforcement with a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants.

Bush said he looked forward to working with Congress on finding a "rational middle ground" between granting automatic citizenship to illegal immigrants and launching "a program of mass deportation."

He also said, "We must reduce pressure on our border by creating a temporary worker plan."

Some GOP leaders had pressed a reluctant White House for the signing ceremony so that as November's election nears, Republicans could promote the fence bill as an accomplishment, party aides said.

"House and Senate Republicans . . . will stop the hemorrhaging along our nation's borders," said a statement by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

The House Republican leadership, in particular, views the fence not only as a needed security improvement but as a powerful political statement that will win support for the party. Other Republicans, however, worry that it could cost the GOP support among Hispanic voters.

Mexican officials have harshly denounced the fence plan, and they continued their criticism on Thursday.

"Walls don't resolve anything; it's a grave error," said President-elect Felipe Calderon, who was traveling in Canada.

President Vicente Fox termed the measure "an embarrassment for the United States."

Commenting during a visit to Cancun, Fox said, "It's an example of the inability of the United States to see the issue of immigration as one of shared responsibility."

The fence's advocates in Congress have countered that their first responsibility is to ensure the sanctity of the U.S. border.

There are currently about 90 miles of fencing along the southern border.

The bill contains detailed instructions for placement of "at least 2 layers of reinforced fencing" around Tecate and Calexico, Calif., and across vast stretches of Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. But a letter written by Hastert and Frist to other congressional leaders when the measure cleared Congress on Sept. 29 detailed changes they wanted made to it when lawmakers return to Washington in mid-November.

Hastert and Frist indicated that they want to provide flexibility on where the fence should go and whether parts of it take a physical or virtual form -- potentially using sensors, cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles in the place of reinforced metal.

Their letter called for requiring the Department of Homeland Security to erect fencing in areas of high illegal entry, but also giving the agency the option "to use alternative physical infrastructure and technology when fencing is ineffective or impractical."

Also, Hastert and Frist want to require agency officials to consult with state and local governments, including American-Indian tribes, on the exact placement of fencing and other infrastructure, such as vehicle barriers.

Money poses another potential problem for the fence. Cost estimates range from $3 million to $10 million per mile -- for a total price tag of at least $2.1 billion, and perhaps much higher, before maintenance costs. The bill Bush signed, while authorizing the fence, includes no money for it.

DOJ_NMG_0087028

A separate budget measure for the Homeland Security department provides $1.2 billion for border security that Republicans have referred to as the "first installment" for the fence. But that money can be allocated as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff sees fit.

Agency officials have told Congress they would prefer between 300 and 400 miles of fencing in areas where they believe it would be effective and the latitude to employ other security methods elsewhere.

"In urban areas, we've found that fencing is very effective, but in rural areas, sensors and other technology are more effective," said DHS spokesman Russ Knocke.

The new law has encountered resistance in parts of the Southwest -- opponents include the Texas Border Sheriff's Association and the city of El Paso.

Maria Luisa O'Connell, president of the Phoenix-based Border Trade Alliance, expressed concerns Thursday about the economic effect of more border fencing.

Mexicans who cross the border legally to shop in the U.S. "are seeing the fence as a sign that we don't want anyone to come in," said O'Connell, whose nonpartisan group works to spur cross-border commerce. "You want to have security, but you need a balance of economic security."

Many Democratic lawmakers have expressed skepticism about how effective more fencing will prove in significantly reducing illegal immigration. They also said Thursday's bill-signing ceremony spotlighted the GOP's failure to reach a consensus on other immigration-related issues.

"The president and this Congress had a historic opportunity to pass a tough but fair immigration reform plan this year, but instead that chance was squandered," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

The bill mandates that DHS establish "operational control" of the border in 18 months, although it does not precisely define that term. It also calls for the agency to study potential improvements to the border with Canada.

Bush, Signing Bill For Border Fence, Urges Wider Overhaul (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — President Bush signed into law on Thursday a bill providing for construction of 700 miles of added fencing along the Southwestern border, calling the legislation “an important step toward immigration reform.”

The new law is what most House Republicans wanted. But it is not what Senate Republicans or Mr. Bush originally envisioned, and at the signing, in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, the president repeated his call for a far more extensive revamping of immigration law.

A broader measure, approved by the Senate last spring, would have not only enhanced border security but also provided for a guest worker program and the possibility of eventual citizenship for many illegal immigrants already in the country.

But that bill was successfully resisted by House Republicans, who feared a voter backlash against anything that smacked of “amnesty” for illegal immigrants. Those lawmakers portrayed the Senate bill as embracing just that, no matter what the measure’s backers, including Mr. Bush, said to the contrary.

Eventually the president realized that a broad approach was dead for this election year, and he bowed to political reality and embraced the House concept, at least for the time being. On Sept. 29, just before its members headed home to campaign, the Senate approved construction of 700 miles of fencing, which the House had approved that month.

“I want to thank the members of Congress for their work on this important piece of legislation,” Mr. Bush said Thursday, greeting several lawmakers by name. “Ours is a nation of immigrants. We’re also a nation of law. Unfortunately, the United States has not been in complete control of its borders for decades, and therefore illegal immigration has been on the rise.”

The new law also provides for more vehicle barriers, checkpoints and advanced technology to bolster border security. A previously enacted domestic security spending bill provides $1.2 billion for the fence and the accompanying technology.

The fence idea has caused friction between the United States and Mexico, as was demonstrated again Thursday in Ottawa, where the Mexican president-elect, Felipe Calderón, condemned it.

DOJ_NMG_0087029

"Humanity made a huge mistake by building the Berlin Wall, and I believe that today the United States is committing a grave error in building the wall on our border," said Mr. Calderón, who was meeting with the Canadian prime minister, Stephen Harper.

Some of the legislation's critics say the fence — actually several separate sections at a variety of places along the 2,000-mile border — will not keep out people desperate to cross. A foreign policy adviser to Mr. Calderón, Arturo Sarukhán, told Canadian reporters on Wednesday that the fence would merely allow smugglers of illegal migrants to charge them more.

In calling for a broader immigration overhaul, Mr. Bush said again Thursday that his approach did not amount to amnesty.

"We must reduce pressure on our border by creating a temporary worker plan," he said. "Willing workers ought to be matched with willing employers to do jobs Americans are not doing for a temporary — on a temporary — basis. We must face the reality that millions of illegal immigrants are already here. They should not be given an automatic path to citizenship. That is amnesty. I oppose amnesty.

"There is a rational middle ground between granting an automatic path to citizenship for every illegal immigrant and a program of mass deportation, and I look forward to working with Congress to find that middle ground."

Any such search will almost surely have to await a new Congress. The chance that it would be taken up in a lame-duck session after the elections is considered remote.

Doubts Linger On Feasibility Of Barrier (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

Both proponents and opponents of 700 miles of fences along the U.S.-Mexico border question whether the Bush administration can deliver the barriers -- whose exact location, price tag and construction start date remain unknown.

The Secure Fence Act, signed yesterday by President Bush, does not require the government to show any results of fence construction until May 2008 and while it does specify where along the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border the barriers should go, there's no guarantee they ever will.

State legislatures, governors, and city and county governments, along with Indian tribal councils, have veto power over fencing locations.

"Even if Congress funds the construction of 700 miles of border fencing -- and that is a big if -- the fence will do nothing to stem the tide of illegal immigration," said T.J. Bonner, a 28-year U.S. Border Patrol veteran and president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents all 10,000 of the agency's non-supervisory personnel.

The fence act calls for 698 miles of border fences, along with lighting, roads, sensors, cameras and other security devices. A separate $33.8 billion Homeland Security funding bill signed by Mr. Bush on Oct. 10 authorizes $1.2 billion to begin building it.

But fence proponents and opponents agree that the $1.2 billion allocation is far short of the up to $9 billion it will take to build the proposed fencing. Congress has withheld $950 million pending a breakdown of how the money will be spent.

The fence bill also has irked the Mexican government, where President-elect Felipe Calderon has described the proposal as "deplorable" and outgoing President Vicente Fox told reporters in Mexico City he was "confident" the fence would never be built.

The act calls for the construction of "at least 2 layers of reinforced fencing to prevent unlawful entry by aliens into the United States," although it does not specify what type of fencing to build.

"At best, the type of fencing that is contemplated will serve as a speed bump that slows illegal crossers by perhaps a minute or two," Mr. Bonner said, adding that the Border Patrol would have to be increased tenfold to "to intercept these law-breakers."

Mr. Bonner said experience has "amply demonstrated" that increases and declines in the number of illegal aliens coming across the border "are almost exclusively influenced by the amount of law-enforcement personnel assigned to an area rather than the length or type of fences and barriers."

On Wednesday, a poll conducted for CNN by Opinion Research Corp. found that 74 percent of the 1,013 Americans surveyed were in favor of hiring and assigning more Border Patrol agents along the U.S.-Mexico border, while 45 percent said they wanted a 700-mile fence built.

And while the act was passed by Congress last month, lawmakers waited until just prior to the Nov. 7 elections for the president to sign it. With a gaggle of Republicans looking on, Mr. Bush said the legislation modernized the nation's southern border "so we can assure the American people we're doing our job of securing the border."

The act instructs the secretary of homeland security to "take all actions" deemed necessary to "achieve and maintain operational control over the entire international land and maritime borders of the United States" within 18 months.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has voiced his support for a "virtual fence" on the border, which would rely instead on cameras, motion detectors and other security devices to detect people illegally entering the United States.

During a press briefing last month to announce the award of a contract to the Boeing Co. for sophisticated border-detection technology, Mr. Chertoff said the department was looking to build "a 21st-century virtual fence" along the U.S.-Mexico border.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Chertoff said the act will help "build upon the substantial progress" that has been made in better securing the nation's borders, noting that traditional fencing is a "core element" of the Secure Border Initiative -- once funds for the project are appropriated by Congress.

"Comprehensive immigration reform begins with a secure border, and it will help to sustain the significant advancements that have been made by relieving growing pressure on the Border Patrol," he said. "We are turning that corner with the Secure Fence Act, and I commend Congress for their efforts."

But Rep. Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat and a 26-year Border Patrol agent and supervisor who headed the agency's field offices as sector chief in McAllen and El Paso, Texas, has called the bill signing "election year desperation," adding that "a 700 mile fence along a 2,000 mile border ... doesn't come close to solving our problem."

Mr. Reyes, who retired from the Border Patrol in 1995, is the architect of the Border Patrol's "Operation Hold the Line" in El Paso, which continues as a Homeland Security strategy for the Southwest border. The operation featured the assignment of additional agents along the border as visible deterrents and was credited with reducing crime and achieving a marked reduction in illegal immigration in the El Paso area.

Immigration-enforcement authorities and others think efforts by the administration to better secure the border with fences, additional Border Patrol agents and upgraded technology will be effective only if there is a corresponding reduction in employment opportunities through effective work-site enforcement.

"If this administration and Congress were truly sincere about securing our borders, they would enact legislation that eliminates the root cause of illegal immigration -- the employment magnet," Mr. Bonner said.

"With today's technology, it would be a simple matter to develop a 'smart' counterfeit-proof employment-verification document for that purpose. The only thing preventing that from happening is a lack of political will on the part of our elected representatives."

TAX:

I.R.S. Going Slow Before Election (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

The commissioner of internal revenue has ordered his agency to delay collecting back taxes from Hurricane Katrina victims until after the Nov. 7 elections and the holiday season, saying he did so in part to avoid negative publicity.

The commissioner, Mark W. Everson, who has close ties to the White House, said in an interview that postponing collections until after the midterm elections, along with postponing notices to people who failed to file tax returns, was a routine effort to avoid casting the Internal Revenue Service in a bad light.

“We are very sensitive to political perceptions,” Mr. Everson said Wednesday, adding that he regularly discussed with his senior staff members when to take actions and make announcements in light of whether they would annoy a powerful member of Congress or get lost in the flow of news.

The tax agency has broad discretion to change filing deadlines in the case of disasters and has traditionally eased off tax collections before the December holidays.

But four former I.R.S. commissioners, who served under presidents of both parties, said that doing so because of an election was improper and indefensible.

Mr. Everson issued the order to delay enforcement in an Oct. 10 conference call with some of the career civil servants working on tax enforcement in the areas that were devastated by the 2005 hurricane.

"We just spoke with commissioner on the enforcement issue in the gulf," wrote Beth Tucker, the I.R.S. executive in charge of dealing with Hurricane Katrina victims, in an e-mail message to her team obtained by The New York Times. "He prefers that we do not resume any enforcement actions until after Dec. 31 due to the upcoming elections, holiday season, etc."

Former Commissioner Jerome Kurtz, who served under President Jimmy Carter, responded, "Never, never, never," when asked if he would have considered delaying broad-based enforcement actions like sending notices because of any election, national or local. "Oh my God, that is unthinkable," Mr. Kurtz said.

On the other hand, Mark E. Matthews, the I.R.S. deputy director of services and enforcement, who participated in the conference call with Mr. Everson, said that "the reference to elections was in a litany of things we were running through here" and that "I did not read it as being politicized." Mr. Matthews noted that he is a Democrat who worked in the Clinton administration.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, when hundreds of thousands of people lost their homes, incomes and tax records, the I.R.S. delayed the filing deadline for 2005 taxes to Oct. 16, 2006, for those living in the counties most affected by the storm. Normally, those taxpayers who did not file returns or pay their taxes by that extended deadline would begin receiving notices and, eventually, collection demands from the I.R.S.

Mr. Everson's order delayed those collection efforts until early next year.

Terry L. Lemons, an I.R.S. spokesman, said that about 1.2 million taxpayers lived in the seven Louisiana parishes and three Mississippi counties where the agency had allowed people to delay payment of 2005 income taxes.

Mr. Everson was deputy director of the White House budget office in January 2003 when he was nominated by President Bush to be I.R.S. commissioner. His wife, Nanette, was until February the chief ethics lawyer in the Bush White House. There is no indication that anyone in the White House was aware of the order to delay the tax collections.

In an interview, Mr. Everson acknowledged that he had "probably" mentioned the elections to Ms. Tucker in their conversation. He said that in his mind the elections were part of a continuum that ran through the holidays, adding that it was a long-standing practice not to begin enforcement actions near Christmas because it often resulted in negative news and commentary about the I.R.S.

"We talk about the elections here every day," Mr. Everson said. "We deal with the Congress — is there going to be a new Finance Committee chairman, a new Ways and Means Committee chairman?"

He added: "Of course, we think about whether our actions will play in the public space; we have to be seen as legitimate and independent, doing our job, and of course we would not institute a major enforcement action days before an election because it would be misinterpreted."

Donald C. Alexander, who was commissioner under Mr. Carter and Presidents Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford, said he would never have even thought about delaying enforcement because of an election, but added that he thought Mr. Everson was otherwise doing an excellent job.

Charles O. Rossotti, the commissioner under President Bill Clinton and President Bush, said, "That's not appropriate." Mr. Rossotti added that "given the culture of the Treasury and the I.R.S., I just can't imagine anyone would even bring anything like that up."

Sheldon S. Cohen, the Johnson administration tax commissioner, said it was wrong to delay any broad-based enforcement actions because of a pending election. Mr. Cohen said, however, that delay might be appropriate in a matter involving a specific politician.

Three weeks before the 1968 presidential election, he said, he was told that Spiro T. Agnew, Richard Nixon's running mate, was being bribed with free groceries. "Just beginning an investigation, word of which might get into the news, would be unfair since we could not prove or disprove anything before the election," Mr. Cohen said, adding that before leaving office he arranged for an investigation, which ultimately resulted in Mr. Agnew's resignation and no-contest plea in 1973 to charges of income tax evasion.

DOJ_NMG_0087032

Alex P. Trostorff, a tax partner at the New Orleans law firm Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre, said that despite the filing extension offered by the I.R.S., the agency continued to send overdue notices to many people in New Orleans.

"A lot of people are upset," Mr. Trostorff said.

Need Tax Help? Report Offers Slim Chance Of Seeing The IRS (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Talking taxes with the Internal Revenue Service is never easy. Scheduling an appointment to resolve tax problems isn't, either, according to a recently issued report.

Federal auditors made 36 telephone calls to IRS taxpayer assistance centers to schedule meetings when they could discuss tax issues but were able to set up only five appointments.

Of the 31 failed attempts, four IRS employees did not return calls, and the 27 employees who did "would not, for various reasons, allow the auditors to schedule appointments," according to the report by the Treasury inspector general for tax administration.

The inspector general ran the phone test to gauge whether taxpayers were receiving "quality customer service" when calling local IRS offices to schedule appointments.

The IRS suggests that taxpayers visit the agency's 400 assistance centers when they have complex tax issues, need to resolve tax problems, have questions about tax law or feel more comfortable talking to a person than clicking through the IRS Internet site.

"No appointment is necessary -- just walk in -- but if you prefer, you can call a local number . . . and leave a message requesting an appointment to resolve a tax account issue," the IRS Web site advises.

But the review suggested it can be difficult for taxpayers to schedule an appointment so they can avoid waiting in line or obtain extra attention.

The report found that IRS field office guidelines "are unclear and obsolete," noting that the guidelines do not explain to IRS employees "what is considered a complex tax issue that warrants a face-to-face meeting."

In addition, the report said, upper management "was not aware" that employees had been turning away taxpayers seeking appointments at the centers.

The IRS does not keep a list of the number of calls returned or appointments scheduled, and the data that are collected are not complete, the report said.

The taxpayer assistance centers served about 7 million taxpayers in fiscal 2005, providing them with forms, publications and help in completing tax returns. Of the 7 million, about 1 million of the taxpayer contacts came through telephone calls.

IRS management agreed to take steps to improve the handling of requests for appointments. "We will ensure our employees understand we will not refuse an appointment to any taxpayer," Richard J. Morgante , commissioner for the IRS Wage and Investment Division, said in a letter accompanying the report.

Postal Lobbyist Retires

George B. Gould , longtime lobbyist for the National Association of Letter Carriers, will retire at year's end.

His departure represents a big loss for the NALC, which recently landed in hot water with Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) after union President William H. Young blocked passage of her compromise bill to overhaul operations at the U.S. Postal Service for the first time since 1970.

Young balked at a proposed change to workers' compensation benefits that he said would single out postal workers for different treatment than other federal employees who are injured on the job. His move stunned Collins, who had considered the union a legislative ally for the past three years. In an interview, Young declined to discuss staff advice he received in the hours before he objected to the legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0087033

With the loss of Gould, the union may have to rebuild alliances on Capitol Hill. Gould was a former staff director of the old House post office subcommittee and had worked on postal issues for 25 years at the NALC. In an interview, Gould said he had been thinking of retiring from the NALC for almost a year and decided that now was the time to depart.

The NALC, which has 300,000 members, said Jennifer L. Alvarez will take Gould's place as director of legislative and political affairs. She has worked at Postal Service headquarters and in the Clinton administration.

The union also named Tucker McDonald as political director. He previously served as a special assistant for political education at NALC.Talk Shows

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

George M. Gray , assistant administrator for research and development at the Environmental Protection Agency, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Federal Judicial Nominee Says Nothing Wrong With Attending Lesbian Ceremony (AP)

By Sam Hananel, The Associated Press

AP, October 27, 2006

A Michigan judge whose nomination to the federal bench is stalled over her appearance at a lesbian commitment ceremony says she attended as a friend, not to give legal sanction.

The nomination of Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff to be a U.S. District Court judge is on hold because Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., is not satisfied with her response to questions about her views on same-sex marriage, a spokesman for the senator said Thursday.

Neff's status has been in limbo since last month, when Brownback placed his procedural hold -- using a technique that allows a lone senator to stall a nomination. Brownback wanted to know whether there was anything illegal or improper about the 2002 ceremony in Massachusetts and how Neff's actions might shape her judicial philosophy.

In an Oct. 12 letter to Brownback that was released by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday, Neff said a minister presided over the ceremony and she insisted her attendance would not affect her ability to act fairly as a federal judge.

"The ceremony, which was entirely private, took place in Massachusetts, where I had no authority to act in any official capacity and where, in any event, the ceremony had no legal effect," Neff wrote.

She said her family had lived next door to one of the women, Mary Curtin, for more than two decades and considers Curtin part of the extended family.

"When Mary and her partner, Karen Adelman, asked me to participate in their commitment ceremony by delivering a homily, it was not different from being asked by my own daughters to be part of an important event in their lives," Neff wrote.

Neff declined to answer Brownback's questions on whether the Constitution guarantees a right to same-sex marriage or civil unions, saying it would be improper to address questions that might come before her as a federal judge.

"She did not really address the judicial philosophy questions to his satisfaction," Brownback spokesman Brian Hart said. He would not say what Brownback planned to do next.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has declined Brownback's request to bring Neff back for a second hearing, a committee spokeswoman said Thursday. The committee has approved Neff's nomination, which is pending before the full Senate.

Brownback, a vocal opponent of gay marriage, has traveled to Michigan and other states this year while he considers a presidential bid in 2008.

Commitment ceremonies for same-sex couples usually are symbolic and carry no legal rights. Massachusetts did not recognize gay marriages in 2002 but legalized same-sex marriage two years later after a ruling from its highest court.

DOJ_NMG_0087034

President Bush nominated Neff and two others to fill three vacancies in Michigan as part of a compromise this year with Michigan Democratic Sens. Carl Levin and Debbie Stabenow. Neff has a liberal reputation, while the other nominees are considered conservatives.

A Republican Plan To Limit Losses (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

REPUBLICANS AIM to limit House losses by avoiding individual state routs.

Ohio, Indiana, New York, Pennsylvania and Connecticut loom as trouble spots, with at least three seats at risk for Bush's party. In Connecticut, Republicans say vulnerable incumbents Simmons, Shays and Johnson benefit from appeal of Sen. Lieberman's independent candidacy to moderate Republicans.

Forecasters in both parties converge on predictions of Democratic gains between 20 and 25 seats, exceeding the 15 Democrats needed for House control.

A wild card, notes Duke political scientist David Rohde: turnout among independents, who strongly align with Democrats.

GOVERNOR RACES MAY AFFECT outcomes in key congressional contests.

Republicans grow gloomier about gubernatorial prospects in Wisconsin, Michigan and Iowa, home to three competitive House seats and one Senate seat. Strickland's lead over Blackwell in Ohio boosts Brown and four House challengers; Spitzer's edge in New York is boon to Democrats in five competitive House races.

Indiana Gov. Daniels isn't on ballot, but his struggles with toll-road controversy echo through three at-risk House seats. But Bush's party voices growing confidence about Ehrlich's re-election chances in Maryland, a benefit to Republican Senate candidate Steele.

BUSH TARGETS Republican pickup opportunities, skips some battlegrounds.

Stuck below 40% approval, the president hits spots that backed him in 2004 where Republicans have a shot at Democratic incumbents. That includes Iowa and Georgia, where Democrats Boswell and Marshall face tough challenges, and Michigan, where Bouchard tries to oust Democratic Sen. Stabenow.

Next week Bush visits Sugar Land, Texas, where Republicans have faint hopes of holding former DeLay seat. Republicans pare ambitions of pickups in Bush-friendly states West Virginia and South Carolina.

"Staying on the offense and keeping our incumbents are important," says White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

SLAM-DUNK? At least three competitive Democratic House candidates -- Weaver in Kentucky, Shuler in North Carolina, and Brown in California -- refuse to commit to supporting Pelosi for Speaker should her party recapture the House. Amid Republican attacks, Pelosi aides dismiss any doubts the San Francisco Democrat will win the gavel.

WHITE HOUSE SEEKS female banker for Federal Reserve Board vacancy, though industry watchers predict decision won't come before the election. Those under consideration include Terry Jorde of North Dakota's CountryBank USA, Elizabeth Duke of Virginia's TowneBank, and Diane Casey-Landry of trade group America's Community Bankers.

PUBLIC CITIZEN COMPLAINS to IRS that lawmakers routinely break the law by failing to pay taxes when their spouses or children accompany them on corporate-sponsored trips. The Center for Public Integrity estimates that family members have traveled on 2,900 trips financed by U.S. corporations since 1998.

EQUAL TIME: New World Bank book2 says gender-equality advocates focus too much on women, not enough on men. The authors' mantra: "men-streaming."

GAY MARRIAGE RETURNS to campaign spotlight.

New Jersey Supreme Court sought to limit controversy by denying gay couples the "marriage" label while granting equal rights with straight couples. But Republicans hope specter of lawsuits will turn out social conservatives in eight states with gay-marriage ballot measures -- including Tennessee and Virginia, where Republican Senate seats are at risk.

Little effect is expected on New Jersey Senate race. New Jersey justices noted uproar following Massachusetts high court ruling legalizing gay marriage, contrasted with muted reaction to "civil unions" approved by Vermont and Connecticut.

Justice Thomas Opens Up On 'Aggressive' Appellate Judges (LAW)

By R. Robin Mcdonald, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, October 27, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court Associate Justice Clarence Thomas told an Atlanta audience Thursday "I am finally home."

"Thirty-two years ago, I tried desperately to come to Atlanta," Thomas said. Unable to find a job there after graduating from Yale Law School, he took a job in the Missouri attorney general's office.

As a native Georgian, "I had planned to be the 11th Circuit's justice from the very beginning," Thomas said at the start of a two-day continuing education seminar on appellate practice in Atlanta. But, he said, "another justice was holding the 11th Circuit hostage."

That other justice was Anthony M. Kennedy, appointed by Ronald Reagan in 1988, who was already assigned to the 11th Circuit. Following the confirmation of Justice Samuel Alito earlier this year, Kennedy moved to the 9th Circuit and Thomas was assigned the 11th Circuit.

As the 11th Circuit's assigned justice, Thomas said he intends to be "quite involved." A Supreme Court justice is assigned to each federal circuit in the nation. That justice receives applications from the assigned circuit regarding emergency actions -- such as stays of execution or extensions for court filings.

Thomas fielded wide-ranging questions from members of the appellate bar on subjects as diverse as the aggressiveness of appellate judges, amicus briefs, and cameras at the U.S. Supreme Court. As he had promised after he was introduced, Thomas pulled no punches.

On appellate judges' manners: Thomas said he disapproves of what he calls increasingly aggressive questioning of attorneys by appellate judges from the bench. Thomas said that as a young state attorney general arguing before the Supreme Court of Missouri, he recalled justices who "actually allowed me to make my argument. They listened to what I had to say. ... Nor did I ever feel I had not been heard or did not have my day in court."

But Thomas said that kind of old-fashioned court etiquette has virtually disappeared. "It seems fashionable now for judges to be more aggressive in oral arguments," he said. "I find it unnecessary and distracting. ... I truly think oral arguments would be more useful if the justices would listen rather than debating the lawyers. ... I think the judges need to listen if the arguments are to be effective."

On his own work habits: "Never do anything unnecessarily to decide a case," he said. "Do not ask questions that are unnecessary."

That means Thomas is more likely to sit and listen to an oral argument than attempt to question the lawyers who present them.

"My job is not to rape your argument, not to make your argument, not to hurt your feelings," the associate justice said.

On threats to an independent judiciary: Thomas said he believes that an independent judiciary is more at risk today. "Some of it is our own doing," he said. "We're drifting into areas people have strong feelings about ... We're getting into social issues where I don't think we should be making decisions." The abortion issue, Thomas suggested, "has changed the confirmation process and not for the better."

"I don't think we're better off," he said of what have become protracted confirmation hearings. "We don't have a better court. ... We are getting to be political footballs."

On amicus briefs: "They range from useless to extremely useful; from credible to 'You've got to be kidding me,'" Thomas said. The most helpful, he said, are those filed by "honest brokers ... who don't take either side" or groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union whose legal credibility, Thomas said, is well established. "You know, I'm not one who gloms on to the ACLU's arguments," he said. But, he added, "They are pretty principled about the positions they take, and they're well-informed and pretty helpful."

In contrast, Thomas pointed to a group of historians who filed amicus briefs in the Guantanamo detainee cases Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U. S. 507, and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184, whom, he suggested had a clear political agenda. "I'm not going to waste my time with that," he said.

On cameras in the courtroom: "I'm not all that enthralled with that idea. I don't see how it helps us do our job. I think it may distract from us doing our job." And, he added, if 80 percent of the appellate process is wrapped up in the briefs, "How many of the people watching will know what the case is about if they haven't read the briefs?" The level of understanding, he suggested, would be "very shallow."

Bon Appétit On Overseas Trips, Congress's Rules Are Often Ignored (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Jerry Lewis and seven fellow members of Congress jetted to Europe in July 2003 on official government business and dined in restaurants from Warsaw to Lisbon.

Instead of paying for the meals out of their government allowances, they were treated by a parade of defense contractors and lobbyists, most of which sent personnel to Europe to host the meals, according to foreign-service officials and the companies. The meals gave Boeing Co., Lockheed Martin Corp., Northrop Grumman Corp. and others private access to legislators who control billions of dollars in government contracts.

At the time, Mr. Lewis headed a House of Representatives Appropriations subcommittee in charge of defense spending. He now chairs the House Appropriations Committee itself, which decides where a big portion of government money is spent.

One problem: The hitherto undisclosed free meals likely violated House rules and possibly federal law, experts on congressional ethics say. House rules, designed to prevent private interests from unduly influencing legislators' work, bar members -- with some exceptions -- from accepting such meals on congressional trips abroad.

The Lewis delegation, which counted six Republicans and two Democrats, was an extreme example, but is not an isolated incident, according to scores of interviews with congressional staffers, company spokesmen and others. In recent years it has been routine for House members to accept meals from private interests on official government trips abroad.

In 2004, Rep. David Hobson, an Ohio Republican and chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development, visited Normandy, France, with a group that dined courtesy of a defense company and a lobbying firm, according to the company and House staffers. The following year, on another trip to France, his party was hosted by a maker of nuclear reactors.

Rep. James T. Walsh, chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee that deals with military facilities, visited Germany in 2005 on a congressional trip. There, a big federal contractor paid for dinner for the New York Republican's group in Heidelberg, according to the company and House staffers.

In a written statement, Mr. Lewis didn't respond to specific questions about the meals. He says: "I have always made every effort to strictly comply with relevant rules and regulations governing" official travel abroad.

During the course of their business in the U.S., legislators frequently attend dinners where they rub shoulders with companies and lobbyists, especially at widely attended events, which aren't subject to strict rules.

Charges of ethics lapses have been an issue for months, contributing to the list of problems dogging incumbents as elections loom. The Appropriations Committee has been rocked by a series of criminal investigations. In November 2005, former member Randy "Duke" Cunningham pleaded guilty to charges stemming from bribes he admitted soliciting from contractors. Mr. Lewis is under federal investigation for his relationship with lobbying firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, which sponsored one of the meals on his European trip.

Committee member Alan Mollohan, a Democrat who was on the Lewis trip, is under federal investigation for steering House appropriations to business partners.

DOJ_NMG_0087037

The scandals involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to bribe members of Congress, also related to lawmakers' travel. These were private trips, such as the Scottish golf outings that Mr. Abramoff arranged for certain legislators in a bid to win or repay favors.

But hidden from view by an absence of public records are frequent violations that occur on official, government-paid trips abroad. These trips, known as "codels" for "congressional delegations," are designed to give lawmakers first-hand knowledge of matters relevant to their legislation.

On these official trips, House rules on private funding are much stricter. Members are required only to use government money to pay their expenses. The rules ban private parties from paying for things such as meals or lodging, except in a few, narrow circumstances, such as widely attended events.

In addition, federal law bans members from soliciting any gifts from people or companies that may be "substantially affected" by members' official actions. Both the law and House rules also prohibit members from accepting any gifts worth $50 or more or which add up to $100 or more from the same source during a calendar year.

No members of Congress have been prosecuted under the solicitation law for accepting free meals on overseas trips.

Many codels involve serious work. Several staffers cited Rep. Jim Kolbe, an Arizona Republican and chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, as someone who limits expenses and works so relentlessly that he has difficulty getting other members to travel with him. "I've heard people characterize Kolbe's trips as the Bataan death march," says one veteran congressional staffer.

Others appear to be little more than government-paid vacations. Chairmen of committees and subcommittees often invite members and their spouses to places such as Paris and London as a way of building personal ties that translate into support on important votes.

In response to written questions, several members say the meals were acceptable because the rules exempt accepting gifts worth less than $50. None would provide information on their actual cost.

The House Ethics Committee hasn't ruled specifically whether the $50 exemption applies in the case of codels, says Jan Baran, a Washington, D.C., lawyer specializing in federal ethics issues. In any case, says Stanley Brand, a former House general counsel, the cost of a spouse's meal also would count, making it hard to keep within the $50 limit.

Lawmakers are given per diem money -- in cash -- to cover travel expenses. The unused money is supposed to be returned, but the rule hasn't been enforced for as long as many congressional staffers can remember, they say. As a result, unused per diem money is not usually returned by legislators and their staffers. Records show that only a few recipients have returned the unused funds.

The codels have become increasingly frequent. A database maintained by PoliticalMoneyLine, a unit of Congressional Quarterly Inc., shows there have been 3,140 such trips by members from 2000 through the second quarter of 2006, the latest available data. The number of these trips reached a peak in 2005, with 658 official foreign trips by congressional delegations, compared with 220 a decade earlier.

Codels are recorded only in quarterly travel summaries filed by committee chairmen and the Speaker of the House. These list dates, countries visited and total amount of per diems paid out to each member. The reports don't specify the purpose of the trip or how per diem money was spent.

House rules require individual members to file detailed expense reports from the trips, which are then supposed to be publicly available from committee chairmen. But spokesmen for two house committees that host frequent codels -- Appropriations and Foreign Relations -- say no such records are available.

Because details of the trips don't become public, says a veteran congressional staffer who has gone on them, "there was a feeling that on codels no rules applied."

Republicans led most of the codels in recent years and made up the bulk of attendees because they are in the majority. House rules require at least one member of the minority party to be included. Typically one or two Democrats have gone on each trip.

DOJ_NMG_0087038

For the corporations that host lawmakers, the benefits are clear. While no one alleges any quid pro quo for the meals, veteran staffers who have been on such trips say they can influence congressional business. The meals help smooth the way for favorable votes.

They also give companies advance access to information. One senior aide says the official work members do while on the trip "may change policy direction, which companies may be there to witness or hear about over dinner."

In August 2004, Mr. Hobson, the Ohio Republican, led a delegation to Normandy for the groundbreaking of an "interpretive center" at a cemetery for American soldiers killed during World War II. During the seven-day trip, the Hobson delegation was feted with at least two private restaurant dinners, one given by Northrop and another by the PMA Group, a leading Arlington, Va., lobbyist for defense companies. Both flew over executives to host the meals, people present say.

Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, the senior Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, attended the PMA and Northrop dinners but reimbursed the hosts for the meals, according to a person with knowledge of the events. He paid for himself, his wife and a staff member, this person says. Congressional staffers say lawmakers do this only rarely.

Carmen Jacobs, a lawyer for the PMA Group, says the company won't comment about the dinner. Randy Belote, vice president for corporate and international communications for Northrop, also declines to comment about his firm's dinner.

On a 2005 trip to visit nuclear-fuel processing plants in France, Mr. Hobson and his delegation attended a dinner near Avignon, in southern France, hosted by Areva SA, the world's largest maker of nuclear reactors. The chairman of Paris-based Areva's U.S. subsidiary is former U.S. Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham. The company has been marketing reactors to American utility companies.

Charles Hufnagel, an Areva spokesman, confirms the company hosted a dinner for Mr. Hobson's group, but declines to give any details.

Mr. Hobson, in a written statement, says: "We believe that we have complied with all of the rules of the House of Representatives." He didn't respond to specific questions about the trips.

In midsummer 2005, Mr. Walsh led a tour of U.S. overseas military installations, including in Germany. On that trip, Munich-based Siemens AG, a big U.S. federal contractor, paid for a dinner for the group in Heidelberg. Siemens flew over from Washington some of its government-relations executives to host the dinner, says a person who was present.

On the same codel, which also stopped in France, aerospace contractor Lockheed took advantage of an exception to the rule that allows delegations to eat at "widely attended events," which the House defines as including at least 25 guests in addition to the delegation. Lockheed says dozens of people attended the dinner it hosted at the Hôtel de Crillon, one of Paris's fanciest hotels, overlooking the Place de la Concorde and the Seine.

In an interview, Mr. Walsh says such company dinners serve a useful purpose. Often local country officials are invited and the companies "are sort of facilitators for bringing us together," he says. "We need to follow the rules and I believe we do follow the rules."

When first asked about the Siemens dinner, Mr. Walsh said about 25 people in total attended, including the delegation and spouses, which he says meant the event met the exception for "widely attended events." When reminded that the rule requires the attendance of 25 people in addition to legislators and spouses, he said perhaps a larger number had attended. "It was over a year and a half ago. I wasn't counting heads," he said. Siemens declines to say how many people attended.

In many cases in which lawmakers were entertained by companies, participants wouldn't say how the companies learned about the trips or the itineraries so they could set up these events in the first place. Requesting a free meal may violate the federal law on soliciting gifts.

On the 2003 Lewis trip, which lasted 11 days, official work appears to have been subordinate to less arduous pursuits. The expedition was designed to confer with officials in three "Coalition of the Willing" countries: Poland, Portugal and the United Kingdom, according to a news release issued by one participant. Each country had backed the invasion of Iraq.

U.S. Embassy officials who helped shepherd the group say the lawmakers held meetings with local and U.S. military officials that mostly lasted about 45 minutes. The rest of the time, they recall, the group went sightseeing and was entertained by contractors and lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0087039

In his statement, Mr. Lewis listed a number of meetings held during the trip, including with members of the Polish and British parliaments and with U.S. generals and ambassadors.

"In 2003, I was fortunate to lead a fabulous bipartisan group of members to three countries who played an early and instrumental role in our fight against terrorism in Iraq," he adds.

Mr. Lewis arranged for the Air Force to provide a C-9 jet -- the military equivalent of a civilian DC-9 jetliner -- for the roughly 20-strong delegation, which included many of the members' spouses and staffers. A spokesman for the Air Force Reserve Command says C-9 jets cost $15,504 an hour to operate.

An official House handbook states that legislators should use American commercial airlines "whenever possible, unless such service is not reasonably available." An attraction of traveling in Air Force jets is that spouses fly free. Congressional records show delegations routinely take military flights to destinations well-served by commercial airlines, such as Paris and London.

John Scofield, spokesman for the Appropriations Committee, says he has been on multiple codels during his career. "Every one I've been on has been on a military aircraft," he says, adding, "Typically spouses travel with the members. That's the way it always is."

The Lewis delegation traveled in late July and early August during Congress's summer recess. In addition to Mr. Lewis, the Republicans in the delegation were Joe Barton of Texas, Ken Calvert of California, Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, John McHugh of New York and Adam Putnam of Florida. The Democrats were Mr. Mollohan of West Virginia and Lucille Roybal-Allard of California.

In response to written questions, a spokesman for Mr. Putnam says in an email that the lawmaker "didn't know/remember who paid for the dinners," but that he "fully complied with the regulations governing per diems."

A spokeswoman for Mr. McHugh, in a written statement, says he "was responsible for, and paid, all expenses and reimbursements as required under established House rules." She didn't specify whether he reimbursed the companies hosting meals.

In a written statement, Mr. Frelinghuysen didn't respond to questions about the meals. He says the purpose of the trip was "to thank some of our coalition partners," and that "it was an honor to do so." The other members of the delegation didn't respond to numerous requests for comment.

In Warsaw, Lockheed hosted a dinner for the group, says Jeffrey Adams, a company spokesman. People with knowledge of the trip say the dinner was at Polska Tradycja, a fancy Warsaw restaurant whose menu included wild-game pâté and roulades of boar, and that there were few if any attendees besides the Lewis entourage and Lockheed personnel.

In a written statement, Lockheed says: "The purpose of this meeting was to discuss issues related to our initiatives in the region. All aspects of Lockheed Martin's support for the dinner were conducted in a manner fully consistent with the applicable rules and regulations governing such activities."

Mr. Adams, the Lockheed spokesman, says the events it hosts for congressional delegations are usually "widely attended" and don't fall afoul of House rules. "We work very hard to ensure compliance with House and Senate rules," he adds. He says he didn't know how many people attended the Warsaw dinner.

In Lisbon, the delegation had two free meals in one day. One came from the lobbying firm Copeland Lowery. The firm split up a few months ago after news broke that it was under federal investigation in connection with appropriations Mr. Lewis helped arrange for its clients. The meal was hosted by Letitia White, a principal at the firm and a former Lewis aide, says Patrick Dorton, a Copeland Lowery spokesman. Mr. Dorton says the lunch "complied with congressional rules." He declines to elaborate.

That night, Chicago-based Boeing gave a dinner at the Casa do Leão, a restaurant overlooking the Targus river on the grounds of Castelo de São Jorge, a medieval fortress and top Lisbon tourist site. Boeing says Ms. White attended that dinner although she had no role in organizing it.

Douglas Kennett, a Boeing spokesman, says the dinner "adhered to all the appropriate rules," but declines to comment further.

Such entertainment continued through the group's final stop in London. In early August, Northrop hosted a fish-and-chips dinner at the Prospect of Whitby, a historic London pub, according to Jim Ervin, a lobbyist who helped arrange the dinner on behalf of Northrop.

DOJ_NMG_0087040

Mr. Belote, the Northrop spokesman, says: "Northrop Grumman does not have many opportunities to educate traveling congressional delegations on the corporation's international presence and business activities, and felt that the codel's visit to the U.K. was a good event in which to participate for that purpose."

Mr. Belote says in recent years Northrop has hosted similar dinners for codels in Britain, Germany and elsewhere. He wouldn't identify the delegations.

State Department records show that at the time of the Lewis trip, the authorized per diem for Warsaw was $305; Lisbon was $190; and London $364. In addition, the delegation received "enhanced per diems." Mr. Scofield says that was compensation for exchange-rate fluctuations.

The House Ethics Committee says to date there haven't been any investigations or action taken against members who break the rules by accepting the free meals. A spokesman for the ethics committee says it isn't responsible for day-to-day oversight of codels and per diems. But "if an infraction of the rule were brought to our attention, that would be another matter."

Harman Intelligence Post At Risk (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner

AP, October 27, 2006

As top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Jane Harman would seem positioned to take the gavel if her party wins control of the House on Nov. 7.

Instead, Harman faces being sidelined by either of two other lawmakers now viewed as front-runners: Reps. Alcee Hastings of Florida and Silvestre Reyes of Texas, the second- and third-ranking Democrats on the intelligence panel.

Harman, 61, used her seniority on the committee to build a national profile on intelligence and defense. But her hawkish views hardened an ideological gulf between her and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the liberal House minority leader. Both are Californians.

"There is no seniority on the Intelligence Committee. Not a person who's on there now is on there the first day of the Congress," Pelosi said in a recent interview.

She sidestepped a question on Harman's future by citing House rules that give her more say over Intelligence than any other committee. "The leader or the speaker can appoint a whole new set of people," Pelosi said.

Harman declined to be interviewed but issued a statement through her office: "I love my work on the committee and hope to continue it. House Intelligence Committee activities are directly relevant to the major concerns of my constituents."

Her case is not helped by an investigation into her ties with a pro-Israel group that formerly employed two lobbyists indicted on charges of disclosing U.S. defense secrets.

Last week, the Web site time.com reported that the FBI had begun probing whether she enlisted the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's help in lobbying Pelosi to keep her job.

A federal law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, told The Associated Press that Harman's ties with AIPAC have been under scrutiny since last year.

However, the inquiry has been dormant in recent months and so far has failed to turn up evidence of illegal activity, said the official, who would not detail any concerns there might be.

Harman has dismissed the allegations as "laughable and scurrilous."

Hastings is being promoted for the Intelligence Committee chairmanship by the 42-member Congressional Black Caucus. Choosing him could help Pelosi curry favor with a caucus upset by her decision to kick another black Democrat, Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson, off a committee after the FBI characterized $90,000 found in his freezer as a bribe.

"I don't think the CBC members will look very kindly on Mr. Hastings being passed over, especially since he does have the expertise and he is next in line," said Myra Dandridge, the group's spokeswoman.

Hastings, however, has his own baggage: He's an impeached federal judge. Republicans have already cited that in news releases warning voters against giving Democrats control of Congress on Election Day.

Defense contractors and policy analysts also are sounding alarms about jettisoning Harman, who has won allies through her expertise on intelligence systems and spy satellites, many of them built in her coastal Los Angeles County district.

DOJ_NMG_0087041

Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, said no one in the House understands intelligence matters and spy technology better than Harman.

"It seems as though Pelosi is making her political calculations based entirely on Democratic Party considerations rather than on broader national needs," Thompson said. "This is an awfully bad way for the Democrats to get started in proving their defense credentials."

Harman, serving her sixth term, played a key role in legislation creating a national intelligence director after the Sept. 11 terror attacks. She supported the Patriot Act and the Iraq war — Pelosi opposed both — and appears regularly on Sunday talk shows to support her views.

In 1998, Harman ran for California governor but lost in the primary. She reclaimed her old House seat two years later.

'Death Of A President': Realism With A False Face (WP)

By Ann Hornaday

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

"The whole world is watching."

Those words, chanted by demonstrators at the disastrous 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago, are never uttered in "Death of a President," but they echo nonetheless. An unsettling and exceptionally skillful exercise in blurring the lines between appearance and reality, this fictional, documentary-style film uses the incendiary premise of the assassination of President George W. Bush in the not-too-distant future as a springboard for thinking about the practical and psychic toll of how America deals with terrorist threats.

Produced by Britain's Channel 4 television network and co-written and directed by Gabriel Range, "Death of a President," or "DOAP" as it has come to be called by its publicists, has garnered understandable notoriety after making its debut at the Toronto Film Festival and being picked up by the same studio that distributed "The Passion of the Christ." Two theater chains have refused to show the movie, which uses real-life news footage and flawless computerized special effects to create a chilling approximation of an assassination, and a few television and radio networks have decided not to air advertisements.

The hubbub must please the filmmakers, who surely chose their putative subject for its potential, in marketing argot, to garner invaluable unearned media. The question is whether "DOAP" has earned its own inflammatory conceit. Is it politically provocative agitprop or merely a cynical, exploitative stunt?

Probably the latter, but one that has been performed with unusual dexterity. Structured like an installment of "Frontline," "DOAP" often has the taut urgency of that PBS series, with witnesses providing a detailed tick-tock of events as they unfolded. Indeed, "DOAP" is so convincing that, like most he-said, he-said documentaries, it eventually suffers from a fatal, talking-head inertness.

Still, "DOAP" gets off to a riveting start, with presidential aides and FBI agents (portrayed with terrific verisimilitude by the actors who play them) "recalling" the day in 2007 when Bush, in Chicago for a speech to a business group, encounters the biggest and most unruly demonstration of his administration. Range intercuts archival footage of past demonstrations -- picture the fury of Bush's first inauguration combined with that of the 1999 anti-globalization march in Seattle -- with staged interviews to create an atmosphere that crackles with dread; when Bush finally enters the scrum of the fatal rope line (his face is digitally superimposed on an actor's), the mood turns sickening. (As is the occupational hazard of anyone working with of-the-moment material, events have in some ways outstripped the film's attempts at realism, from recent doings in North Korea to the drama co-starring Dennis Hastert.)

Those who would condemn "DOAP" without seeing it should be made aware of one crucial fact: Range does not depict that event with glee or even a smirk. The shooting of Bush is indeed portrayed with solemnity and grief (although some red-meat Dems will no doubt mentally insert screeching "Psycho" violins when someone first refers to "President Cheney"). The ballast of "DOAP," after the horrific event itself unfolds, becomes a true-crime procedural dedicated to the search for the assassin. It's at this point that Range reveals his true agenda: Although a few suspects come under scrutiny, only one is finally railroaded into a kangaroo conviction, the result of a beefed-up Patriot Act, political expedience and a populace agog with paranoia and fear.

With its seamless use of actual and staged footage, "DOAP" at its best will remind some viewers of "Medium Cool," Haskell Wexler's brilliant neo-realist thriller that was filmed during the 1968 convention and released the next year. "DOAP" possesses the same sense of immediacy and political moment, and when Range focuses on the anti-Bush demonstrators, their faces contorted into masks of fury and contempt, he taps a vein of present-day rage that in some quarters seems to be on the verge of bursting again.

And in playing into the historical fascination with assassination, it resembles a kind of 21st-century "JFK," tweaked to hit the hot-button issues of the day. (The most obvious comparison is with the politically charged pseudo-docs of avant-garde filmmaker Mike Z, whose work has been shown at the DC Underground Film Festival. His Internet hoaxes are so good that he's been investigated by real FBI agents.)

But it's not as if those issues -- the tensions between civil liberties and security in a post-9/11 world -- aren't being addressed in pop culture, whether in such television series as "24" and "Sleeper Cell" or even the recent film "The Departed." How American democracy will engage those issues in months and years to come will in a very real sense define this country. And a rigorous, sober, intellectually honest discussion, not a partisan food fight or piece of cinematic showmanship, is what is called for.

Range doesn't advance that discussion as much as use it as a fig leaf for his own self-serving interests. He's artistically akin to the man who shouts "Fire!" in a crowded theater, and then wonders why no one sticks around to hear his argument for brighter exit signs.

At such a pivotal juncture, we deserve better. We need better. Nearly 40 years on, the world is still watching.

Death of a President (93 minutes, at Landmark's E Street Cinema) is rated R for brief violent images.

The Education Revolution America Needs (WP)

By Eugene Hickok

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings recently commented that the No Child Left Behind Act is nearly perfect. "I talk about No Child Left Behind like Ivory soap: It's 99.9 percent pure," Spellings said.

Even if Secretary Spellings were right that NCLB is 99.9% pure, it still would not be the formula for what ails American education.

The current debate over NCLB overlooks a critical problem: Nothing the administration does under NCLB will ensure the law's promise that every child will be proficient in reading and math by 2014. For reasons unrelated to the law's merit, NCLB is simply not up to the task. Something far more profound and transformative must happen for American education to offer every child the opportunity to succeed.

The deeper problem is the existing institutional architecture of American public education. No Child Left Behind erects an accountability system atop the status quo and requires states to provide families with options when schools fail. But public education governance, structure, finance, management and politics remain intact.

Here is the heart of the problem: American public education -- because of the way it is structured, administered, funded and understood by parents, teachers, administrators and taxpayers -- is incapable of delivering on the promises of NCLB. The root of the problem isn't in the law; it's in the American education system. It can't get there from here.

Today's public education system essentially tells parents: "This is the school your child will attend. This is when we teach, what we teach and who will teach." In short, it puts the system ahead of the child.

We need an education environment that listens and responds when a parent says: "This is my child; these are my hopes and dreams for my child, his needs and interests, his strengths and weaknesses. Why should I entrust my child to your care?" We need educational opportunities that put the child first.

NCLB likely will show just how much needs to happen to achieve this. But the law itself can't help us do it. No federal law ever could.

To move us in the right direction, we need to toss aside certain assumptions. First, we must not confuse education with schooling. Education takes place long before a child enters school and lasts a lifetime. Schooling is about institutions and infrastructure. We need to focus on education in America, not just schooling.

DOJ_NMG_0087043

Second, we need to put aside the tiresome debate over public versus private education. What matters is the quality of the education a child receives, not where he or she receives it. In the name of preserving public schooling, we have created obstacles to improving education for all our children. Public education belongs to the people. Shouldn't we be the ones deciding where our children go to school? Why should we feel comfortable with the government making such a fundamentally important decision?

A new vision of education in America should embrace the principles on which America is supposed to be based: freedom, equality, opportunity, responsibility and ownership. The status quo lacks freedom, and the faÃ§ade of equality has allowed an achievement gap to haunt the nation. Millions are denied a real opportunity. Newly minted accountability systems have school administrators gagging and leave too many parents confused, resulting in too many failing to take responsibility for the future of our children.

As for ownership, our public schools have become institutions of government, serving bureaucracies rather than the public. It's as though the system owns us rather than we owning the system.

Imagine what education in America could look like with these new principles in place. With freedom, families could decide how best to educate their children. Equality would be measured in terms of the education children receive and each student's achievement, rather than merely in dollars spent per student. Responsibility would begin at home; parents would have the power to determine whether their children are receiving a quality education. This more robust notion of accountability would enable people to determine how much their investment yields in terms of a child's education.

Gradually, families might begin to take back ownership of their children's education. Ownership is essential, giving a sense of authority that could drive ongoing improvement in education. The relationship of family, child and education is direct and tangible, rather than distorted by the demands of a system.

Of course, we have far to go before this becomes reality. But it would be a mistake to think that No Child Left Behind delivers the education system we need. At best, it will help us understand just how far we have to go, fueling our frustrations and disappointments along the way. NCLB is a wake-up call. What's needed is an American education revolution.

New Home Sales Rise, But Median Price Falls (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bob Willis

USA Today, October 27, 2006

New home sales in the USA unexpectedly rose for a second month in September, even as selling prices declined by the most since 1970.

Purchases rose 5.3%, to an annual pace of 1.075 million, from a 1.021 million rate in August, the Commerce Department said Thursday. The median price of a new home dropped 9.7% from a year earlier, partly a result of more sales of homes priced less than $200,000 and fewer purchases of more expensive houses.

The report suggests that builder incentives, lower mortgage rates and falling prices will keep this year's housing slowdown from deepening. It also signals that the Federal Reserve, which this week kept interest rates unchanged for a third month, is successfully managing an economic slowdown that it hopes will stifle inflation.

“The worst of the downturn in housing seems to be over,” said Lynn Reaser, chief economist at Bank of America Investment Strategies Group in Boston. “Home builders are achieving success in boosting sales, although at the cost of aggressive incentives.”

The report follows data Wednesday from the National Association of Realtors showing that sales of previously owned homes fell last month to the lowest level in nearly three years.

DOJ_NMG_0087044

The median price of a new home declined to $217,100 in September from $240,400 a year earlier, Thursday's report showed. It was the biggest drop since an 11.2% year-over-year fall in December 1970, the Commerce Department said. The median price was the lowest since $211,600 in September 2004.

Inventories also declined in September. The number of homes for sale dropped to a seasonally adjusted 557,000 during the month, the lowest since March. The supply of homes at the current sales rate declined to 6.4 months' worth from 6.8 months.

The Fed kept its benchmark interest rate at 5.25% this week and said lower energy prices should help reduce inflation, as "the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

Central bankers are "no longer worried about the downside risks to the economy from housing," said Chris Rupkey, an economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi in New York.

"This should be good news, as a weakened housing sector is unlikely to keep the Fed from achieving a soft landing for the economy," he said.

Sales of new homes are still down 14% from the same time last year, the Commerce Department said. The National Association of Realtors forecast a 17.3% drop in new home sales this year to 1.06 million.

New-Home Sales Jumped 5.3% Last Month As Prices Plunged (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater And Benton Ives-halperin

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The median price of a new home plunged in September from a year earlier by the largest amount in more than 35 years. But in a sign that the housing market could be nearing bottom, the pace of sales rebounded for a second month.

Orders for durable goods, such as cars and computers, surged 7.8% in September over the previous month, the largest gain since June 2000. Virtually all the strength came from a giant increase in commercial aircraft orders; outside of transportation, orders inched up 0.1%.

Thursday's data suggested that the economy is still growing, albeit at a moderate pace. That is the scenario sought by the U.S. Federal Reserve, which on Wednesday decided to hold short-term interest rates steady for a third straight month.

"Looking forward, there has been a significant improvement in the overall investment climate in the past month and a half -- inflation uncertainty has declined, long-term interest rates have moved down and the Fed has kept interest rates on an even keel," Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight, wrote in a research note.

Indeed, the Commerce Department's measures of shipments and orders of "core" capital goods, or those excluding aircraft and defense, suggest business investment is picking up and that the economy may regain some momentum in the fourth quarter after a tepid third quarter.

Shipments of core capital goods plunged 2.1% in September and increased at a slower annualized rate in the third quarter than they did in the second. But orders jumped 1.1% in September and rose at a faster annualized rate in the third quarter than they did the previous quarter. High corporate profits are enabling businesses to make capital investments on equipment and facilities that can lead to future growth.

The Commerce Department Thursday said the median price for a new home sold in September fell 9.7% to $217,100 from a year earlier. That was the sharpest year-to-year drop since December 1970.

At the same time, though, new-home sales rose a second straight month in September, jumping 5.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.075 million homes. It marked the second consecutive increase in sales following three months of declines.

In another hopeful sign, inventories of unsold homes and new homes decreased. According to Commerce data, there were an estimated 557,000 homes for sale at the end of September, representing a 6.4 months' supply at the current sales rate. That represents a 1.9% decline in inventories over August, the sharpest decline since December 2000.

The declines in housing prices underscored the severity of the correction in the once-booming market, which had seen sales of both new and existing homes soar to record levels for five consecutive years, propelled by the lowest mortgage rates in more than four decades. This year, rising mortgage rates have helped cool sales.

A 7.8% surge in durable goods orders last month, to a seasonally adjusted $226.70 billion, meanwhile, was largely due to a jump in transportation orders -- specifically commercial aircraft -- which rose 27.6% in September over the previous month. Durable goods orders fell the two previous months.

A.G. Edwards & Sons economist Gary Thayer said the 0.1% increase in durable goods excluding transportation orders is "more representative of the manufacturing economy right now -- still soft, consistent with moderate economic growth."

In other economic news, the Labor Department Thursday said the number of new applicants for unemployment insurance benefits rose last week, suggesting labor markets remain relatively healthy. Initial jobless claims rose 8,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 308,000 in the week ended Oct. 21.

"These data still portray a relatively tight labor market, tighter than indicated by the recent growth in payroll employment," Steven Wood, chief economist at Insight Economics, said in a research note.

New-Home Prices Fall Sharply (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Home builders, struggling to keep ahead in a weakening market, cut prices and offered a variety of other discounts in September to help sell their newly constructed houses, the latest government and industry statistics show.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that the median price of a new home plunged 9.7 percent last month, compared with September 2005, falling to $217,100, the biggest such drop since December 1970.

Statistics from the National Association of Home Builders showed a similar slide. Builders reported cutting prices in September by 5 percent, according to the association's most recent data.

Just two months ago, prices of new homes were still on the rise.

At least to some extent, the lower prices achieved the developers' goal: the backlog of unsold new homes on the market fell in September for the second consecutive month, while the number sold, adjusted for normal seasonal variations, rose by 5.3 percent from the previous month.

But economists and industry experts noted that the reported numbers provide a somewhat distorted picture of market reality. While they seemed to suggest a rebound in sales and a precipitous drop in prices, the data was skewed by a higher number of sales in the South, where homes are cheaper, and fewer in the more expensive Northeast.

Last month, sales in the South accounted for 56 percent of all new homes sold in the country, compared with 52 percent a year earlier. The average square footage of a house sold in September declined as well, pulling down the median price.

While new-home prices across the country may not be falling quite as sharply as the reported numbers suggest, builders are also offering a variety of hidden price cuts in response to the much harsher housing climate that they now face.

"We're going to run our business as if it's going to stay tough for a while," said Richard J. Dugas Jr., chief executive of Pulte Homes, one of the nation's largest residential builders. On Wednesday, Pulte said its profit in the third quarter fell by more than half, compared with the same period a year earlier.

Indeed, profits are falling fast in many parts of the country for builders, who are rapidly scaling back on their future construction plans.

The home builders' association reported that 45 percent of builders and developers said they cut prices in September to maintain sales volume. That was up from only 19 percent a year earlier. Similarly, the association reported that 55 percent offered amenities like granite counters or upgraded kitchen cabinets for no additional cost. Only 19 percent did so a year earlier.

The cost of those incentives was not reflected in the new-home price data, which suggested that builders were making even less money from each sale than the shrinking official prices would indicate.

"Builders do not like to lower prices because it sends the wrong signal to potential buyers," Patrick Newport, an economist with Global Insight, said in a research note. "How much incentives matter today is difficult to gauge — but in markets in which power is quickly shifting from sellers to buyers, they probably matter quite a bit."

Cancellations were also left out of the new-home statistics. The Commerce Department records a new home as sold when the buyer and builder sign a contract. The home builders association said that cancellations had jumped by 50 percent in the last year.

"The cancellation rate is really big," said Dave Seiders, chief economist of the association. "It's exploded over the last year."

The new-home sales report followed a report that showed softness in the market for previously owned homes, which account for about 85 percent of all home sales.

The pace of existing-home sales in September slowed 14 percent from a year earlier to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.2 million. That was the lowest rate reported since January 2004.

For new homes, the seasonally adjusted annual sales volume figure in September was 1.1 million — 14.2 percent lower than in September 2005.

Another closely watched economic barometer released this morning — the Census Bureau's report on durable goods orders — showed an unexpected 7.8 percent rise for September from August. Durable goods, which include things like dishwashers, are monitored by economists as a gauge of business investment.

The upswing, however, was almost entirely a result of a surge in orders for aircraft. Boeing took orders for 175 planes last month, nearly tripling the nonmilitary aircraft component of the durable goods figure.

Over all, the latest economic data pointed to continued but slower growth through the end of the summer. When orders for the transportation equipment sector were stripped out, the gain in durable goods orders was only 0.1 percent.

Home Prices Take Steepest Dive In 35 Years (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

New home prices in September took their steepest year-over-year drop since the early 1970s as builders tried to stimulate sales amid a relatively high inventory of unsold properties, according to a real estate report today.

The nationwide median price of new homes sold in September fell about 9.7% from the same month last year to $217,100, according to the Commerce Department. It was the biggest annual decline in 35 years, according to economist Steven Wood.

"Home price momentum has slowed significantly as homebuilders are using big discounts to motivate new home buyers," Wood said in a research note for Insight Economics.

Home builders have scrambled to reduce a large inventory of unsold properties by putting the brakes on new construction and dangling a growing list of incentives — from price discounts to deals on mortgage — to stimulate sales. But those efforts have so far had limited success.

The pace of new home sales also slumped in September, dropping 14.2% from the same month last year to a seasonally adjusted, annual rate of 1.075 million properties, according to preliminary government estimates.

There were signs of recent improvement, with September sales rising from the previous month. The inventory of unsold homes, a 6.4-month supply at current sales rates, also edged down from the two previous months.

DOJ_NMG_0087047

However, the supply of unsold homes in September remained about one-third larger than it was last year. Economists also noted that earlier estimates of sales results for June, July and August were adjusted lower. As a result, many assumed that September's results are weaker than reported today.

"Moreover, while downward revisions to these data have been considerable, these revisions do not reflect buyer cancellations of contracts," said economist Joshua Shapiro in a research report for the consulting firm MFR. "Therefore, even after downward revisions, these data probably still overstate the amount of new home sales that are actually being consummated."

On a regional basis, new home sales in the West fell 13.6% in September compared to same month last year. Sales dropped 6.6% in the Northeast, 36.6% in the Midwest and 7.9% in the South, the Commerce Department said.

New-Home Prices Fell In Sept. (WP)

By Dina Elboghdady

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Prices of new homes fell last month, turning some lookers into buyers, a government study released yesterday shows.

A report by the Commerce Department found that the median price of a new single-family house in September fell to $217,100. That's down 9.2 percent from August and 9.7 percent from September 2005 -- the largest year-over-year decline since 1970. With prices down, the pace of sales picked up 5.3 percent from August, though it was still 14.2 percent below September 2005.

Many analysts attribute the uptick in sales to aggressive price cuts by builders. "You're seeing builders throw cash on the hood to move their inventory," just as Detroit automakers did when car sales slowed, said Michael Larson, an analyst with Weiss Research Inc. in Florida. "They started by giving out freebies like granite countertops. Now the only way to move product is to cut prices."

The new-home sales figures jibed with data released this week by the National Association of Realtors, which found that the price of existing homes fell 2.2 percent last month, the largest monthly decline since the group began tracking the numbers nearly four decades ago.

The new-home numbers are thought to give a more forward-looking account of the health of the housing market because they are recorded when a contract is signed. Sales figures for existing homes capture closed sales, many of which are for deals that were agreed to months earlier.

Based on yesterday's data, some analysts predict the rush by builders to slash prices will push individual sellers to do the same next year if weakness persists in the housing market.

Typically, individuals capitulate on prices more slowly because they are emotionally attached to their homes, said Greg Gieber, who tracks the housing market for A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc. But if builders continue to cut prices, individuals who do not follow suit will find themselves at a huge disadvantage.

"A lot of housing economists predict that housing prices will continue to decline for another 10 to 12 months," Gieber said. "What the builders are trying to do is to get their stuff out and sold before the worst of the price declines."

But Gieber and other analysts cautioned against reading too much into yesterday's report because its findings are often dramatically revised. It is based on a small sample of homes, it does not control for house sizes, and it does not capture the record levels of contract cancellations, an increasing cause of anxiety for builders.

Cancellations used to hover around 20 percent, said Nishu Sood, an analyst at Deutsche Bank Securities Inc. They jumped to 33 percent in the second quarter and are nearing 40 percent in the third quarter.

If those cancellations were factored into yesterday's data, they most likely would have dragged down sales volume, Sood said.

The West led the rise in September sales with a 23.9 percent increase over August, followed by the South, which includes the Washington area, with a 6.9 percent increase. Sales fell by 34.5 percent in the Northeast and 6.3 percent in the Northwest.

DOJ_NMG_0087048

The seasonally adjusted number of homes for sale fell to 557,000, from a peak of 570,000 this summer. Including the cancellations would have probably added to the inventory of unsold new homes in September, Sood said. For builders, an excess of homes is a costly burden.

"The builder has a huge commitment of capital to unsold homes," Sood said. "Each day it does not sell adds to the cost, and that's where the imperative to discount comes from."

Lucky 13: Dow Closes At Record Again (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 27, 2006

NEW YORK — Bolstered by good earnings reports from Corporate America, Wall Street enjoyed another record-setting session Thursday, with the Dow closing at a record high for the 13th time in the past 18 trading sessions, and the S&P 500 and Nasdaq hitting fresh 2006 highs.

The big winner on the earnings front was Dow component ExxonMobil, which reported third-quarter profit of $10.49 billion, the second-largest quarterly profit ever for a U.S. company. Exxon rose 61 cents to $71.62 (story, 3B).

"We're chugging along at new highs," says Lincoln Anderson, chief investment officer at LPL Financial Services. "The rally is being driven by a strong economy and strong earnings." (Strong earnings buoy stocks, 1B.)

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 28.98 points, or 0.2%, to 12,163.66, putting the blue-chip barometer up 13.5% for the year. The S&P 500 rose 6.86 points, or 0.5%, to 1389.08, a fresh six-year high. The S&P is up 11.3% this year. The Nasdaq composite gained 22.51 points, or 1.0%, to 2379.10, a new high for the year. The tech-packed index is up 7.9% in 2006.

Strong corporate earnings helped overshadow another report showing serious slowing in the housing market. Prices of new homes fell at their sharpest rate since 1970 (story, 3B).

The market will get another snapshot of the economy's health today when the government releases estimates on the nation's gross domestic product.

The yield on the 10-year bond fell to 4.72%, from 4.77%. A barrel of light sweet crude declined $1.04 to $60.36.

Some Wall Street analysts are worried that the rally may be a sign of a stock market top.

"The market can still run further," wrote Bob Dickey, technical analyst at RBC Dain Rauscher, in a note to clients. "But we regard any more short-term upside progress as a blow-off and gift of further gains, but also a sign that the risk of a pullback is also increasing."

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by about 2-to-1 on the New York Stock Exchange

Like A Broken Record, Blue Chips Rise 28.98 To Break Another Record (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average edged up to yet another record amid continuing optimism about strong corporate profits and a benign Federal Reserve.

With companies including Comcast, Aetna and Exxon Mobil reporting upbeat profit news, and with investors basking in continued speculation that the Fed might actually start cutting interest rates next year, the blue-chip average rose 28.98 points, or 0.24%, to 12163.66. It is up 13.5% this year, and has set a record on 13 of the past 18 trading days.

Investors also were encouraged by a drop of $1.04 in crude-oil futures to $60.36 a barrel, despite the relatively strong consumption levels reported Wednesday for the previous week. Treasury-bond yields also remained low. Those yields affect other market interest rates, and low rates are good news for businesses and consumers alike.

DOJ_NMG_0087049

At the two-day Fed interest-rate policy meeting that ended Wednesday, Fed officials left their target rates alone and hinted in a statement that their inflation concerns are diminishing. That reinforced hopes for a "soft landing" -- a slowdown to moderate economic growth, without recession or inflation. A soft landing would support moderate interest rates into the future.

Stocks are proving much more resilient than many money managers had expected. Skeptics fear falling behind unless they own stocks, which forces them to jump in. That pushes the market higher, making more doubters throw in the towel and buy stocks. Trading volume was strong, as it was on Wednesday.

"One of the things we needed to see was earnings, and for the most part they have been pretty solid and the guidance is decent," said stock trader Larry Peruzzi at Boston Company Asset Management.

When the Dow industrials neared 12000, he noted, investors pulled back and waited to see whether profits would be strong enough to justify more stock gains. So far, profit gains and forecasts have been running well ahead of expectations.

After regular hours, Microsoft reported better-than-expected profits, but offered disappointing guidance for the current quarter. Reflecting investor exuberance, the stock rose 0.4% in after-hours trading.

Economic news was in line with recent trends, supporting the soft-landing thesis. Orders for durable goods -- items such as appliances and machinery -- were stronger than expected in September, but only because of aircraft orders. Without aircraft, orders were softer than expected, which suggested that inflation pressures aren't emerging. Weekly jobless claims were in line with recent levels. September new-home sales were slightly above expectations.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.50%, or 6.86 points, to 1389.08, up 11.3% in 2006. The Nasdaq Composite Index, driven by its many technology stocks, advanced 0.96%, or 22.51 points, to 2379.10, ahead 7.9% for the year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.65%, or 1.48 points, to 228.95.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.77 billion shares, as 2,292 stocks rose and 1,035 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 11/32, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.723%. The 30-year bond was up 22/32 to yield 4.842%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.39 yen, down from 119.02, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2690 from $1.2610.

Bush Helps Raise Cash For GOP Candidates (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 27, 2006

With precious air time still left to buy before Election Day, President Bush raised money Thursday for two Republican candidates trying to knock off Democratic incumbents in an uphill year for the GOP.

The president was in the final days of a nearly 2-year-long effort of unmatched fundraising for dozens of Republican candidates. Bush has raised more than $193 million in nearly 90 events, according to the Republican National Committee; that figure dwarfs what any other individual has raised for Republicans or Democrats.

Bush swung through Des Moines, Iowa, at lunchtime to raise $400,000 for the state Republican Party and congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti, whom the president mistakenly called "Dave" throughout his speech. Then Bush headed to the Detroit suburbs for an early evening fundraiser that brought in $700,000 for Senate hopeful Mike Bouchard.

"The other side is dancing in the end zone, except they're on the 15 yard line," Bush said to cheers at the fundraiser decorated with signs for the American League champion Detroit Tigers, with many in Michigan currently paying closer attention to sports than politics.

Bush hammered the same themes he has been using against the Democrats all fall — that they want to raise taxes and are soft on fighting terrorism. Democrats contend the rhetoric is just an attempt to distract from Bush's failed track record in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0087050

An AP-AOL News poll, taken this week, shows voters are frustrated with the war in Iraq and will cast their votes on Nov. 7 accordingly. Forty percent of likely voters say they are angry with Bush. More than half say they plan to vote Democratic. The president's job approval rating stands at 38 percent.

Bush made an appeal to conservatives by stressing themes of immigration and gay marriage. Before he left the White House, the president signed a law calling for 700 miles of additional fencing along the Mexico border. He also denounced a New Jersey Supreme Court ruling that gay couples are entitled to all the benefits of married couples.

"Yesterday in New Jersey we had another activist court that issued a ruling that raises doubts about the institution of marriage," Bush said. "I believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman. And I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended."

Republicans expect to lose seats to Democrats this year, a time of trouble in Iraq and scandals affecting several GOP lawmakers. The GOP hopes to control the losses by taking some Democratic seats, such as those in Michigan and Iowa.

Lamberti, whose family founded the Casey's General Stores empire of nearly 1,400 Midwest convenience stores, is running against Democratic Rep. Leonard Boswell, an Army veteran who has been in Congress for 10 years. Bouchard, who has been the Oakland County sheriff since 1999, trails first-term Sen. Debbie Stabenow in the polls and is even further behind in the money race.

Stabenow has raised more than $12 million since becoming a senator in 2001; Bouchard reported raising about $4.6 million as of Sept. 30.

With Michigan's sluggish economy the main issue in the race, Bush and Bouchard stopped by the Morley Candy Makers factory on their way to the main event because, Bush said, "One, I like small businesses. Two, I like sweets."

Stabenow's campaign suggested Bush's visit would do nothing to help Bouchard, comparing it to "throwing an anvil to a drowning man."

In Iowa, GOP gubernatorial candidate Jim Nussle avoided appearing with the president and sent his running mate to represent him. Nussle said a scheduling conflict prevented him from joining Bush. But that did not stop Nussle's opponent, Democrat Chet Culver, from accusing Nussle of "running and hiding" from Bush because of the president's low approval numbers.

So far, Bush's political events have been exclusively before donors willing to pay to see him — usually $1,000 a person. Bush's first free appearance will be Saturday in Sellersburg, Ind.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said those rallies will continue through Nov. 7, although his schedule will have some flexibility so he can help raise money for any candidates who need a final financial boost.

Bush Rallies Iowa GOP On Fighting Terrorism (DMR)

DesMoines Register, October 27, 2006

President Bush urged Iowa Republicans today to work hard to keep their party in power, arguing that Democrats' view of the war on terror will endanger the country.

Bush was on the ground in Iowa just under three hours. Air Force One took off about 2:25 p.m., after Bush greeted members of the Iowa Air National Guard's 132nd Fighter Wing and their families.

About 500 people attended the $100-per-ticket campaign event at the Iowa State Fairgrounds for Republican congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti. About $400,000 was raised for Lamberti and the party, the Lamberti campaign said.

Lamberti, a candidate for Congress in the 3rd District, is running against Rep. Leonard Boswell, a Democrat seeking a sixth term.

Bush's remarks were mostly focused on Iraq and the war on terror. He worked to make the case that if the United States does not pursue terrorists elsewhere in the world, Americans will have to fight them at home.

DOJ_NMG_0087051

Bush warned that Democrats opposed tools needed to protect the country from terrorists. "There is a difference of opinion and voters in Iowa and across the country must understand that the Democrats have a different view about this war on terror — a view that I think makes America less secure and makes it harder for us to do our job to protect the American people," Bush said.

He also warned that talk of leaving Iraq would leave the United States vulnerable. "If we leave Iraq before the job is done, the enemy will follow us here," Bush said.

U.S. Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Ia., warmed up the crowd before Bush arrived. During his remarks, Bush told a story about coming to Iowa as govenor of Texas — a key oil-producing state — to talk about his support for ethanol. "I'm not sure you believed me," he teased Grassley.

While touting his support for Lamberti, Bush slipped a bit, twice calling the Republican state Senate president "Dave" instead of Jeff.

On Air Force One on the way to Des Moines, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino defended the decision to have the president appear on behalf of two challengers -- Lamberti and Republican Senate candidate Mike Bouchard in Michigan -- perceived to be lagging behind Democratic incumbents.

"I don't know what polls you're looking at," Perino told reporters. "I would want to go back and check with our folks. We believe these candidates are going to win these seats."

She added: "And when the President is invited to come and campaign -- you heard him yesterday say that he likes to get out there and talk about the differences between the Republicans and Democrats when it comes to the big national issues in this campaign: national security, who is going to best protect this country; and the economy, who's going to keep your taxes

low. "

Bush will continue to help congressional candidates raise money, she said. "We're going to switch fairly soon to rallies," she said. "But we have flexibility in his schedule in case people need additional some dollars to get across the finish line."

The Boswell campaign spent a great deal of effort trying to paint Lamberti as a yes-man for the president. They sent reporters rubber stamps that read: “Yes, Mr. President” and said Lamberti would go along with proposals to privatize social security.

“If Jeff Lamberti is elected to Congress, he will rubber stamp President Bush’s dangerous scheme to privatize your social security, slash your benefits and drive the country into bankruptcy by adding trillions of dollars to the national debt,” Boswell’s spokesman Mark Daley said in a prepared statement.

White House officials have not ruled out a return by Bush through the election and the president's schedule is open after Tuesday.

Said Perino: "We'll be raising money up until the end if we need to."

She also promised some goodies at the fairgrounds. "You never know what kind of treats you're going to find there," she said. "I hear there is lots of fun, fried food. Yes, fried Twinkies and fried Snickers, I think."

Members of the traveling press corps were served the promised deep-fried Twinkies while en route to the fairgounds.

Bush landed at the Des Moines airport at 11:30 a.m., where he was greeted by U.S. Reps. Tom Latham and Steve King of Iowa. He also met with a Des Moines volunteer before heading to the fairgrounds.

Bush met with Sally Bates, a two-time breast cancer survivor and volunteer for the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation. He presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to her for more than 14 years of service with the Des Moines Race for the Cure and the Des Moines affiliate of the Komen foundation.

Bush's Warren Visit Aims To Give Bouchard A Bounce (DETNS)

By Gary Heinlein And Jim Lynch

Detroit News, October 27, 2006

WARREN -- President Bush made a rousing speech Thursday to a gathering of Republican donors in support of U.S. Senate candidate Mike Bouchard.

It was Bush's second visit in a little more than a month in support of Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, hoping to come from behind in polls against Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Lansing. Stabenow leads Bouchard 50 percent to 38 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0087052

Combined, the president's appearances have raised $1.5 million.

In a speech that touched on terrorism and taxes, Bush told 600 donors who paid $1,000 a plate that Bouchard would help give Michigan's economy the boost it desperately needs.

"To go from worst to first, you need Mike Bouchard in the U.S. Senate," Bush said.

Bush also predicted Republicans would maintain their majority status in Congress.

"Our opponents are dancing in the end zone, except they are on the 15 yard line," Bush said.

While many congressional candidates are distancing themselves from Bush, Bouchard is gambling that Bush can help him by giving him more exposure as well as help fund his campaign war chest.

And while Bouchard was happy to be at the president's side, Democrats put their own spin on the visit. They questioned why he had the time to campaign for Bouchard but not to meet with U.S. auto company officials. Bush has said he will meet with them after the election.

"Three times we had a meeting set up, and three times he canceled," said U.S. Rep. John D. Dingell, D-Dearborn.

President Bush Stops At Candy Factory En Route To Warren Fundraiser (DNw)

By Gary Heinlein

The Detroit News, October 27, 2006

President Bush took a slight detour on his way to a Warren Republican fundraiser to satisfy a sweet tooth.

After landing at 4:35 p.m. at Selfridge Air National Guard Base, his motorcade swerved off Interstate 94 and made an unexpected stop at Morley Candy Makers on Hall Road in Clinton Township.

The staff presented him with a container of Michigan's famous Saunders hot fudge, and U-M and MSU candy bars.

He and Senate candidate Mike Bouchard, the reason for Bush's second visit to the state since September, toured the factory, shaking hands with sales staff and watching candy moving down the conveyor.

"They asked me why I came here," Bush told the media. "No. 1, I like small businesses. No. 2, I like sweets," he said while holding up a can of the hot fudge. "The spirit of entrepreneurship is strong in this store."

Sweet tooth satisfied, the president made a pitch for keeping taxes low for small businesses.

Karl Rove, accompanying Bush, stopped at the candy counter and bought confections for his staff in the presidential limousine.

Bush is scheduled to give a speech at the Walter R. Mabry Banquet and Convention Center in Warren to a $1,000 a person fundraiser for Bouchard, who is challenging Sen. Debbie Stabenow.

In Michigan, A Sale The GOP Can't Close (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

HOUGHTON, Mich. -- While Republicans scratch their heads over why a seemingly good economy is not helping them nationally in this year's elections, Michigan is where the party once hoped a bad economy would help it seize a governorship.

The heavy hits sustained by the auto industry's Big Three have left the state with a 7.1 percent unemployment rate, just below the 7.2 percent rate for Mississippi, which endured Hurricane Katrina. The job hemorrhage seemed the ideal issue for billionaire businessman Dick DeVos, the Republican nominee, against Gov. Jennifer Granholm. She is a nationally respected Democrat who many think would have made a fine presidential candidate if only she had not been born in Canada.

DeVos, a conservative whose wealth comes from his family company, Amway, is auditioning for her job by insisting, Kennedy-style, that Michigan can do better. "We have gone backward while the country has gone forward," he said during a debate on Monday. "It's just unacceptable."

Tying himself to this season's most popular institution in the state, he said earlier this month: "If we need inspiration, look at the Detroit Tigers. They've succeeded against all odds because they changed leadership and changed their attitude."

Spending heavily from his own fortune, DeVos was on the verge of making the sale. A Detroit News Poll in mid-June found him leading Granholm 48 percent to 40 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0087053

But Granholm has come back. The News poll in mid-October had her ahead, 51 to 42 percent. More recent polls give her a comparable lead. Her recovery helps explain why the economy is not helping the Republicans elsewhere.

The problem for the GOP is that while voters in better-off states seem to be voting on Iraq and other issues, those thinking most about the economy live in lagging industrial states such as Michigan and Ohio, and they are blaming President Bush and national policies for their troubles. In the Ohio Senate race, for example, Rep. Sherrod Brown, a Democrat, has built a lead over incumbent Republican Mike DeWine using hard-hitting advertisements on trade and the loss of manufacturing jobs.

For her part, Granholm is doing everything she can to turn the argument on Bush and Washington. "My opponent began advertising way back in February trying to put the blame for Michigan's economic contraction on me," she said in a telephone interview, "when most people who work in the plants know that the shift of jobs to India or China is much more the result of federal policy and these trade agreements."

While Granholm has been helped by ads sharply attacking DeVos, the exchange between the two is at its heart a substantive choice between the challenger's tax-cutting approach and the incumbent's argument that recovery can come only from changes in federal policy.

"They feel this president has not stood up for them," Granholm says, arguing that voters are skeptical of "old-time solutions of just tax-cutting your way to prosperity." She calls for changes in federal trade, training, education and health-care policies. In the meantime, she has offered loans and tax breaks to the auto industry to preserve jobs. She says she is embarking on "as robust an industrial policy as we can to keep those jobs here," but adds: "My tools can do only so much."

In Michigan's Senate race, anti-administration feeling has also helped incumbent Democrat Debbie Stabenow, once considered vulnerable, to a double-digit lead in most polls over Republican Mike Bouchard. In an unusual display of solidarity between senatorial and gubernatorial candidates, Stabenow and Granholm regularly reinforce each other's arguments.

"We have a national policy that says if you work for less, lose your health care and lose your pension, then we can compete," Stabenow says of the status quo. "The No. 1 way we could help employers in this country is to change the way we fund health care."

Granholm says she understands that economic change has been a rule in this state. The population here in Houghton County on Michigan's Upper Peninsula reached 88,000 in 1910 because of the copper industry boom. It declined, with the industry itself, to 35,000 people a half-century later, where it has held steady, buoyed by the presence of Michigan Tech.

The problem with the current manufacturing decline, says Granholm, is that it has been "so quick, so frightening . . . so cataclysmic and there has been so little transition time and people are left reeling." And the people who are reeling seem to be targeting Bush.

The president came into the state yesterday on behalf of Stabenow's opponent, and that's just fine with her. "I would welcome him back three or four times before the election," she says.

Poll Shows Democrats Leading Competitive House Races (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a sign that a major wave could be building against Republicans in the House of Representatives, Democrats have opened a double-digit lead in competitive House campaigns around the country in a new poll and are within 2 percentage points in districts once considered safely Republican.

Democrats lead Republicans by 50 percent to 39 percent in 40 closely contested districts that are most likely to determine control of the House on Election Day, Nov. 7, according to the poll, which was released Thursday by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center.

Potentially more troubling for Republicans: They lead by only 44 percent to 42 percent in all other Republican-held districts, which went heavily for President Bush in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0087054

In House districts that gave Bush between 50 percent and 60 percent of the vote, for example, Democrats lead by 45-40 percent. The only place where Republicans hold an overall lead is in House districts that gave Bush more than 60 percent of their votes.

"With opinions of Congress growing increasingly negative, even safe Republican districts have been affected," said the Pew report.

The poll didn't look at each race individually, which arguably is a more accurate way to examine the races. But the overall trend in both the 40 competitive districts and the rest of the country underscored that Democrats enjoy an edge that could give them more than enough seats to seize control of the House.

Most of the 40 contested districts - 34 - are now held by Republicans. A net loss of 15 or more would cost them control of the House for the first time since they rode in on a tidal wave of anger at Democrats in 1994.

Separately Thursday, University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato forecast that Democrats will gain between 21 and 26 House seats. "2006 is a Democratic year. The analysts and observers are just debating how big a Democratic year it will be," Sabato wrote.

Also, Indiana University political scientists Carl Klarner and Stan Buchanan forecast that Democrats would gain 21 seats - one fewer than they predicted last April but still enough for control.

Among the reasons for the Democratic edge in the Pew survey of competitive House campaigns: Voters in those districts ranked Iraq as their top concern and gave Bush considerably lower marks than voters in Republican-held districts that are still considered safe for Republicans.

Bush's approval rating, for example, was 36 percent in the competitive districts; it was 48 percent in other Republican districts.

Iraq was ranked a top issue by 50 percent of voters in competitive districts; it was a top issue by 43 percent in other Republican districts.

Nationally, opinions on Iraq have soured in the last month, the poll found. Also, while Republicans continue to have an edge on handling terrorism, it slipped from 16 points in April to 6 points now.

DEMOGRAPHICS

Democrats have gained nationally among almost every demographic group compared to their support vs. Republican support in the 2002 midterm congressional elections. For example, among people age 65 and older, Democrats were 3 percentage points behind Republicans in 2002, but now are 16 points ahead of them. Similarly:

Ages 50-64, from -2 percentage points to +10

Ages 30-49, from -10 percentage points to +4

Men ages 18-29, from -11 percentage points to +18

Midwesterners, from -2 percentage points to +14

Southerners, from -7 percentage points to +3

Westerners, from -11 percentage points to +9

Rural, from -10 percentage points to +2

Working moms, from even to +18

Men, from -12 percentage points to +4

Whites, from -15 percentage points to +1

Those with incomes $50,000-$100,000, from -15 percentage points to +6

The survey of 1,552 registered voters was conducted Oct. 17-22 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The sample of 528 registered voters in the 40 competitive districts had a margin of error of plus or minus 5 percentage points.

Once-safe Bets In GOP Country Pick Up A Bit Of Risk (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy
USA Today, October 27, 2006
DENVER — When members of the conservative Club for Growth opened their checkbooks to back candidates in Republican primaries for open House seats in Colorado and Idaho, it seemed a pretty good bet that their choices would cruise into Congress if they won the preliminary rounds.
The seat in western Idaho that came open when Republican Rep. Butch Otter decided to run for governor hasn't been won by a Democrat since 1992, and President Bush carried the district with 69% of the vote two years ago.
The Colorado district, based in the conservative bastion of Colorado Springs and represented by retiring GOP Rep. Joel Hefley, has never sent a Democrat to the House since its creation in 1972. Bush won there with 66% in 2004.
"If we can help someone win the primary who is truly committed to limited government, economic freedom and pro-growth policies, they almost always go on to win the general election," says Club for Growth President Pat Toomey.
Less than two weeks before the Nov. 7 election, the Club for Growth's choices in Colorado and Idaho are looking less like surefire investments. The group's 36,000 members and political action committee have spent about $700,000 on the Idaho race and about $310,000 in the Colorado district.
In Colorado, Republican candidate Doug Lamborn, a 12-year veteran of the state Senate, has been hurt by lingering divisions from a bitter six-way primary in August. Hefley, who has represented the district 20 years, called Lamborn's campaign "sleazy and dishonest" and has refused to endorse him.
That's been a boost for Democrat Jay Fawcett, a decorated Air Force veteran of the 1991 Gulf War with strong ties to Colorado Springs, home to the Air Force Academy and a sizable military population. An Oct. 10 Denver Post poll showed Lamborn and Fawcett tied at 37% each, though an Oct. 19 poll by KUSA-TV had Lamborn up by 13 points.

DOJ_NMG_0087056

Bob Loevy, a political science professor at Colorado College, isn't betting on Fawcett yet but says a Democratic victory is "within reach." Loevy says the divisive primary, Hefley's criticism of Lamborn, and Fawcett's military background could combine to put "a very Republican seat in play."

Lamborn — running on his support for Bush's tax cuts and strategy in Iraq, as well as being tough on immigration — says Hefley's stance "has not been helpful."

He says he'll prevail because "I'm a Ronald Reagan conservative, and that is the majority sentiment within this district."

Fawcett says he's finding traction with a message that plays on voters' "frustration about where the president is going on Iraq." He proposes redeploying U.S. troops to Iraqi border areas and engaging nations in the region to find a solution for sectarian violence there.

In Idaho, it's been five months since Republican Bill Sali won a divisive six-candidate primary, but time has not healed rifts within the party, some of them dating to Sali's 16-year tenure in the Legislature. The Idaho Statesman endorsed Democrat Larry Grant, saying Sali spent his legislative career "fixated on hot-button issues such as abortion, alienating fellow Republicans."

After Sali discussed a supposed link between abortions and breast cancer early this year, Idaho House Speaker Bruce Newcomb, a Republican, called him "an absolute idiot" who "doesn't have an ounce of empathy." Former GOP speaker Mike Simpson, now in the U.S. House, once threatened to throw Sali from a second-floor window.

Grant, a former executive at chipmaker Micron Technology, Idaho's largest employer, stresses imposing fiscal restraint in Washington and getting "corruption under control." His most recent television ad features fellow Republicans criticizing Sali.

Grant says Republicans "nominated a candidate who is not well-liked even in his own party. … He doesn't play well with others."

Northwest Nazarene University political scientist Steve Shaw says Sali "is seen as a very abrasive figure" who strikes even some Republicans as "an embarrassment." But Grant has an "uphill battle," Shaw adds, "because of how Republican the district is."

Sali, who supports Bush on Iraq, favors making English the official U.S. language and backs a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman, says his controversial reputation has been overblown. "I go to a Rotary Club or a Chamber of Commerce, and people always say to me, 'You're not at all what I expected,' " he says.

Sensing an opportunity, the Democratic Party's House campaign committee this month added the Idaho contest to its list of "emerging races," though it has yet to make a financial commitment.

Toomey says Club for Growth members and the group's political action committee will spend more than $18 million backing candidates this election cycle. About two-thirds of the club's endorsed candidates have prevailed so far, either in primaries or special elections. The group lost one high-profile effort this year when its favored Senate candidate in the Rhode Island primary, Steve Laffey, lost to incumbent Lincoln Chafee.

Toomey says he's confident both Sali and Lamborn will win. "But the truth is," Toomey says, "this is a very, very difficult environment for national Republicans."

Incumbents On The Ropes Over Ties To Abramoff (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

TRACY, Calif. — In the past decade, Representatives Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle, Republicans of California, have shared rising political careers, a love for conservative politics and years of cruising to re-election.

Now they share a pressing problem: questions about their relationships with Jack Abramoff, the former Washington lobbyist at the center of an extensive corruption investigation. While the Abramoff scandal no longer dominates national headlines, it has been a keystone of the Democratic strategy against Mr. Pombo and Mr. Doolittle, who are locked in tightening re-election campaigns despite the benefit of representing solidly Republican districts.

Both congressmen, whose districts are separated by 20 miles of Central Valley farmland, have denied any wrongdoing, and the Justice Department has not publicly named either of them in its Abramoff investigation. Still, their association with the lobbyist, his associates and clients — who gave tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions to their past campaigns — remains difficult to shake as Election Day nears.

Only a few months ago, the Doolittle and Pombo seats were considered safely Republican, but the electoral landscape for Republicans has changed so significantly that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee now includes them on a list of "emerging races" for Democrats. This week, the committee began broadcasting an anti-Pombo advertisement.

The National Republican Congressional Committee says the Democratic candidates on that party's emerging-races list are underfinanced "bottom tier candidates." But the Republican committee is taking a different tack on the ground in California, pumping money and big-name support into both races.

President Bush made a campaign swing through the two California districts this month, raising more than $400,000 for Mr. Pombo in the 11th District and about $600,000 for Mr. Doolittle in the Fourth District. The Republican committee spent more than $153,000 this month on phone banks and mailings in the Doolittle race, and previously spent about $650,000 on phone banks, mailings and surveys for Mr. Pombo.

While both Republicans hold significant financial advantages heading into the final stretch of the campaign, with about three times as much cash on hand as their opponents, Mr. Pombo says he is anxious, in part because of heavy spending from outside groups.

"I'm nervous every time," he said in an interview.

Mr. Doolittle declined to be interviewed, but a spokesman predicted the congressman would be re-elected.

"This district doesn't elect liberal Democrats," said the spokesman, Richard Robinson. "It doesn't elect them dogcatcher, and it certainly doesn't elect them to Congress."

Mr. Pombo, especially, has been hammered about more than his Abramoff connections. Environmental groups like the Sierra Club have heavily criticized his tenure as chairman of the House Committee on Resources and have committed a lot of money and volunteers to try to unseat him.

Mr. Doolittle, meanwhile, has been answering questions about an arrangement whereby his wife, Julie, working as his chief fund-raising consultant, takes a 15 percent commission on fund-raisers she organizes. That included the president's recent visit, which netted about $90,000 for Mrs. Doolittle. Mr. Doolittle has defended his wife, saying her commission is in line with what other consultants charge.

Still, the Abramoff name has dominated large parts of the campaigns, with Democratic candidates invoking the lobbyist in advertising, and the news media, including The Sacramento Bee, digging into the lobbyist's California dealings. The Washington Post, quoting unnamed sources, reported on Oct. 14 that Mr. Doolittle was being investigated by the Justice Department, an accusation Mr. Doolittle denies.

In a recent editorial endorsing Mr. Pombo's Democratic opponent, The Bee said that Mr. Pombo had taken money from Mr. Abramoff, an "admitted political fixer," and that the congressman "personifies all that ails Washington."

The Democrats have also been beating the Abramoff drum. Last week Mr. Doolittle's opponent, Charlie Brown, a retired Air Force colonel, broadcast a television advertisement accusing Mr. Doolittle of taking "thousands from convicted Congressional bribers," a phrase intoned while a picture of Mr. Abramoff flashed on the screen.

In the Pombo race, Jerry McNerney, a mild-mannered mathematician and wind-energy expert who Mr. Pombo soundly beat in 2004, has called on the congressman to reveal all e-mail correspondence with Mr. Abramoff.

Democrats say the strategy is working. Mr. Brown and Mr. McNerney have helped create a buzz by publicizing internal polls, which are traditionally unreliable and subject to manipulation by campaigns, showing them at least tied with Mr. Doolittle and Mr. Pombo, both of whom were re-elected in 2004 with more than 60 percent of the vote.

There are signs that both incumbents are campaigning more vigorously than in years past.

Mr. Doolittle recently agreed to his first debate in a decade, where he was peppered with questions about Mr. Abramoff, who personally gave $14,000 to his past campaigns and paid Mr. Doolittle's wife to work as an event consultant.

Mr. Doolittle, an eight-term Republican and a member of the House leadership, appeared frustrated at times. Mr. Abramoff "didn't turn out to be the person I thought I knew," he said. "But I didn't do anything untoward with him."

DOJ_NMG_0087058

Mr. Doolittle has not apologized for refusing to return the donation from Mr. Abramoff. "The congressman doesn't return money that has been ethically given and ethically taken," Mr. Robinson said. "And certainly that was the case with Mr. Abramoff."

Mr. Pombo said he gave to charity the $7,500 that Mr. Abramoff personally donated to his past campaigns. But he still faced questions about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff during a debate on Oct. 5. "I met the guy two or three times in my whole life," Mr. Pombo said. "He never once lobbied me on anything. He never asked me to sign a letter to vote for or against a bill, to introduce a bill, never once stepped foot in my office."

Mr. Pombo may be the more vulnerable of the two Republicans owing to demographic changes in his district, which meanders over four counties. Redistricting in 2001 incorporated parts of several rapidly growing, far-flung San Francisco suburbs, and Democratic voter registration has increased as a result. Mr. Pombo rejects that notion, saying that when he was originally elected in 1994 his district was Democratic.

The Sierra Club and the League of Conservation Voters, which have run advertisements opposing Mr. Pombo, are counting on the district's new suburbanites to be turned off by Mr. Pombo's environmental record, which has included advocating for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and a strong support of private property rights.

The Sierra Club, which has spent about $250,000, and the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund, which has spent more than $500,000, are planning to knock on 30,000 doors in the next two weekends. All told, environmental groups are expected to spend more than $1.5 million to defeat Mr. Pombo, said Eric Antebi, a Sierra Club spokesman.

No such demographic change has occurred in Mr. Doolittle's district, which sprawls from the suburbs of Sacramento north and east to the Oregon and Nevada borders. Democrats make up less than a third of registered voters there, but his opponent, Mr. Brown, has been using bloggers to rally support.

A career Air Force man who flew rescue helicopters in Vietnam, Mr. Brown said he entered the race out of patriotic duty.

"It's a normal military thing: I saw a need and decided to fill it," said Mr. Brown, whose son Jeff is an Air Force captain about to start his fourth rotation in Iraq. "The idea of service, you don't back away from things that need to be done."

Mr. McNerney also comes from a military background, although an aborted one. The son of an Army officer, he attended military high school in Kansas and the United States Military Academy at West Point, but he dropped out during Vietnam.

Mr. Pombo and Mr. Doolittle say their opponents' campaigns are being driven by liberal Bay Area politicians like Representative Nancy Pelosi and Senator Barbara Boxer, both Democrats.

"By day he's attempting to be a conservative to district voters, and by night kowtowing to liberals in the Bay Area who are funding his campaign," Mr. Robinson said of Mr. Brown. Mr. Doolittle has also repeatedly criticized Mr. Brown for refusing to give up his membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, a group that he has said is "doing negative things to this country."

Mr. Pombo, meanwhile, said he was not surprised by the Democrats' effort to lump the two races together.

"There's a lot of similarities," Mr. Pombo said. "A lot of the stuff they send out, they just scratch off his name and put mine in."

GOP Slips At Foley Scandal's Epicenter (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

HOBE SOUND, FLA.

Florida's 16th Congressional District is a classic political gerrymander drawn to favor Republican candidates over Democrats. Shaped like a squashed plumber's wrench, it meanders across eight counties to link Republican strongholds on Florida's east and west coasts.

But even the fanciest handiwork of Republican line-drawers in Tallahassee may be of little comfort to Joe Negron this election season. He is the former state representative from Stuart tapped by the Republican Party to run for the seat left vacant by disgraced US Rep. Mark Foley amid the Congressional page scandal.

Mr. Foley's former seat is one of the four most vulnerable Republican congressional seats in the Nov. 7 election, says the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. It is considered a key contest in a national push by Democrats to gain 15 or more seats to take control of the House of Representatives and elevate Nancy Pelosi to House speaker.

Although Florida's 16th Congressional District is designed to produce Republican winners, analysts say this year may be different.

"It is going to be a very tough go for Negron to win," says Del Ali of the independent polling firm Research 2000.

Two weeks ago, a poll by Mr. Ali showed Mr. Negron trailing Democratic candidate Tim Mahoney by 7 percentage points. The pollster says Democrats are more fired up than Republicans, and that independent voters in the district - a critical voting bloc - favor Mr. Mahoney by 30 points.

"If Negron becomes competitive with independents, that is how he would pull it out," Ali says. "He has got to take it to within five or six points." Democrat hits hurricane insurance

Mahoney, who runs a financial- services company, is critical of the local economy and skyrocketing hurricane insurance rates in campaign appearances and ads. He is also pushing the need for change in Washington.

Negron is hoping to capitalize on campaign stops by Gov. Jeb Bush, who is said to enjoy a 60-plus percent approval rating among district voters.

Both candidates can stake legitimate claims to the political center. Mahoney is a former Republican, while Negron is a former Democrat.

But Negron faces a particularly difficult obstacle - he must find a way to win an election without his name appearing on the ballot.

Because Mr. Foley resigned so late, Republicans were barred from changing the ballot. Election law in Florida establishes a strict deadline for ballot changes. If a candidate withdraws after the deadline, the original candidate's name remains on the ballot, though a replacement candidate receives any votes cast for the original candidate.

A similar situation arose in 2004 when the Democratic challenger in a race in nearby Palm Beach and Broward counties suddenly pulled out for health reasons. Although the new candidate's name did not appear on the ballot, signs were posted in each precinct to help clarify the situation.

Following Foley's departure from the current campaign, elections officials were discussing the possibility of posting similar precinct signs. The proposed signs were designed to explain that a vote for Foley would be counted as a vote for Negron. The signs also explained that a vote for the Democratic candidate, Mahoney, would be counted as a vote for Mahoney. The balanced wording on the posted signs was intended to avoid granting an unfair advantage to any one candidate, while at the same time preventing voter confusion.

The state Democratic Party sued to block not only precinct signs but any verbal communication between poll workers and voters concerning Foley's name on the ballot or Negron's candidacy. Last week, a state judge granted the Democratic Party's request for an injunction. Circuit Judge Janet Ferris barred election officials in the 16th District from posting special signs or verbally explaining why Negron's name was not on the ballot and why Foley's name was still on. Poll workers can't help voters

The ruling marks the first time a judge has ever interpreted Florida election law so broadly to bar any mention of a candidate in response to a voter's question. State officials are appealing Judge Ferris's ruling. Some poll workers are referring to Judge Ferris's ruling as a preelection "gag order."

Early voting began this week. Negron campaign workers are positioned outside the polls to stress to voters that a vote for Foley is really a vote for Negron.

David Levine, a Republican committee member in Martin County, has been manning the parking lot outside the polls at the Hobe Sound Library. "There is a very high rate of awareness" of the ballot issue, he says. "There was only one person I had to explain the whole situation to. Everyone else knows it."

Political analysts say that early voters tend to be more politically aware. The real test will be on Election Day when independent undecided voters arrive at the polls, analysts say.

When Hobe Sound poll worker William Harrington was asked about the Foley-Negron-ballot issue, he said, "I can't answer any question about that. We're under tight restrictions."

He added: "We received on Monday morning a sheet saying we could give no assistance as to candidates and we were warned that there might be people like you testing what we do."

DOJ_NMG_0087060

One voter, Anita Hunt, said she overheard a man complaining loudly to officials manning the Hobe Sound precinct. "He was saying all kinds of four-letter words and 'I don't understand this,' " Ms. Hunt said. She said she heard the poll worker suggest that the man should ask his wife for help with his question. She said she heard the poll worker tell the man, "I can't advise you."

Despite the incident, voters emerging from the polls at Hobe Sound said they had no problem voting for the candidate of their choice - including many who said they voted for Negron.

"It is not confusing at all," said Jean Aldridge, after casting her ballot for Negron. "Anyone listening to the news or reading the paper should know."

Kevin Conway said he wasn't confused by the ballot. "I wouldn't vote for either Foley or Negron," he says. But he added that he saw no reason why new ballots couldn't be printed "for the dumb Republicans who want to vote for Negron."

Some voters interviewed after casting their ballots said they were disappointed with Foley, but that they wouldn't hold the scandal against the Republican Party or Negron. Others aren't so willing to forgive.

Marilyn Budensiek, a Negron campaign volunteer, says she's seen angry voters. "I do think Mark Foley has hurt the Republican cause," she says. "That may be more of a burden than Joe Negron not being on the ballot."

Robert Page, a self-described independent voter, said the scandal "swayed me all the way" to vote Democratic. "It is like a decaying process from the top down," he said of Republican elected officials. How the corruption cloud may affect contests for House seats

Three House seats were left open by lawmakers now under investigation. Democrats are taking advantage.

• Ohio, 18th District: Democrat Zack Space is ahead in the polls to fill the seat being vacated by Rep. Bob Ney (R), who pleaded guilty this month to taking favors in return for official actions on behalf of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients. Mr. Ney's hand-picked candidate is state Sen. Joy Padgett.

• Texas, 22nd District: The seat held by former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R) is expected to shift to Democratic control. Mr. DeLay resigned from Congress in June amid money-laundering charges in Texas, and Republicans, barred by law from substituting a name on the ballot, must pin their hopes on a write-in campaign. The Democrats' Nick Lampson, a former congressman, is running strong.

• Arizona, Eighth District: Rep. Jim Kolbe (R), who recently came under scrutiny for taking a 1996 camping trip with congressional pages, is retiring. Democrat Gabrielle Giffords leads Republican Randy Graf.

Some House incumbents under investigation are running for reelection. They deny wrongdoing.

• California, Fourth District: Rep. John Doolittle (R) accepted campaign money from Mr. Abramoff and used the lobbyist's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it. Mr. Doolittle faces little-known Democrat Charlie Brown in a strongly Republican district and appears poised for victory.

• California, 41st District: Rep. Jerry Lewis (R) accepted $60,000 from San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who hired a lobbying firm to push the powerful Appropriations Committee chairman for federally funded projects. An investigation by federal prosecutors became public weeks before the primary, too late for Mr. Lewis to attract strong opposition.

• Louisiana, Second District: Rep. William Jefferson (D) was the target of an FBI raid in May at his Capitol Hill office as part of an investigation into whether he took a $100,000 bribe in 2005 - all but $10,000 of which was alleged to be found in the freezer of his Washington home. Jefferson faces a long list of challengers, and the state Democratic Party has endorsed his closest competitor, Karen Carter.

• Pennsylvania, Seventh District: The political future of Rep. Curt Weldon (R) is in doubt amid allegations he used his influence to help his daughter's lobbying firm secure contracts worth $1 million from foreign clients. The FBI raided his daughter's home and office this month in what Mr. Weldon termed a politically motivated inquiry. Weldon faces Democrat Joe Sestak.

• West Virginia, First District: Rep. Alan Mollohan (D) faces a stiff challenge from Republican Chris Wakim, who has support from the national Republican Party and big names such as first lady Laura Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Mollohan is the subject of an investigation into federal money given to nonprofit groups that contributed to his campaigns.

Democrats Fear Disillusionment In Black Voters (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Last weekend, Jim Webb, the Virginia Democrat who hopes to oust Senator George Allen, crammed in visits to 12 black churches, and for several weeks he has been pumping money into advertisements on black radio stations and in black newspapers.

In Missouri, Claire McCaskill, the Democrat trying to unseat Senator Jim Talent, has been running advertisements about sickle cell anemia, a genetic illness that mostly afflicts black people, and the importance of stem cell research in helping to find a cure.

For Democrats like these in tight races, black voter turnout will be crucial on Election Day. But despite a generally buoyant Democratic Party nationally, there are worries among Democratic strategists in some states that blacks may not turn up at the polls in big enough numbers because of disillusionment over past shenanigans.

"This notion that elections are stolen and that elections are rigged is so common in the public sphere that we're having to go out of our way to counter them this year," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist.

This will be the first midterm election in which the Democratic Party is mobilizing teams of lawyers and poll watchers, to check for irregularities including suppression of the black vote, in at least a dozen of the closest districts, Ms. Brazile said.

Democrats' worries are backed up by a Pew Research Center report that found that blacks were twice as likely now than they were in 2004 to say they had little or no confidence in the voting system, rising to 29 percent from 15 percent.

And more than three times as many blacks as whites — 29 percent versus 8 percent — say they do not believe that their vote will be accurately tallied.

Voting experts say the disillusionment is the cumulative effect of election problems in 2000 and 2004, and a reaction to new identification and voter registration laws.

Long lines and shortages of poll workers in lower-income neighborhoods in the 2004 election and widespread reports of fliers with misinformation appearing in minority areas have also had a corrosive effect on confidence, experts say.

The harder question is whether this jaded outlook will diminish turnout.

Recent polls have found record levels of outrage from Democrats about the current political leadership, which may offset the effect of black disillusion.

But Saleemah Affoul of Milwaukee, for one, is not so sure. Like many other black people in her neighborhood, Ms. Affoul said she was convinced that no matter how she voted, it would not be counted fairly.

"I do think the system is rigged," she said. "I vote anyway because my forefathers worked too hard to win me that right. But not everyone feels that responsibility around here."

Walking along Martin Luther King Jr. Drive in the gritty and mostly black section of Brewers Hill on the North Side of Milwaukee, Ms. Affoul said that cynicism in her neighborhood was on the rise.

She traced her own skepticism to one afternoon two months before the last presidential election when she overheard several young black men saying they were not going to vote because they feared being arrested at the polling station for their unpaid parking tickets. The neighborhood had been flooded with fliers from the Milwaukee Black Voters League, a fictitious group, saying that even minor infractions like parking tickets disqualified people from voting.

Ms. Affoul, 66, said she argued with the men but failed to convince them that they had been misinformed.

"I realized that maybe the poll tax isn't gone after all, and that if people were willing to try that trick, they might be willing to do a lot more that I don't even know about," she said.

Black voters are expected to play crucial roles in races for governor and the Senate in Florida, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Virginia.

In Maryland, where blacks make up about 30 percent of the electorate, the Democratic candidate for governor, Martin O'Malley, who is white, is trailing the Republican incumbent, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., by several points. Mr. O'Malley needs a large turnout among blacks in Baltimore to win, and he has mobilized more than 2,000 get-out-the-vote workers in black neighborhoods. He also helped his chances of attracting the black vote by selecting Anthony G. Brown, a black lawyer, as his running mate.

DOJ_NMG_0087062

In Tennessee, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. is depending on a strong showing from blacks in Memphis, which he represents, to edge past Bob Corker and become the first black senator from a Southern state since Reconstruction.

In Virginia, Democrats hope that recent accusations of racism against Senator Allen will motivate blacks to vote for his Democratic opponent, Mr. Webb.

Ronald Walters, director of the African American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland, said the reason for the rise in black voters' cynicism could be summed up in a single word: confirmation.

Mr. Walters said that episodes of voter suppression that were dismissed in 2000 as unfounded recurred in 2004 and were better documented because rights groups dispatched thousands of lawyers and poll watchers. In addition, the first national data-tracking tool, the Election Incident Reporting System, offered a national hot line that fed a database of what ended up to be 40,000 problems.

"All of a sudden after 2004, these weren't just baseless or isolated incidents," Mr. Walters said.

The type of misleading letter sent this month to 14,000 Hispanic immigrants in Orange County, Calif., threatening them with arrest if they tried to vote, was hardly a first. In 2004, similar fliers appeared in predominantly black neighborhoods in the Pittsburgh area, on official-looking letterheads. The fliers said that because of unusually high voter registration, Republicans were to vote on Election Day, and Democrats were to vote the next day.

Fliers sent in Lake County, Ohio, told people that if they had registered through the N.A.A.C.P., they could not vote.

Asked whether such tactics from 2004 could influence black turnout next month, the Rev. Al Sharpton of New York, whose National Action Network is also mobilizing voter protection teams, said that despite insufficient action from Democrats in responding to the problems, he believed that black turnout would be high.

"Just because more of us believe that folks are trying to rob us of certain rights doesn't mean we are more likely to give up and leave the front door unlocked," Mr. Sharpton said.

The rollout of new voting machines may also be contributing to black voters' fears.

"African-Americans are more susceptible to conspiracy theories about the new technology because they have been subject to actual conspiracies more often than the rest of the population," said David A. Bositis, senior political analyst for the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington, a research organization dedicated to African-American issues.

Marsha Lindsey, a black paramedic and former poll worker in Dayton, Ohio, said that after 2004 she stopped arguing with her black friends when they said there was no point in voting.

Spencer Overton, a law professor at George Washington University and author of "Stealing Democracy: the New Politics of Voter Suppression," said the threat of voter suppression presented difficult strategic decisions.

"Voter suppression is a real threat," Mr. Overton said, "but Democrats can't invest so much into voter protection that they don't have adequate resources to turn out their voters to the polls in the first place."

The Rev. DeForest B. Soaries, who is black and was appointed by President George W. Bush as the first chairman of the United States Election Assistance Commission, an agency meant to help carry out the Help America Vote Act, said Democrats overestimated the problem of voter suppression in much the same way Republicans overestimated the problem of voter fraud.

Skepticism is especially pronounced in poor black neighborhoods, Mr. Soaries said, because these communities are often disproportionately affected by problems with machines and the number and training of poll workers. When problems do occur in these areas, he added, they occur against a historical backdrop of voter suppression.

Whatever its consequence, the topic is very much on Democrats' minds. At a recent Democratic fund-raiser in Atlanta, at the home of Representative John Lewis, who is black, conversation centered on perceptions that widespread voter disenfranchisement would haunt the 2006 elections.

Former President Bill Clinton addressed the issue there, criticizing some Republican campaign tactics. After mentioning rough-edged political ads and other strategies, he said, "And when that doesn't work, they try to keep you from voting."

Headed into a statewide candidates' forum on prison overhaul, for pastors from Baltimore, the Rev. Heber Brown III, who is black, said that the success of black voter mobilization efforts in 2004 set the stage for some disillusion.

"Last time, you had hip-hop leaders like Russell Simmons, Eminem and Sean Combs with the Vote or Die campaign and lots of young blacks voted but what did they get?" said Mr. Brown, 26, pastor of Shiloh Baptist Church in Baltimore County. "Now when you talk to young black voters you can't just say, 'Get out the vote,' you have to first do a lot of explaining, cut through a lot of confusion about the 2004 vote and first talk about how change takes time."

Clinton On Campaign Trail For Democratic House Seats (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

SYRACUSE, Oct. 26 — Bill Clinton campaigned in upstate New York on Thursday, trying to give a boost to Democratic candidates seeking to topple several entrenched Republicans in the Democratic Party's drive to retake the House of Representatives.

"This country can take a new direction with a new Congress," Mr. Clinton said during a rally at the airport here after accusing the Republican Party of being led by a right-wing faction beholden to special interests. "We can make a new beginning."

Mr. Clinton's appearance underlined the sense of confidence that Democrats feel about their prospects for picking up several House seats in Republican strongholds of New York.

Here in central New York, Democrats are taking aim at two Republican-held seats: in the 25th Congressional District, where Representative James T. Walsh is facing Dan Maffei; and in the 24th District, where State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican, is battling Michael A. Arcuri, a Democrat, to succeed Sherwood L. Boehlert, a Republican who is retiring.

Mr. Maffei and Mr. Arcuri were both on hand at the rally here in a hangar at which Mr. Clinton praised them and several other Democratic candidates as agents of positive change.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Clinton was in Albany, where he campaigned with Kirsten Gillibrand, who is trying to unseat Representative John E. Sweeney, the Republican incumbent in the 20th District.

Mr. Clinton's visit coincided with an unexpected last-minute drive that Democratic leaders in Washington are making in upstate New York, a region that they appeared to have largely written off a few months ago.

Underscoring the stakes in New York, Representative Rahm Emmanuel, the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, also appeared at the Albany rally before traveling here to Syracuse to make a campaign appearance for Mr. Arcuri and be the host at a fund-raiser for Mr. Maffei.

Emboldened by a stream of bad news for Republicans, including the mounting death toll in Iraq, Democrats are pumping money and manpower into districts around the state where they believe Republicans are vulnerable.

Republicans have countered that Democrats are overstating their prospects of winning in New York in an effort to force them to spread their resources thinner than they have already. Democrats, who need 15 seats to capture control of the House, are seriously challenging Republican incumbents in races throughout the country.

Republicans contend that their incumbents in New York are secure because of their records of achievement locally and because the districts they represent give Republicans an enrollment edge over Democrats. Moreover, they argue that Congressional races typically turn on local issues and personalities, not on the overall national climate.

And yet there is evidence that Republicans may be worried that some of the party's seats in New York are suddenly in play. Four Republican-held districts in New York were put on a fund-raising list that Republican leaders compiled, identifying candidates who are "most in need of support right now," according to an article published this week in The Hill, a publication that covers Washington politics.

On his visit here, Mr. Clinton got in a plug for his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is up for re-election next month. He drew chuckles when he told the audience that it was her birthday and that he had asked her whether there was anything special he could do to mark the occasion.

"She said, 'There sure is. Go to upstate New York to campaign for our candidates,' " he recalled.

As it turned out, Mr. Clinton left Syracuse and went on to campaign for another candidate: Mrs. Clinton herself. While she is considered a shoo-in for re-election, her advisers believe that a substantial margin of victory in November could give her momentum in advance of a potential presidential bid should she decide to run.

DOJ_NMG_0087064

Appearing at a Democratic rally yesterday at Republic Airport in Farmingdale, N.Y., Mr. Clinton enumerated his wife's accomplishments over the past six years, highlighting her efforts to help combat breast cancer, a potent issue among women on Long Island.

He also praised his wife, who was not present at the rally, for her bipartisan work ethic, and he called for less "fighting" and more "honest arguments" in government.

Pat Toomey (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

Posted October 27, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1027/p25s01-usmb.html Pat Toomey By David Cook

The conservative Club for Growth's president, Pat Toomey, is careful not to predict a Democratic takeover of the US House of Representatives. But his comments over breakfast with reporters Thursday make it clear: his advocacy group is preparing for major changes on Capitol Hill.

If Republicans lose the House, Toomey says, "The Club for Growth is poised to play an enormous role in helping to rebuild a limited government, pro-growth majority in the US House." Toomey, a former Congressman, has been head of the Club for Growth since last year.

The Club lobbies for making the Bush tax cuts permanent, eliminating the inheritance tax, cutting government spending, and boosting free trade. The group has a political action committee which supports Republican candidates who are in synch with its policy positions.

If you think control of the House will change, "then you presumably accept some of the things that follow from that - the likelihood of several very quick, if not immediate, resignations, a wave of retirements," Toomey said. "These are thing that are not infrequent when there is a change in control."

Toomey was careful when talking about the political fate of House Speaker Dennis Hastert. "I don't want to make a prediction about Denny Hastert. As a general matter I will say this: I think Republicans are certainly likely to lose seats. After the election I will say I think there will be new faces at high levels of the House leadership," Toomey said.

While a Democratic takeover would complicate his organization's work, Toomey notes, "Some good things could come of this. I think for one the president ought to - if this were to happen - I think the president ought to call the Democrats on their claims that they are all upset about the earmarking and the wasteful spending. OK, good. So let's see if Nancy Pelosi will agree to not have earmarks in appropriation bills. Let's see if she will agree to hold the line on spending. I am sure she won't. But I think the president ought to call them out on this...."

Free trade is a key issue for the club. "If we lose either [the House or Senate to the Democrats], I think free trade is in big trouble," Toomey said. "And it is one of the things that worries me a great deal ... the only remaining way to expand trade is bilateral and possibly regional agreements. Those require fast track [negotiating] authority. Fast track authority expires in July. There is no way Nancy Pelosi is going to approve fast track authority for the president.... It goes from tough but doable to impossible."

A native of Providence, Rhode Island, Toomey put himself through Harvard University with scholarships and loans. He then became an investment banker and later operated a restaurant business with his brothers.

In 1998, he ran for Congress in Pennsylvania's 15th district. In the primary that year, he called for both Social Security individual investment accounts and a 17 percent flat tax. He also pledged to serve for only six years.

And he won.

Representative Toomey mounted a primary challenge against Senator Arlen Specter in 2004, but narrowly lost. He moved to the Club shortly thereafter.

Well-Timed Funding In Tight Races (WP/AP)

By Ben Feller

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087065

Those in power love to dole out grants at election time. With Republican control of Congress at risk, the Bush administration is busily using the perks of incumbency to help allies from Ohio to California.

The formula: Cabinet luminaries travel to competitive districts and hand out money while local candidates bask in media coverage.

"Democrats did it. Republicans are doing it. The Whigs and the Federalists probably did it as well. It's a very old tradition," said John Fortier, a research fellow who studies politics at the American Enterprise Institute.

Take Pennsylvania, where Rep. Curt Weldon (R) was getting some fuel Wednesday from the Energy Department. The agency sent an assistant secretary to stand next to Weldon at a news conference, touting a local company that had just scored a $6.3 million federal grant. The photo op comes as Weldon is under federal investigation for conflicts of interest and is facing the most formidable reelection challenge in his 20-year career.

In the same state last week, Labor Secretary Elaine Chao joined another endangered Republican, Sen. Rick Santorum, and thanked him for his leadership. Then she announced a $10.4 million grant to help the state clean up from severe storms.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings chose to start handing out grants for teacher bonuses at the political crossroads of Ohio this week. In one of the state's most closely watched races, polls show Sen. Mike DeWine (R) trailing Rep. Sherrod Brown (D).

Spellings began her day Monday by appearing in Cincinnati with Rep. Steve Chabot (R), who is in his own election fight. To announce the $20 million grant for Ohio, she stood in Columbus with Rep. Ralph Regula (R), who oversees the House spending bill for education. The Education Department said the election had no bearing, but Brown called it a publicity stunt and "cynical politics at its worst."

Elsewhere in the Cabinet, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, a former Nebraska governor, has traveled the South and the Midwest to help out GOP candidates. He appeared Tuesday at an ethanol seminar with Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, who is tied with or trailing Democrat Mike Hatch in polls. The USDA chief then appeared at campaign events with Reps. Mark Kennedy, a Senate candidate, and Gil Gutknecht, whose races are viewed as competitive.

All this political promotion comes in addition to President Bush's increasingly frequent forays on behalf of struggling Republicans.

In Buffalo, even the chairman of the House GOP election effort is struggling to hold on to his seat. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds is trying to overcome criticism that he did not do enough to stop inappropriate relationships between congressional pages and former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

On Tuesday in Buffalo, leaders of a private club and writers at the city's newspaper got unusual visits from the third-ranking official at the CIA. The stops by Michael J. Morell, the associate deputy director of the agency, were arranged by Anthony Gioia, a longtime Bush fundraiser and a donor to Reynolds. Morell spoke about the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. CIA officials rarely make such appearances.

Asked about the timing, CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said, "Politics had no bearing whatsoever on Mr. Morell's acceptance of an invitation to give a speech in Buffalo or when to give it." He added, "No one dispatched him." Mansfield said previous directors and senior officials have talked to newspapers' editorial boards.

The travel by the Cabinet has irked Rep. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), the top Democrat on the Government Reform Committee. He produced an analysis Wednesday that says the cost of private travel by Cabinet secretaries and agency heads is more than $1.5 million since 2001.

"Cabinet secretaries are currently crisscrossing the nation to make appearances with members of Congress in close races," Waxman wrote to White House budget chief Rob Portman. "It would be a misuse of taxpayer dollars if, as in 2004, these officials were traveling on chartered private jets." He asked Portman to intervene.

Fortier, the American Enterprise Institute scholar, said he doubts any grant announcement or campaign stop by a big name will make a huge difference in an individual race. But it can't hurt. "For incumbents, this is something they can use to combat the argument that you need change," he said. "They're saying: 'Remember that aside from all the national issues, I'm here for you. I have the ear of the president.' "

Democrats Top Republicans In Fundraising (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, October 27, 2006

The Democrats' congressional campaign committees raised $15.5 million during the first 18 days of October, setting up their final push to reclaim both chambers. Republicans, meanwhile, raised $10.1 million for their candidates, continuing a pace that has lagged this election.

Republicans slightly beat the Democrats' House committee but stumbled on the Senate side, where a $5.5 million fundraising disparity emerged during the Oct. 1-17 reporting period. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee raised $9.1 million; the National Republican Senatorial Committee raised $3.6 million.

"In the world series of fundraising, Senate Democrats just hit a grand slam in the bottom of the ninth," Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., the committee's chairman, said in a statement. "The rapid rate at which Democrats are raising money is the latest evidence that Americans want change in the Senate."

The Senate fundraising disparity does not reflect individual campaign fundraising, which Republicans said gave them a $14 million advantage during the last complete reporting period.

The NRSC has $8.9 million on hand. It has raised $78.8 million this cycle. Its spokesman, Brian Nick, noted that Democrats outraised Republicans in 2004 and still didn't unseat the majority GOP.

The DSCC has $9.7 million in the bank. So far, the committee has raised $104 million for candidates. Those numbers don't reflect a pair of $250,000 donations from Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry. It does, however, include the more than $2 million this cycle from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"Those are millions of dollars flowing into the committee in the last couple of weeks and those are padding the numbers big time," Nick said.

Both parties' committees submitted reports to the Federal Election Commission on Thursday, 12 days before the midterm elections.

For House candidates, Democrats raised $6.4 million during the first days of October, giving them $17 million in the bank. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has raised $105 million this cycle.

Republicans trying to stop the Democrats from winning 15 seats and the majority in the House raised $6.5 million, bringing its cash-on-hand total to $18.3 million and election-cycle total to $142.4 million.

Combined, the Democrats have $26.7 million to spend on candidates in the final weeks. Republicans have $27.2 million in hand.

Business Groups Woo Democrats (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

"Some people have discovered virtues in me that they had previously overlooked," Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who stands to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee if Democrats control the House, mused recently. "The prospect of the chairmanship seems to have been a very good introduction."

Frank was referring to a surge in campaign contributions from pro-business groups — groups whose members would have to deal with the liberal Democrat instead of a probably-more-congenial Republican. (Rep. Michael G. Oxley, the Ohio Republican who now heads the committee, is retiring after this term.)

Issues involving the financial services industry fall under the committee's jurisdiction. And the New York Life Insurance Co.'s political action committee has contributed $10,000 to Frank this election season, up from $1,000 in the 2003-'04 cycle, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which tracks political donations. The National Assn. of Insurance and Financial Advisors PAC contributed $10,000 to Frank this election season, up from $3,000 in the last cycle.

Frank is not alone. As prospects appear to grow that Republicans will lose control of the House and perhaps even the Senate, business groups, trade associations, and their lobbyists and political advisors have developed a sudden enthusiasm for contributing to Democrats — especially to those likely to be in the House leadership or to head important committees if Republicans lose their majorities.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), for example, would chair the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee in a Democratic-run House, and he has begun hearing from groups he says had not called since the Republicans won control of the House in 1994.

"I don't think meeting with the chairman of General Electric has anything to do with my taking over Ways and Means; I just never realized how much they loved me," Rangel joked.

In this election cycle, the congressman has raised $17,000 from General Electric's political action committee for his campaign and his leadership PAC, which provides campaign funds for other Democrats. That's more than twice what he collected the previous cycle, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.

None of this is to say business has changed sides. It continues to give far more to Republicans than to Democrats. And the major groups representing the business community, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, are working hard to protect the GOP majorities in Congress.

Moreover, many business groups seek to play down their campaign contributions to the other side. New York Life spokesman William Werfel said that his company's PAC was giving more in general this cycle and that the GOP still got the most.

But as storm clouds gathered over the GOP this election season, business leaders, lobbyists and PACs quietly began to take out a form of political insurance — contributing more to Democrats who, if they become the majority party, will wield power over issues affecting business' bottom line.

"All of the Democratic ranking members have seen an increase in attentiveness to their fundraising…. There has definitely been an increase in people paying attention to the ranking members in particular," a House Democratic aide said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for members.

Frank, for one, sent out a solicitation asking contributors to "help me raise campaign funds which, as you know, I am using in substantial part to make sure that the next time we talk after that, I will be the Chairman in Waiting of the House Financial Services Committee."

As Democrats try to encourage the shift in campaign contributions and Republicans try to counter it, the result can be a behind-the-scenes tug of war.

"The Democrats are telling business lobbyists: 'Hedge your bets, we probably are going to be in control,' " said James Benton of the campaign watchdog group Common Cause. "The Republicans, on the other hand, are saying: 'We're watching. Don't give your money to Democrats. We're the people you can trust.' "

One lobbyist, who spoke on condition that he not be named because of the sensitivity of his relationship with the business groups he represented, acknowledged that business groups were ramping up their political donations to Democrats. "It's typical of the business community," he said. "They panic."

Political spending is projected to reach $2.6 billion in 2005-'06, making this the most expensive congressional campaign in history, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. PAC spending is expected to exceed $1 billion for the first time, "reflecting the ever-growing influence of business, labor and ideological interests," the center's acting director, Sheila Krumholz, said.

Washington lobbyist Aaron Houston said he had seen business' new interest in Democrats at a number of recent fundraisers. "There are a whole lot of $3,000 suits showing up," he said.

Republicans say they're not surprised.

"Business PACs go with wherever they see the wind blowing," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Typical of the emerging pattern is the National Beer Wholesalers Assn. PAC. Although Republicans still receive a larger share of its donations, the wholesalers have made $10,000 contributions to more than twice as many House Democrats as they did in the last election.

Craig Purser, president of the beer wholesalers, said in a written statement: "It looks like there are going to be more close races this year than in recent memory, so we are getting more requests from everyone. However, our strategy remains what it has always been. The NBWA-PAC simply continues to support those who stand with beer distributors on the issues that matter the most."

House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) had received no support from the beer wholesalers for at least a decade, but the trade group contributed $15,000 to the would-be majority leader's campaign committee and his leadership PAC in this election cycle.

Thanks in part to larger contributions from some kinds of businesses — including banking and insurance interests and defense and technology companies — Hoyer has raised nearly $4 million through his campaign committee and leadership PAC, more than in any election cycle during his 24-year congressional career.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who stands to chair the defense appropriations subcommittee in a Democratic-controlled House, has raised more than $2.5 million this year, including $179,400 from the defense industry — more than in previous election cycles.

And Rangel is poised to surpass the $879,554 he raised from PACs for the last election cycle. If Democrats should take over one or both chambers of Congress, Krumholz and other experts said, business contributions are likely to increase even more.

After Many Battles, Still On The Front Lines (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Karin Johanson loves studying the tiny print in the dozens of political polls that land on her desk every morning. She can tell you what's happening in Indiana's 8th Congressional District at any given moment, and why 20 volunteers must be dispatched pronto to an obscure precinct in Michigan.

She can also probably predict with scary accuracy how many seats Democrats will pick up in the Nov. 7 midterm elections -- but she's too superstitious to say.

Johanson, 51, is one of those people whose names you never hear, a political junkie who has been toiling in the backwaters of Democratic politics for more than 30 years -- and one who is playing a huge role in the party's efforts to regain the House.

She is the executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the minority party's campaign organ colloquially known as the "D Triple C," and she knows more about the individual races in the 435 congressional districts than most of the candidates do.

If her boss, the outspokenly partisan Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), is the aggressive face of the Democratic push, Johanson is his anchor, the person who can sit at her office near the Capitol and see the whole country at a glance -- or in critical little parts that might add up to a win.

"She's Rahm's other side," says friend Mary Beth Cahill, who ran Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential bid in 2004. "Someone has to be there every day to make sure everything works."

This Johanson does with a staff of 60 (all quite young), a volunteer pool of 700 and a budget of $40 million, $10 million of which goes straight into the districts for grass-roots efforts. Yesterday, she had 100 active broadcast political commercials in her e-mail queue waiting to be viewed.

"Karin put together 40 customized plans in 40 districts with 40 ground operations," Emanuel said. "She has intimate knowledge of every district. She knows what works and what doesn't because she's been there before. I'm a very obsessive person, and I give her six things to do and she does seven."

Johanson has indeed been down this road many times before, as the DCCC's West Coast political director in the 1994 (Democratic nightmare) cycle and political director in 2000. Before that, she was political director of Emily's List -- the political action committee that supports female candidates -- during the 1992 "year of the woman." Twenty-one new Democratic women were elected to the House, and Emily's List founder Ellen Malcolm credits Johanson with recruiting most of them.

"She knows every player in every district," Malcolm said. Even after 1995, when the GOP took control of the House, Johanson was not deterred from recruiting candidates. "We'd say, 'What about so-and-so?' and Karin would say, 'Oh, I asked her twice, and she said no,' " Malcolm said. "Everyone was saying no, but she was persistent, and the environment started to shift."

Johanson grew up in Princeton, N.J., and recalls being a partisan very early. She was for Eugene McCarthy when she was 12 because she opposed the Vietnam War, and she named her pet goldfish Hubert, Horatio and Humphrey. She attended American University but took some time off before graduating to work for then-Rep. Gladys N. Spellman (D-Md.). Later, she spent 10 years working for Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), as his press secretary and later as his chief of staff.

Johanson said that after Democrats lost the House in 1994, she couldn't bring herself to go up to the Hill for a year. "It was too depressing. I didn't want to see Republicans," she said. "I didn't even go up to the credit union."

Although she said she won't let herself get too enthusiastic this year about what seems to be a Democratic wave, Johanson admits that it feels very different. "There is a huge energy among Democrats out there. We know what we running against." Unlike in 2004, when Democrats struggled to find issues, she said, this year "we're not making it up."

The war in Iraq, she said, is the dominant issue "because there is something there for everyone to be concerned about -- whether it's expenditures, or body armor, or questions about why our government hasn't done better to prepare the Iraqis.

"Even people who support the war think something needs to be done," she said. "And all these scandals -- it's been overwhelming."

Johanson said the DCCC is treating 54 districts as competitive -- an unusually high number.

At a time in life when most political operatives have already jettisoned the high-adrenaline life of retail politics and a constant diet of fast food, Johanson isn't going anywhere soon.

"I love electoral politics," she said. "I like being in the fight. I think everything else is boring by comparison. I think everybody who has done it loves it, but most people feel like they have to do something else."

The Year Of Playing Dirtier (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Rep. Ron Kind pays for sex!

Well, that's what the Republican challenger for his Wisconsin congressional seat, Paul R. Nelson, claims in new ads, the ones with "XXX" stamped across Kind's face.

It turns out that Kind -- along with more than 200 of his fellow hedonists in the House -- opposed an unsuccessful effort to stop the National Institutes of Health from pursuing peer-reviewed sex studies. According to Nelson's ads, the Democrat also wants to "let illegal aliens burn the American flag" and "allow convicted child molesters to enter this country."

To Nelson, that doesn't even qualify as negative campaigning.

"Negative campaigning is vicious personal attacks," he said in an interview. "This isn't personal at all."

By 2006 standards, maybe it isn't.

On the brink of what could be a power-shifting election, it is kitchen-sink time: Desperate candidates are throwing everything. While negative campaigning is a tradition in American politics, this year's version in many races has an eccentric shade, filled with allegations of moral bankruptcy and sexual perversion.

At the same time, the growth of "independent expenditures" by national parties and other groups has allowed candidates to distance themselves from distasteful attacks on their opponents, while blogs and YouTube have provided free distribution networks for eye-catching hatchet jobs.

"When the news is bad, the ads tend to be negative," said Shanto Iyengar, a Stanford professor who studies political advertising. "And the more negative the ad, the more likely it is to get free media coverage. So there's a big incentive to go to the extremes."

The result has been a carnival of ugly, especially on the GOP side, where operatives are trying to counter what polls show is a hostile political environment by casting opponents as fatally flawed characters. The National Republican Campaign Committee is spending more than 90 percent of its advertising budget on negative ads, according to GOP operatives, and the rest of the party seems to be following suit. A few examples of the "character issues" taking center stage two weeks before Election Day:

Â· In New York, the NRCC ran an ad accusing Democratic House candidate Michael A. Arcuri, a district attorney, of using taxpayer dollars for phone sex. "Hi, sexy," a dancing woman purrs. "You've reached the live, one-on-one fantasy line." It turns out that one of Arcuri's aides had tried to call the state Division of Criminal Justice, which had a number that was almost identical to that of a porn line. The misdial cost taxpayers $1.25.

Â· In Ohio, GOP gubernatorial candidate J. Kenneth Blackwell, trailing by more than 20 points in polls, has accused front-running Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland of protecting a former aide who was convicted in 1994 on a misdemeanor indecency charge. Blackwell's campaign is also warning voters through suggestive "push polls" that Strickland failed to support a resolution condemning sex between adults and children. Strickland, a psychiatrist, objected to a line suggesting that sexually abused children cannot have healthy relationships when they grow up.

Â· The Republican Party of Wisconsin distributed a mailing linking Democratic House candidate Steve Kagen to a convicted serial killer and child rapist. The supposed connection: The "bloodthirsty" attorney for the killer had also done legal work for Kagen.

Â· In two dozen congressional districts, a political action committee supported by a white Indianapolis businessman, J. Patrick Rooney, is running ads saying Democrats want to abort black babies. A voice says, "If you make a little mistake with one of your hos, you'll want to dispose of that problem tout de suite, no questions asked."

Â· In the most controversial recent ad, the Republican National Committee slammed Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) for attending a Playboy-sponsored Super Bowl party. In the ad, a scantily clad white actress winks as she reminisces about good times with Ford, who is black. That ad has been pulled, but the RNC has a new one saying Ford "wants to give the abortion pill to schoolchildren."

Some Democrats are playing rough, too. House candidate Chris Carney is running ads slamming the "family values" of Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.), whose former mistress accused him of choking her. And House candidate Kirsten Gillibrand has an ad online ridiculing Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.) for attending a late-night fraternity party. "What's a 50-year-old man doing at a frat party anyway?" one young woman asks, as a faux Sweeney boogies behind her to the Beastie Boys. "Totally creeping me out!" another responds.

But most harsh Democratic attacks have focused on the policies and performance of the GOP majority, trying to link Republicans to Bush, the unpopular war in Iraq and the scandals involving former representative Mark Foley and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. That is not surprising, given that polls show two-thirds of the electorate thinks the country is going in the wrong direction. And studies show that negative ads can reduce turnout; Democrats hope a constant drumbeat of scandal, Iraq and "stay the course" will persuade conservatives to stay home on Nov. 7.

It is harder for Republicans to blame out-of-power Democrats for the current state of Washington, but they are equally eager to depress Democratic turnout and fire up their conservative base. One GOP strategy has been raising the specter of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a San Francisco liberal, becoming speaker; for example, Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.) is airing radio ads warning that a Democratic victory would allow Pelosi to "put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda." Then again, Hostettler's opponent, Democrat Brad Ellsworth, has accused him of promoting the sale of guns to criminals, "including child-rapists."

Some of this year's negative ads are more substantive, reprising a successful Republican strategy from 2002 and 2004: portraying Democrats as soft on terrorism. For example, Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) has an ad lambasting her opponent for opposing Bush's efforts to conduct wiretaps without search warrants. A host of Democrats have been accused of trying to "cut and run" in Iraq -- including House candidate Tammy Duckworth of Illinois, who lost both legs in Iraq.

The RNC has raised eyebrows with an ad consisting almost entirely of al-Qaeda videos starring Osama bin Laden and his top deputies. There is no sound except the ticking of a bomb before the final warning: "These are the stakes. Vote November 7th." John G. Geer, a Vanderbilt professor who has written a book defending negative political ads, said he told a well-connected Republican friend in Washington that the ticking-bomb ploy seemed like a desperation move. The friend e-mailed back: "John, we're desperate!"

"Look, the electorate is polarized, the stakes are large, and neither party has much to run on right now," Geer said. "You can expect to see some pretty outlandish ads."

The "pays for sex" ad against Kind in Wisconsin -- along with a similar one aired against Rep. Brad Miller (D-N.C.) -- may be the most extreme. It says Kind spent tax dollars to study "the sex lives of Vietnamese prostitutes" and "the masturbation habits of old men" and "to pay teenage girls to watch pornographic movies with probes connected to their genitalia." Cue the punch line: "Ron Kind pays for sex, but not for soldiers." The Wisconsin Republican Party denounced the ad, and several TV stations refused to air it, but that only got it more attention. It is the centerpiece of Nelson's Web site: "This ad is so powerful, a sitting U.S. Congressman threatened TV stations with legal action if they dared to play it."

Kind joked in an interview that he has been paying for sex ever since he said "I do." But on a more serious note, he said Nelson's attack ad is typical of modern politics, in which desperate candidates can attract media coverage and rally their base with distortion. He opposed the amendment in question -- as did many Republicans -- because he does not think Congress should interfere in peer-reviewed NIH studies, not because of any interest in teenage genitalia. That particular study, incidentally, had nothing to do with teenagers.

"Man, it's a crazy system, and it's getting worse every year," Kind said. "We rip each other to shreds, and then we're all supposed to come back to Washington and try to work together. It's a hell of a way to elect representatives."

At least it is clear who is responsible for Nelson's ad: Nelson. The Playboy ad bashing Ford, on the other hand, is a typical product of the attack politics of 2006. Its beneficiary, GOP Senate candidate Bob Corker, called it "tacky" but said he cannot do anything about an RNC ad. Even RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said he is powerless to stop it; it is an "independent expenditure" of the RNC, out of the committee's control. He doesn't seem too upset about it, though. Corker has been rising in the polls since it started airing.

Experts say that in the past, negative ads were usually more accurate, better documented and more informative than positive ads; there was a higher burden of proof. Stanford's Iyengar thinks that is still true for candidate-funded messages, which now require candidates to say they approved them. But it is not true when the messages are produced by political parties, shadowy independent groups or partisans posting on YouTube.

"You're going to see more of this sensational, off-the-wall stuff," Iyengar said. "If you get people disgusted, they might withdraw from politics, and that's the real goal these days."

Political Ads Go For The Jugular In Novel Ways (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Clad in a natty dark-blue suit, Republican Senate hopeful Michael Steele is standing beside four silver trash cans. He raises a lid. "Smell it? Trash from my opponent. Time to take it out," he says, banging the lid shut.

Talking directly into a camera, Mr. Steele bristles about being portrayed to Maryland voters as a Republican stooge and insinuates that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ben Cardin, was somehow involved in the theft of his Social Security number and credit report -- which Mr. Cardin denies. "After 40 years in office, Ben Cardin can't change Washington...but you and I can," Mr. Steele tells viewers as the ad concludes.

With less than two weeks to go until Election Day, there has never been a harder time to break through the nonstop negative clutter, particularly in states and districts where the races are toss-ups. About $1.2 billion has already been spent on political and issue ads since Jan. 1, according to TNS Media Intelligent/CMAG, a political-ad tracking firm based in Arlington, Va., which predicts that ad spending this year could hit a record $1.7 billion.

Some candidates are using humor to attract the attention of voters weary of political ads. Texas gubernatorial candidate Kinky Friedman noted in one recent TV spot that "money may buy a fine dog, but only love can make her wag her tail." In Minnesota, Republican Senate candidate Mark Kennedy enlisted his entire family for a 30-second ad, dubbed "About Mark," which mocked his "party animal" career as an accountant and his image as a "snazzy dresser" by showing a closet-full of flannel shirts.

When AARP, the big seniors' group, launched its traditional voter-education drive this year, it opted for a new, edgier campaign, dubbed "Don't Vote." The centerpiece: two television ads featuring people urging voters not to vote -- at least until they learned more about the issues.

Mr. Steele, in particular, has drawn attention for his ads, which have neither the look nor feel of typical political commercials and have been cited as one reason why his race against Rep. Cardin is closer than expected, given Maryland's tendency to elect Democrats.

In an ad that ran earlier this year, Mr. Steele used humor to warn voters that he would be attacked by the "Washington crowd" for a variety of sins like "Steele hates puppies." Cuddling a bug-eyed pup, he solemnly proclaimed: "For the record, I love puppies."

"It all depends on the state and the dynamics of the race -- you would not try to make people laugh in the state of Louisiana this year," says Brad Todd, a partner at OnMessage Inc., the Republican ad- and media-strategy firm in Alexandria, Va., that created Mr. Steele's ads.

Several ads combine humor and negativity, like the spot from Republican Lynn Swann, the former Pittsburgh Steelers great who is now challenging Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell. The ad starts with a shot of the governor on election night 2002 promising to lower property taxes and then fast-forwards to the present, focusing on an "interviewer" going door to door toting a lifesize cutout of Mr. Rendell to ask people if their property taxes had declined -- only to be rebuffed in a variety of humiliating ways. After being sprayed by a woman watering her lawn and chased by dogs, the interviewer dumps the Rendell cutout in a trash can and says, "I don't know, Ed. This isn't looking so good."

In Tennessee, the race for the U.S. senate between Republican Bob Corker and Democrat Harold Ford Jr., now a member of the House, is long on negativity, short on humor. Recently, a Republican National Committee ad attacking Mr. Ford featured a scantily clad blonde woman winking at the camera and asking him to call her. As a counterpunch, an ad for Mr. Ford shows him walking through a house saying: "Bob Corker has been going personal. After me, my family. If I had a dog, he'd probably kick him, too."

"The public doesn't like personal attacks. But the public has no problem with questions about a person's position on taxes or whatever," says John Geer, a Vanderbilt University professor who has written extensively about negative campaign ads. "Humorous ads sometimes work pretty well, too."

North Carolina congressional hopeful Vernon Robinson, a Republican once dubbed a "black Jesse Helms" by a local newspaper, has run ads so outrageously negative that some people have found them unintentionally funny. His campaign gained attention -- and donations -- after running a television ad earlier this year attacking his opponent, two-term Democratic Rep. Brad Miller, for failing to vote on a measure to provide body armor for the troops in Iraq. The ad clicked off a variety of things that Mr. Robinson says Mr. Miller did vote for, including studies on "the sex lives of Vietnamese prostitutes in San Francisco" and "bisexual, transgendered and two-spirited Aleutian Eskimos, whoever they are." (Mr. Miller disputed the allegations in the ad.)

But while voters may say they frown on such attacks, negative ads seem to make a bigger impression on them than positive messages. Recently, at a luncheon in northern Indiana, Republican Rep. Chris Chocola was asked why he and his Democratic opponent had run so many negative ads. In response, Mr. Chocola quizzed the audience: Could anyone describe one of the half dozen positive ads he had run describing how he'd helped the community from Congress? No one answered.

Like other advertising, the most effective political ads "aim for the heart first and the head second," says Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of TNS Media Intelligence/CMAG11. That's one reason why ads about embryonic stem-cell research have been particularly effective at attracting attention recently, political ad watchers say.

In Arizona, Democrats used the granddaughter of the late Rep. Morris "Mo" Udall, a popular congressman who suffered from Parkinson's disease, to make the case against six-term Republican Rep. J.D. Hayworth in one television ad. "My grandfather would have been a champion of embryonic stem-cell research. But J.D. Hayworth had denied families hope," says Loren Udall, who has herself been diagnosed with lupus, an autoimmune disease.

Recently, ads featuring actor Michael J. Fox began running in states with close races, notably the Senate races in Missouri and Maryland. Mr. Fox suffers from Parkinson's, which attacks the central nervous system, making it difficult for patients to control their movements. In the 30-second ad, he speaks directly to the camera, shaking and rocking, as he urges support for candidates backing embryonic stem-cell research, which some scientists believe could lead to breakthroughs in treating Parkinson's, diabetes and other diseases.

The ad inflicted even more damage after Rush Limbaugh and some other conservatives accused Mr. Fox of exaggerating his symptoms. The radio host later apologized, but the controversy shows the peril that the issue poses for Republicans. "It puts Republicans on the wrong side of hope, which is a tough place to run from," says Mr. Tracey of TNS Media Intelligence/CMAG.

Overflowing Cash Creates River Of Pre-election Ads (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

The nation has 11 days before Election Day arrives and shrill political advertising ceases. The 2006 midterms have been anything but sleepy.

"This is a very vigorous, intense campaign, fueled by a widespread sense among candidates and House leadership that change is afoot," said Donald Green, professor of political science at Yale University.

To date, Republicans and Democrats have spent $117 million on the U.S. Senate and House races, according to the Federal Election Commission, up 27 percent from the comparable period in 2004, when the tab stood at $92.5 million.

When it's all over, the amount spent on "home-stretch advertising, voter mobilization and other campaigning" by parties, candidates and advocacy groups may be as high as $2.6 billion, the Center for Responsive Politics estimated this week.

Big spending is everywhere. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee recently dropped $1.5 million on a week's worth of ads criticizing Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican. In New Jersey, the National Republican Senatorial Committee spent $3.5 million to boost support for Tom Kean Jr. The parties are expected to spend a combined $5 million in the battle for the House seat in Seattle's 8th District.

The candidates are not the only ones in turmoil. Political advisers also are agitated, Mr. Green said.

"There's a real sense of overload. Voters are seeing some ads dozens of times as campaigners rachet up the outreach to compensate for a fragmented, diminishing audience," he said.

That audience is getting a mean-spirited showcase. Money spent on negative campaigns -- that is, in opposition to a particular candidate -- this year accounts for 78 percent of spending on both sides. Two years ago, it was 40 percent. Congressional Quarterly recently estimated that 80 percent of advertising purchases were for negative messages.

An analysis of campaign ads by the nonpartisan watchdog group Political Fact Check -- which monitors claims by both sides in print and broadcast -- offers ample evidence of mudslinging. The District-based group categorized some recent campaigning content as "moldy bunk" and "mythmaking," among other things.

Though perhaps weary of the partisan barrage, voters may be more engaged than usual.

"The level of voter interest is higher than it has been in a decade, judging from the polls. The news media is also suggesting to people that this election is critical," said Adam Berinsky, a political scientist with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Still, he predicts that voter turnout probably will be less than 50 percent, no matter how many ads clutter the political landscape.

Both parties have employed "microtargeting" this election season, using sophisticated demographic and marketing techniques to ferret out niche voting blocs, from urban Hispanics to "Security Moms."

"Some of these advisers get nostalgic for the old days when you could reach America on the big three broadcast networks alone," Mr. Green said. "They pine for those times because they were simpler."

GOP Drops TV Plans For Ohio Senator (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, October 27, 2006

The Republican National Committee said Thursday it won't run any television ads in Ohio on behalf of Sen. Mike DeWine during the final week of the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0087074

RNC spokesman Aaron McLear said the national party organization had reserved time to run statewide TV ads next week as DeWine tries to come back against Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, who leads in recent polls. But in the end, the RNC decided not to make the purchase, McLear said.

National Democrats said it showed the Republicans were giving up on the two-term senator.

"Even the RNC is basically saying now that Mike DeWine has a slim chance of winning this campaign," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democrats' national Senate campaign organization.

The Democrats need to win six Republican seats and hold all of theirs to take control of the Senate.

McLear said the RNC remains active in helping DeWine get out the vote by knocking on doors and making telephone calls, but will let the senator's campaign use its cash advantage to stay competitive on television.

According to reports filed Thursday with the Federal Election Commission, DeWine's campaign had $2.8 million on hand as of Oct. 18 while Brown's had about $837,526. The Brown campaign already bought more than $2.5 million in TV time through the election, spokeswoman Joanna Kuebler said.

DeWine campaign spokesman Brian Seitchik said the national party's decision isn't a sign of abandonment.

"The RNC has spent as much money in Ohio as they have in any other state, and they realize we have the tools to communicate effectively with voters across the state," Seitchik said.

The RNC began spending in the Ohio contest before any other Senate race, McLear said. It had spent $3.1 million on the race when it purchased its last ad against Brown on Tuesday, FEC reports show. It had $21.8 million on hand on Oct. 18 and has been spending heavily on ads in Tennessee and Missouri Senate races in the last week.

Family Ties Help Kean In Senate Race, Poll Says (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Marjorie Connelly

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican challenger for United States Senate in New Jersey, has capitalized on his father's reputation to offset voters' qualms about his inexperience. Senator Robert Menendez has been buoyed by discontent with President Bush. The result in this heavily Democratic state is an extremely tight race, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

The poll suggests that Mr. Kean, a state senator, has done surprisingly well in a year when other Republicans are struggling even on friendlier turf not because of Mr. Kean himself, but because of his father, former Gov. Thomas H. Kean, one of the state's most popular politicians.

Mr. Kean's commercials attacking Mr. Menendez as unethical and corrupt have also worked, with many voters saying that corruption is the first thing that springs to mind when asked about Mr. Menendez.

Mr. Menendez is widely considered the nation's most vulnerable Democratic Senate incumbent, as the Democrats try to win six seats to take control of the Senate, and 56 percent of his supporters said they would vote for him not because of his views or his character, but because of his party.

Fifty-eight percent of those favoring Mr. Menendez said they are doing so as a rebuke to Mr. Bush, while 68 percent said they want to help swing the Senate to the Democrats.

"I am so concerned about the makeup of the Senate of the United States," said E. Janet Hackbarth, a 67-year-old retired high school teacher in Pompton Lakes, in a follow-up interview after the poll was completed. Describing herself as an independent, she added, "I am voting for Menendez because I am voting against the Republicans."

Over all, the race is a statistical tossup, with Mr. Menendez leading 38 percent to 36 percent among registered voters, and 40 percent to 39 percent among likely voters. Yet neither candidate has generated much enthusiasm, or made much of an impression. More than half of those surveyed said they had no opinion — either good or bad — about the candidates.

As a result, the race appears to be far more fluid than recent Senate races in New Jersey. Thirty-nine percent of registered voters said that they could change their minds before the Nov. 7 election; that figure was 13 percent in a Times poll taken at about the same point during the 2002 campaign between Senator Frank R. Lautenberg and Douglas R. Forrester.

DOJ_NMG_0087075

With the national parties promising to pump an additional $7.5 million into the race in the final two weeks, the race could well hinge on last-minute commercials or surprises. And that could be anything from any developments related to Iraq or the Mark Foley scandal, potentially favoring Mr. Menendez, to conservative backlash against the New Jersey Supreme Court's decision Wednesday to grant gay couples equal rights, potentially benefiting Mr. Kean.

The Times poll, conducted Friday through Wednesday, did not include questions about gay unions.

But if patterns hold, the race will come down to what is essentially a proxy battle: those who are motivated by national issues, and dislike Mr. Bush, versus those who are motivated by local issues, and who look up to former Governor Kean.

Robert Sapanara, 69, a Republican from Ramsey, a northern New Jersey suburb, offered a response typical of those who said that they would vote for Mr. Kean. "I think there's got to be some counseling given to him by his father, and hopefully some of those genes rubbed off on him," he said.

Mr. Menendez's difficulties are noteworthy because no other Democratic incumbent is in as close a race, motivating Republicans nationally to focus increased attention and resources on the race. Of course, the word incumbent merits an asterisk, because Mr. Menendez, a longtime congressman from Hudson County, was appointed in December to serve out the balance of Jon S. Corzine's term when he was elected governor.

Still, Democratic consultants express frustration with the race, because they had not counted on paying much attention to New Jersey in their bid to wrest control of the Senate away from Republicans.

Both campaigns have already spent a lot of money: through Oct. 18, Mr. Menendez spent $9.3 million, and Mr. Kean $5 million, with much of that on television commercials in the last couple of months.

The telephone poll included 1,023 adults throughout the state, 849 of them registered to vote. The margin of sampling error for both was plus or minus three percentage points. In addition, 522 of the registered voters were determined to be likely to vote, and the margin of sampling error for that group was plus or minus four percentage points.

The poll showed that 28 percent of voters have an unfavorable impression of Mr. Menendez, compared with 18 percent with a favorable impression. Mr. Kean is viewed unfavorably by 22 percent, and favorably by 24 percent.

Part of the appeal of Mr. Kean, the poll suggests, comes from his bloodline. Voters said that they were favorably disposed toward the elder Mr. Kean by 52 to 10 percent; 27 percent said they were more likely to view the younger Mr. Kean favorably because of his father.

And what was the first thing that popped into voters' minds when asked about Mr. Kean? The fact that he was a governor's son, according to 33 percent of those surveyed; no other factor had more than 10 percent.

Fifty-nine percent of voters feel that Mr. Menendez, who has spent three decades at all levels of government, has the right experience for the job, compared with 48 percent for Mr. Kean, who has spent five years in the State Legislature.

Voters say that they trust Mr. Kean more, however, with 55 percent saying that he has the honesty and integrity to be effective, and 24 percent saying he does not, versus ratios of 45 percent to 34 percent for Mr. Menendez.

Still, only 36 percent of voters said that Mr. Kean, who grew up in a wealthy family, could relate to the needs of regular people, while 46 percent said he could not. For Mr. Menendez, the son of poor Cuban immigrants, the numbers were reversed, with 43 percent saying he could relate, and 37 percent saying he could not.

When voters were presented with a list of issues and asked to name the one most important in their decision, 37 percent selected the economy and jobs, followed by 22 percent who said Iraq, 15 percent who said terrorism and 14 percent who said health care.

Those more concerned about national issues, with Iraq being No. 1, leaned toward Mr. Menendez; those more focused on local issues, with taxes being No. 1, favored Mr. Kean.

About 80 percent of Republicans support Mr. Kean and 69 percent of Democrats prefer Mr. Menendez. Independents, who make up about 35 percent of voters in the state, divide 36 percent for Mr. Kean to 32 percent for Mr. Menendez.

A classic gender gap also exists. Mr. Kean is ahead by 12 points among men, while Mr. Menendez enjoys a 13-point advantage among women. There is a typical urban and suburban divide, too, with Mr. Menendez faring better in the northern urban areas, and Mr. Kean leading in Republican strongholds like Morris, Somerset and Hunterdon Counties, in the northwestern part of the state.

Of those who said they were undecided, 22 percent were independents, 12 percent were Democrats and 7 percent were Republicans.

By three to one and more, voters also said that both candidates were spending too much time attacking each other; 30 percent said that Mr. Kean was more responsible for the negative tone, while 21 percent blamed Mr. Menendez.

"Both of these people are just slandering each other, getting vicious, spending X amount of dollars, I'm just sick of it," said Georgette Hendricksen, 59, a Republican from Roselle Park, a middle-class town in central New Jersey. " I don't know which we'd be better off with. I'm going to wait until the last minute to decide."

Republicans Gambling Big Bucks On New Jersey Senate Race (NSDY/AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

Long Island Newsday, October 27, 2006

WEST ORANGE, N.J. -- New Jersey is to Republicans what slot machines are to gamblers: irresistible, with long odds of winning.

Gamblers pull the lever, hoping for the big payout. Republicans are sharing the same dream, throwing $3.5 million into the Senate race with days left and banking that GOP challenger Tom Kean Jr., can defeat Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez on Nov. 7.

Menendez has maintained a huge cash advantage over Kean throughout the election cycle and the last two weeks, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has been running $4 million worth of ads against Kean.

The GOP infusion of cash levels the money playing field for Kean but is a big gamble, given that New Jerseyans have not elected a Republican to the Senate since 1972.

"This is a Hail Mary pass by the Republicans ... but it may be their only chance," said Rider University political scientist David Rebovich. "Unless they win New Jersey, they may lose control of the Senate."

Democrats need to gain six Senate seats to win control. In a fundraising appeal Thursday, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., wrote, "We need to hold onto this seat if we are going to take back the Senate."

Said Menendez spokesman Matthew Miller: "The Bush Republicans will do anything to get another vote in the Senate, but they'd be better off gambling this money away in Atlantic City than throwing it behind a sinking candidate with a losing message."

New Jersey Republican Party chairman Tom Wilson argues Kean is not your average candidate. The 38-year-old state senator is the son of popular former Gov. Thomas Kean, who chaired the Sept. 11 commission.

The Kean family is a political dynasty in New Jersey, boasting five colonial governors, two U.S. senators and a congressman. Kean's father served two terms as governor and is still revered by many for his bipartisan style of governing.

"The Kean name is a brand image that people in New Jersey are comfortable with, Republicans, Democrats and independents," Wilson said. "It's the Coca-Cola of New Jersey _ people know what they are getting and they like it."

Menendez, 52, has been tarred by where he comes from _ Hudson County, the home of a host of corrupt politicians. The Democrat has never been charged with any wrongdoing, but Kean has hammered at his ethics, attempting to link him to several convicted officials. Menendez also has been dogged by reports that law enforcement agents have subpoenaed the records of a nonprofit agency that rented a building from him.

Recent polls show Menendez with a slight edge over Kean, and Rebovich said history is on the Democrats' side, since in past elections, late-deciding voters have normally sided with Democratic candidates. But Menendez, appointed to the Senate in June by Gov. Jon Corzine to serve out the remaining year of his term, has never run a statewide race and has had trouble competing with the Kean name.

The campaign said Menendez would get some help next week from former President Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said Republicans were confident Kean could beat Menendez.

"When voters in New Jersey zero in on the choice they have, Tom Kean wins plain and simple," Ronayne said, adding: "New Jerseyans don't have to live with Corzine's mistake much longer."

DOJ_NMG_0087077

Kean began airing an ad Thursday showing his father, wife and two young daughters. But Kean has been careful not to mention his father too often as he campaigns, and the governor has only appeared with him on a handful of occasions.

"It's a delicate balance for Tom Kean Jr.," Rebovich said. "He wants to invoke the family name and use his very popular father but on the other hand, his dad is associated with more moderate political positions and his son has been quite critical of President Bush.

"Kean reaches unaffiliated voters by being critical of Bush but alienates his Republican base," he added.

While conservatives don't always agree with his moderate views on abortion, gun control and the environment, Kean has managed to win their support, said conservative Republican state Assemblyman Guy Gregg.

"We've had trouble in the past with candidates who ran to the center and lost the base, and candidates from the base that didn't get full support from the center," Gregg said. "But the party here has realized we've got a chance and are 100 percent behind Kean."

Conservative Steve Lonegan, who ran for governor last year, argues that there's a lot of apathy among voters now and bundles of cash for Kean won't make a difference.

"I think this race is going to come down to how people feel about President Bush, the war in Iraq and the economy," Lonegan said.

Menendez is banking on that, and has touted his vote as a congressman in 2002 against authorizing military force in Iraq. At an event with Menendez Wednesday, Sen. John Kerry said the war would be the defining issue in the race. Kean has said he would have voted for the resolution but has been critical of Bush and has called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign.

The Massachusetts senator also cautioned voters not to be fooled by the Kean name.

"I knew his dad and I like his dad and his dad has served this country well," Kerry said. "But the last time people voted for somebody because they liked his dad we got 'W'."

Virginia Democrat Struggles To Sway Base (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

WOODBRIDGE, Va. -- Democratic Party leaders hope Senate candidate Jim Webb, a disenchanted Reagan Republican, might draw some crossover votes from the Republican's base of white men.

But with under two weeks until Election Day, a more important question may be whether President Reagan's Navy secretary can energize two vital constituencies in the Democrats' own base: women and minorities. Since entering the race against Republican Sen. George Allen earlier this year, Mr. Webb has drawn unsteady support from both groups.

How he does is key to party hopes. At the start of this midterm season, Democrats took a risk by aggressively intervening in party primaries to identify the strongest candidates for the seats, even if they didn't agree with the party's more-liberal activists and Washington leadership. Their chance to pick up the six seats they need to control the Senate may well come down to whether Mr. Webb, an author and former Marine, can beat Mr. Allen.

Mr. Webb's opposition to the Iraq war prompted him to return to the party of his ancestors and jump into the Democratic primary race. But while his antiwar stance helped him win the party primary, he would bring to Washington a variety of stances that conflict with the Democratic base. Among them, he opposes gun control and is mixed on abortion rights -- he supports Roe v. Wade but opposes late-term abortions, or so-called partial-birth abortions.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

How much attention are you paying to political polls this election season? Cast your vote in the Question of the Day2.

Recent polls show Messrs. Webb and Allen in a dead heat. One reason: They are tied among women -- a precarious position for a Virginia Democrat. The last two Democrats to win statewide elections -- Gov. Tim Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner -- had female gender gaps of six and five percentage points, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0087078

Besides opening a gender gap, Mr. Webb needs to generate enthusiasm among African-Americans. Though the Allen campaign was beset for weeks with questions about his racial sensitivities after he called a dark-skinned Webb aide a "macaca," a racial slur in some cultures, Mr. Webb has struggled to win support. Even as the Allen controversy hung in the air, the Virginia Legislative Black Caucus voted in September to endorse Mr. Webb, but only with a 9-8 vote, with holdouts saying they didn't know enough about him yet to support him.

Reservations in the black community were sparked mostly because he was a stranger in their midst. Caucus Chairman Dwight Jones admits he was taken aback when Mr. Webb's first major television ad in August highlighted his service in the Reagan administration.

"I think it's smart" to reach out to disenchanted Reagan Democrats, says Mr. Jones, "but you have to be able to do it in such a way that you don't ignore the people you are counting on, the ones who never left the party."

Still, the Webb campaign has shown it can adapt fast. Since the summer, it has won backing from the state's lone black congressman, Rep. Bobby Scott, and Mr. Webb has made tours through black communities and churches, and will again this weekend, in Richmond, with Mr. Kaine at his side. This week, he secured the endorsement of Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, the former state governor who is the only African-American to have served in that job.

Not everyone is convinced. Bishop Gerald O. Glenn, head of the New Deliverance Evangelistic Church outside Richmond, says he voted against Mr. Allen six years ago, but has thrown his support behind the Republican, in part because of money the senator fought to get for black colleges and universities. He calls Mr. Webb a "carpetbagger Republican."

Mr. Webb's challenge among women voters is even more complicated. His candidacy was hurt early when the Allen camp drew attention to a nearly 30-year-old article he had written questioning women's ability to serve in combat. Mr. Webb has since apologized for provocative language and noted he expanded the ranks of women in Navy leadership positions while in the Reagan administration.

Ironically, it may be the war that can help Mr. Webb move women voters. In a Wall Street Journal/NBC poll earlier this month3, 71% of women said they were pessimistic about the way things are going in Iraq, compared with 66% of men. In Virginia, with its strong military presence, the course of the Iraq war can affect household budgets.

In a dimly lighted community-college classroom here, Mr. Webb, a former Naval Academy instructor, rolls up his sleeves and asks how many students in the class have friends or family in Iraq. Roughly two-thirds raise their hands.

As the questioning period begins, his second query comes from a woman whose fiancé is in Iraq. She wants to know if Mr. Webb has a way to bring him home. "These guys are living on food stamps and going over there and getting slaughtered," she says.

The next question comes from a woman whose husband heads to Iraq in January, followed by one from a female veteran who has had trouble getting benefits. Mr. Webb doesn't have an answer for them all, but says that if he is elected to the Senate, "the people who serve in the military will have no better friend."

Women, Minorities May Decide Senate Race In Va. (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 27, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A seven-year statute of limitations on character attacks? Three Republican friends considered that idea here the other day as they lamented personal controversies that have all but hijacked a critical contest between Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb, a former Navy secretary.

Joanna Bergstrom, 67, of Vienna cut right to the chase: “If you're going to overlook Webb's comments on women, well, Allen has grown over the years. You should overlook his noose and Confederate flag.”

Webb has been dogged by a 1979 magazine article in which he argued that women did not belong in combat or at military academies. Allen is trying to overcome a past fondness for Confederate flags and pins, the noose he once had in his law office — which he said was part of a Western memorabilia collection — and new questions about his attitudes on race.

The tempests have put women and minorities at the heart of a tight race. Both groups are crucial to each candidate and the outcome could determine which party controls the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0087079

As the campaign enters its final days, the importance of these voters is reflected in mailings, advertising and candidate schedules crammed with events designed to fire them up and win them over. Allen has erased the traditional advantage that Virginia Democrats enjoy with women. Webb, who once opposed all forms of affirmative action, is trying to energize the black voters who make up about 20% of the Virginia electorate.

Among the many surprises in this race is that Webb, 60, a newcomer to both politics and the Democratic Party, has a chance. A Naval Academy graduate, decorated Vietnam veteran and novelist, Webb served as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration and supported Allen for Senate in 2000.

In 2002, Webb cautioned the Bush administration against invading Iraq. Disillusioned by the war and economic policies he calls unfair, he switched parties and entered the Senate race in February as a Democrat. He has four adult children and is expecting a baby with his third wife in December. His son Jimmy, 24, is a Marine serving in Iraq; he campaigns in a pair of Jimmy's combat boots.

Webb won a hard fought primary in June. At the time, Allen had a double-digit polling lead and an 11-to-1 financial advantage. Both gaps have narrowed. Most polls this month give Allen a slight edge. As of Sept. 30, Allen had $5.6 million cash on hand, Webb $2.7 million. Democrats have spent an additional $1.7 million to help Webb.

Allen, 54, a California native who campaigns in cowboy boots, is well known in his adopted state because his father coached the Washington Redskins. He has a relaxed, extroverted style, a 24-year political résumé and a classic GOP outlook. As governor from 1994-98, he cut taxes and abolished parole. He has backed Bush on most issues, but in recent days has called for changes in direction and tactics in Iraq.

This time last year, Allen was in New Hampshire at a breakfast with financial contributors. It was one of two dozen trips he took as he explored a 2008 White House bid.

A series of missteps regarding race and religion, however, have dimmed his national prospects. Allen reacted with anger and clumsy jokes about ham sandwiches this summer when he and the media learned about his mother's long-secret Jewish roots.

In August, he addressed a dark-skinned Webb volunteer as “macaca.” He apologized and said he had made up the word, a racial slur in North Africa, where his mother was born.

That incident triggered reports in newspapers and the online magazine Salon that Allen used a racial slur to refer to blacks when he was at the University of Virginia. Most of the accounts came from former football teammates, among them North Carolina radiologist Ken Shelton. Allen says they are false.

The last two Democrats to win high office in Virginia — Gov. Tim Kaine and former governor Mark Warner — had substantial leads among women as the election neared. But a Washington Post poll this month found Allen leading Webb among women, 49% to 47%.

Allen's wife, Susan, is praising his sterling qualities in a TV ad and at women's events with celebrity guests such as Labor Secretary Elaine Chao and former White House adviser Mary Matalin. “Talk to your girlfriends,” Matalin told about 100 women at a hotel here this month. “They will trust your opinion.”

The hard sell relies on Webb's 1979 Washingtonian article, in which he said many women at the Naval Academy seemed to have “problems with their sexuality” and called a dorm there “a horny woman's dream.” The National Republican Senatorial Committee has sent female voters at least four mailings quoting Webb's assertions.

On TV, meanwhile, three female Naval Academy graduates in an Allen ad say Webb's article was demoralizing and disrespectful. “To imply that we were there for sexual purposes was beyond belief,” said Kathleen Murray, class of '84.

Webb says his language was immature and he regrets it. He says he opened up thousands of opportunities to women when he was Navy secretary. He also says the military is working fine now and women “serve in a broad swath of critical jobs.” One of Webb's ads features testimonials on his leadership from retired female officers. Several gathered at his office recently to endorse him.

“Jim has the deepest respect for everyone in the military today,” said retired Army colonel Kate Wilder, who said she was the only woman ever to serve as a Green Beret. Most military men were “disgruntled” when women arrived on the scene, she said, but “it was 30 years ago. Life has moved on.”

DOJ_NMG_0087080

Exit polls in 2000 showed Allen won 17% of the black vote. If the pattern repeats, state politics experts say, Webb won't win. "The black vote is the bulwark of the Democratic vote in Virginia," says Mark Rozell, a political scientist at George Mason University in Fairfax. "Without a heavy turnout and a high margin, a Democrat can't win."

Allen's baggage would seem to make that easy for Webb. But six years ago in a book review, Webb called affirmative action "state-sponsored racism." Now he supports it, but only for blacks. That position "is not held or articulated by anybody else in the political arena," says Robert Holsworth, a state politics expert at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, adding Latinos and women aren't happy with it.

Virginia's senior black state senator, Democrat Benjamin Lambert, praises Allen in a new radio ad for supporting black colleges, black farmers, the Voting Rights Act and the first black judge on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The rest of the black legislative caucus, however, endorsed Webb.

The 50-year-old Richmond Crusade for Voters also endorsed Webb in what President Melvin Law said was an easy call. Allen's "newly discovered sensitivity" to the black community, he said, "coincided with talk that he might be interested in the presidency."

Webb got a boost Wednesday when Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, an unpredictable Democrat, broke his silence on the race. Wilder, the only black governor the nation has ever elected, said Webb would help the nation turn away from Bush's "misguided" policies on Iraq and the economy.

Rozell says most decisions Nov. 7 will turn on how voters feel about Iraq and the Bush presidency. If they consider character, he says, the macaca incident could be decisive: "Allen did something very recently that raised questions about his judgment and character. At least Webb can say 'this was years ago and I'm more mature now.' "

Wives Maintain High Profiles In Senate Race (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

If Sen. George Allen is the team captain of his re-election campaign, Susan Allen is the head cheerleader.

And while voters most often see Mr. Allen's challenger James H. Webb Jr. out on the stump, both his wife and ex-wife have been rallying support, at times together, for the decorated Vietnam War veteran.

Pundits jokingly refer to the women standing behind their men as the secret weapons in this year's Senate race in Virginia, but voters are noticing their work.

Election Day is Nov. 7.

When Mr. Allen, a Republican, is in Southside Virginia, Mrs. Allen is stumping for votes in Northern Virginia. She appears in campaign ads and in some places is more popular than her husband.

"I've been his sidekick for about 20 years now and have been active in all of his campaigns," Mrs. Allen, 45, told The Washington Times. "I know no other way. George and I have always done this together."

Mr. Webb, a Democrat, is often joined on the campaign trail by his wife, Hong Le Webb, a corporate finance lawyer. She's not used to life in the spotlight.

"I don't think either of us were prepared for the intensity of the process, including the public scrutiny," Mrs. Webb, 37, told Lowell Feld, a blogger who works for the campaign. "We both value our privacy and family time. For the most part, we've kept our family out of the public scrutiny and prefer it that way."

The Webb campaign did not respond to requests by The Times to interview Mrs. Webb or to questions submtted by the newspaper.

Mr. and Mrs. Allen celebrated their 20-year anniversary this year. The Allens have three children between the ages of 8 and 18. It is Mr. Allen's second marriage.

Mr. Webb and Mrs. Webb married in 2005. It is Mr. Webb's third marriage.

Mr. Webb has four children between the ages of 20 and 35 and several grandchildren. Mrs. Webb has a 9-year-old daughter. The Webbs are expecting their first child in December.

DOJ_NMG_0087081

When Mrs. Allen was at the University of South Carolina in the early 1980s, her parents in Charlottesville made sure she cast an absentee ballot for "this cute boy" running for the House of Delegates.

"He won that race by 25 votes thanks to parents like mine," she laughed, recalling Mr. Allen's first political victory.

Mr. Webb met Miss Le in the mid-1990s when they both conducted business in Vietnam. They fell in love a few years ago.

"We started dating while we were separated from our former spouses, and perhaps going through similarly difficult experiences in our lives allowed our friendship to blossom," Mrs. Webb told Mr. Feld.

Mr. Webb, 60, and Mr. Allen, 54, have different styles in involving their families on the campaign trail.

Mr. Allen's speeches, campaign ads and debate comebacks often include the phrase "Susan and I."

"You're the reason why I've gotten elected to anything," the former governor recently told his wife.

For the most part, Mr. Webb has kept his family out of the spotlight, but lately a pregnant Mrs. Webb has been more prominent on the campaign trail.

She recently greeted supporters at churches in Chesapeake, Va., and was lauded by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat who endorsed Mr. Webb, at an Alexandria fundraiser.

Both Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Webb said the ugliness of the campaign has taken a toll on their families.

Mrs. Webb called it a "smear campaign against Jim," and Mrs. Allen said she tells the children to "smile through it all, have a thick skin and a sense of humor."

Mrs. Webb was born in Vietnam but left her homeland after the fall of Saigon. She told Mr. Feld it has not always been easy balancing a career with being a mother, noting it helps her understand the plight of working families. Her mother was the primary breadwinner and her sisters have been entrepreneurs, she said.

Mrs. Allen, who has been involved in tourism promotion and women's health issues, also praised the women in her family as strong role models.

Mrs. Allen blushes when she is compared to first lady Laura Bush.

Recently, President Bush said he and Mr. Allen have something in common: "We're both named George and we both married smart, beautiful women."

Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Bush became friends when their husbands served as governors, and they remain close. Mrs. Bush held a fundraiser for the campaign this week.

Mr. Webb also has the endorsement of his ex-wife, Jo Ann Kruker, who campaigns on behalf of her former husband.

Ms. Kruker told voters in Arlington last spring that Mr. Webb was "born fighting for the American dream," The Washington Post reported.

Defiant Iraq War Foe Defined By Vietnam (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

James Webb will tell you that he is first a writer, with several best-selling novels to his name. He is also the descendant of brave-hearted Scots-Irish who stood up to English kings. He is a husband and father of four.

But above all, Webb is still in his heart a combat Marine. His defining moment came in Vietnam, and he remains loyal to the men he led and the memories he formed there. Once a year or so he reunites with former comrades. At Arlington National Cemetery, he visits the graves of others, often leaving Marlboro cigarettes for his buddy, Snake.

Now, Webb, a Naval Academy graduate who once dreamed of wearing a Marine Corps general's stars, has become a face of the movement against the Iraq war. The man who admired President Ronald Reagan and served his Republican administration as a cocky secretary of the Navy is one of the Democrats' best hopes to wrest control of the Senate from the GOP as he challenges incumbent George Allen.

That this warrior rails against the war is only one of the contradictions in Webb's life, just a hint of the complexities and ironies that make him an uneasy candidate. He has switched from Democrat to Republican and back to Democrat -- first in anger because of President Jimmy Carter's pardon of people who avoided the draft, and now because of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0087082

At 60, Webb, who says he loves writing because of the independence -- "You can sit on a park bench, and no one knows who the hell you are" -- is running for a chamber where there is no anonymity, and people can't switch parties when things don't go their way. Even his good friends question whether he has the temperament to serve in Congress.

"It's no secret that I'm not a person who wears a bridle well," he once said after clashes with his bosses at the Defense Department.

His friends also wonder whether it was Webb's temperament that led at least partially to his writing a Washingtonian magazine article in 1979 about women in combat called "Women Can't Fight" that some female midshipmen say encouraged hostility and sexual harassment.

The inflammatory article has become one of the turning points of the Senate campaign and a key reason why Webb is not enjoying the success among female voters that other Virginia Democrats have, according to a recent Washington Post poll.

The article still resonates. "Now you've got a bona fide war hero -- and I'll never take that away from Jim Webb, because he was a war hero -- and he just lined up every woman there and publicly executed us," said retired Navy Cmdr. Kathleen Murray, a 1984 Annapolis graduate who lives in Norfolk.

Paul E. Roush, a retired Marine colonel, wrote in a 1997 naval journal that Webb's article was "the single greatest purveyor of degradation and humiliation on the basis of one's gender that academy women have had to endure." And several Navy women said Webb's views later resurfaced in his writings, speeches and actions as Navy secretary.

Dogged by the issue during the campaign, Webb has dismissed the article as old news and apologized for its excesses, especially a crack in which he called a dormitory at the school a "horny woman's dream."An Uneasy Campaigner

Webb isn't comfortable talking about the Washingtonian article. He acknowledges that he's not at ease at fundraisers or pressing the flesh in a large crowd, either. That, perhaps, is the most curious contradiction of all.

The man who seems to have accomplished everything he has put his mind to -- officer, writer, Emmy-winning journalist -- sometimes seems to be going through the motions as a candidate.

"My natural personality is not to intrude on people's space. That's just the way I am. And I don't like people to intrude on mine," Webb said, explaining his awkwardness. "I just have to accept that I don't have the persona of a lot of people in [politics]. But, believe me, I wouldn't go through this if I didn't know I had the right answer at the end of this."

Webb says he's driven to run to help reshape national security policies, of which those about Iraq are just a part, by relying more on international diplomacy.

Although Webb received some of the country's most prestigious medals for valor in Vietnam, he often falters while campaigning, standing stiffly in a crowd and pinching the hem of his sports coat until his fingertips turn white. He seldom cracks a smile in public but giggles during an interview as he recalls his delight at seeing his first mango when he was a kid.

Webb entered his first campaign for elective office in February -- remarkably late for a statewide race -- but he had toyed with the idea for years. In 1988, the Republicans approached him to run for the same office. Democratic Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska asked Webb several times to run in the 1990s. "It's not really what I wanted to do," Webb said. "I really love the independence of being a writer."

As war loomed in Iraq, however, Webb became frustrated that few in power spoke against it. Then Hurricane Katrina hit, and Webb had seen enough.

"Katrina was the last straw for me," Webb said. "For some reason, I felt personally insulted for the slurs that were being made against the people who were trapped in New Orleans. . . . Where is the government in this?"

His clumsiness as a candidate remains a frustration for many Democrats, who hope Virginia can tip control of the Senate to their party.

"It's been a campaign that really has been plagued by missed opportunities and a candidate that seems to resent having to campaign," said one Democratic consultant in Washington, who spoke on condition of anonymity so he would not anger Webb.

Webb acknowledges his image as the reluctant candidate but dismisses the criticism. He thinks that his firsthand taste of battle has given him a perspective that too many politicians in his generation lack. Webb also says Iraq is not the only reason he is challenging Allen, preferring to promote populist themes such as the "three Americas" divided among rich, poor and a struggling middle class. Yet his campaign highlights his military rÃ©sumÃ©, and supporters see his candidacy as a referendum on the war.

Webb also won't talk about his son Jimmy's deployment to Iraq, saying the Marine, 24, should not be used for political gain. But Webb works the campaign trail in his son's combat boots, the Marine emblem on their heels.'A Rough Experience'

James Henry Webb Jr. was born Feb. 9, 1946, in St. Joseph, Mo., one of four children. His father, an Air Force colonel, enlisted the day after Pearl Harbor. Webb's mother, Vera, the daughter of a sharecropper, is 81.

James Sr. never pushed the armed forces on his children, but Webb's sister Patricia married into the Air Force. Another sister, Tama, married Webb's Naval Academy roommate. His younger brother, Gary L. Webb, became a Marine helicopter pilot.

Their father, who died in 1997 at age 79, also taught his children not to run from trouble. Forever new kids on another new base, they learned to scrap when they were young.

"That's just growing up on a military base," Gary Webb said. "It was a rough experience."

Jim Webb did better with his fists than his schoolbooks, but he also wrote poetry and short stories. Although Webb later embraced such 20th-century masters as Ernest Hemingway and Graham Greene, the writers who spoke to him early on were journalistic observers such as John Steinbeck and James A. Michener. The latter's "Hawaii," in particular, captured his imagination as a teenager.

"I was living in Nebraska, working in a grocery store, freezing my tail off, and I started reading this book," Webb said. "And, you know, the first hundred pages is lava forming an island, and bugs landing on it. But after that, you started getting into all the different ethnic cultures. It was just fascinating. I read that book, and I said, 'I'm going there.' "

One day he saw a mango at the grocery like the ones in the book, and he had to have it, even if it did cost a day's pay.

"I got this thing, and I brought it home, and I didn't even know how to peel it," he recalled.

His brother said Webb yearned to be a Marine general like Lt. Gen. Lewis B. "Chesty" Puller, the legendary war hero. After a year at the University of Southern California on a Navy ROTC scholarship, he enrolled at Annapolis. Nicknamed "Spike," he had an unyielding reputation, whether in the boxing ring or in the daily trials plebes faced.

Webb graduated in 1968, accepting a commission as a second lieutenant in the Marines at a time when the academy failed to meet its Marine quota because of the carnage in Vietnam. He arrived there in 1969 as a platoon leader with the 1st Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment.

Right away, Webb's cool head impressed his company commander, Michael Wyly. As with each new officer from Quantico, Wyly sent Webb on patrol his first night in the bush. Unlike with other green platoon leaders, Webb's eyes showed no hesitation, Wyly said.

Wyly, a retired Marine colonel in Maine, saw a lot of himself in Webb: Both had a reputation as "difficult subordinates." Wyly said, "He had the guts to come and say, 'Skipper, there might be a better way to do that,' " Wyly said.

One day, while hunting for a Viet Cong weapons cache, the company stumbled into a complex of bunkers, Wyly recalled. A grenade flew from a bunker, exploding near Webb. He charged the bunker and killed its two occupants. When another grenade rolled toward him, he shoved a comrade to the ground and shielded him, suffering grievous wounds himself.

Webb won the Navy Cross, which is second only to the Medal of Honor. He also won a Silver Star and two Bronze Stars and was awarded two Purple Hearts. But the two grenades also sprayed him with steel, inflicting career-ending wounds. Pieces of shrapnel remain in the base of his skull and a kidney.

"Before he went over to Vietnam, he was extremely idealistic," Webb's brother, Gary, said. "When Jim came back, he was much more realistic about people, about issues, about facts."

After Webb's wounds forced him from the Marines, he went to Georgetown University's law school. There he felt the sting of contempt from antiwar classmates and faculty. He also began to write.

His first novel, "Fields of Fire," appeared in 1978, featuring as the protagonist Lt. Robert E. Lee Hodges Jr., who was a Kentuckian like Webb's grandfather and shared his name. The book went against the current of the times, offering a slap at the era of malaise and pacifism that some called the "Vietnam Syndrome." Webb's novel, for all its cautionary asides on bloodshed, teaches that no other experience is as terribly profound as combat.Women in Combat

Battle was so terrible and so profound that Webb says he believed only a certain temperament could survive there -- and only men had it.

Four years after Congress opened military academies to women, Webb wrote in the Washingtonian that "no benefit to anyone can come from women serving in combat." Female plebes were "poisoning" men's study of war.

Webb hit such a nerve that Navy brass banned him from speaking at his alma mater. Male midshipmen who opposed having women in the Brigade took his article as a manifesto; female classmates saw it as a goad to more torments.

Speeches and writings that followed continued to champion the idea that the military had become the plaything of feminists and politically correct civilian leaders and that many senior officers were too craven to do anything about it.

Five years after the Tailhook episode, which involved sexual assaults against dozens of women during a boozy convention for Navy aviators in 1991, Webb argued that the scandal should have been a "three- or maybe a five-day story." He had also characterized prolonged investigations of it as a "witch hunt."

"He's a symbol of holding women back and not accepting us for our abilities," said Lisa Stolle, 50, of Virginia Beach, who graduated with the second academy class to admit women.

In 1984, Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger brought Webb to the Pentagon to fill a new post as assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs. By then, Webb had built a reputation as a conservative pundit, helped lead the fight against Maya Lin's design for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and worked on veterans affairs on Capitol Hill. In 1984, he won an Emmy with the MacNeil/Lehrer NewsHour covering the barracks bombing that killed 241 Marines in Lebanon in 1983.

In February 1987, Reagan tapped him to succeed Navy Secretary John F. Lehman Jr., whose signature achievement had been pushing for a 600-ship Navy. Some wondered whether Webb's temperament fit the job.

"He was very passionate about the things that are his core beliefs," said Seth Cropsey, a deputy undersecretary of the Navy who reported to Webb. "I could not figure out how he could apply that passion to the administrative details of being secretary of the Navy."

A month after taking office, Webb sent a directive that performance in combat would receive greater weight in determining promotions -- a move that some female junior officers saw as putting them at a disadvantage because they were prohibited by law from combat assignments.

"To me, it was kind of an under-the-table way of putting a glass ceiling in place," said Donna Sengelaub, 48, a retired Navy commander and 1982 Naval Academy graduate.

Later, under pressure from Congress, Webb opened more jobs to women, as did the other military branches.

Jeffrey E. McFadden, an academy graduate who worked as Webb's speechwriter, said he admired the way Webb took control of staff meetings with admirals and generals who were years older. But Webb seemed to enjoy most being around grunts and sailors, McFadden said.

During a ceremony, McFadden recalled, Webb watched as Gen. Alfred M. Gray Jr., a Marine commandant whom Webb much admired, decorated Marines for bravery. After pinning the medals, Gray gave each recipient a hard, big-brotherly punch in the arm. When Gray finished, the brash young Navy secretary gave the commandant the same playful sock on the arm, and the crowd of Marines roared in approval.

But Webb clashed with Weinberger's successor, Frank C. Carlucci, and spoke out against budget cuts demanded by Congress. On Feb. 22, 1988, after 10 months, Webb quit. He sent his aide to hand-deliver his resignation letter to Reagan. But he left his resignation letter to Carlucci on the desk of one of the secretary's aides -- a gesture noted at the time for a lack of class.A Tightknit Family

Webb settled in Falls Church and still has family in Southwest Virginia. He has been married three times and has four children: Amy Hogan, 36; James Robert Webb; Sarah C. Webb, 23, and Julia A. Webb, 21. Webb's wife, Hong Le Webb, a securities lawyer, is expecting a child in December. Family members said Webb is close to all his children, but especially to Jimmy, who left Penn State University to join the Marines. He is serving in Anbar Province in Iraq.

In an interview, Jim Webb's eyes welled as he recalled walking Civil War battlefields with his son. But he would not discuss what it is like to be a father whose son is also a warrior.

Tennessee Controversy Shaped By Spin Expert (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — When an advertisement mocking Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. set off controversy in the Tennessee Senate race last week, a question quickly arose: Who was behind the provocative and, critics said, racially loaded television spot?

No Republicans wanted to take credit. When the identity of the producer, Scott Howell, emerged, Democrats quickly pounced on his history of bare-knuckled tactics and close relationship with Karl Rove as evidence of a familiar Republican approach.

And the incident quickly set off a wave of denials and denunciations from Republican officials, including the national party chairman and Senator John McCain of Arizona, who has hired Terry Nelson, another consultant affiliated with the spot.

The advertisement in question suggested a flirtation between a young bare-shouldered white woman, played by a blond actress, and Mr. Ford, the Democratic candidate in Tennessee for the Senate. It was supposed to stop running on Thursday amid complaints that it seemed intended to stir racial hatred, though there were reports that it was being broadcast on some stations.

Associates of Mr. Howell said the advertisement was typical of a media strategist who has in the past manufactured political controversy to win tough races in spite of — or because of — the intense reaction the work so often provokes.

He helped produce the early 2004 advertisement for President Bush that showed a coffin coming out of the rubble of the World Trade Center wreckage. It was immediately criticized by a group of Sept. 11 widows but was later credited with changing the subject of the campaign from economic woes to the president's national security credentials.

In Georgia, Mr. Howell also was a top member of the media team working for Saxby Chambliss, the Republican whose advertisement in the 2002 Senate race accused Max Cleland, the Democratic incumbent and a triple-amputee Vietnam veteran, of being weak on national security by featuring an image of Osama Bin Laden to drive the point home. The spot infuriated Democrats but helped lead to Mr. Cleland's defeat.

Jim Jordan, a strategist for Mr. Ford, said that even if the anti-Ford advertisement was no longer running on television, it might have already helped inspire the core voters that Bob Corker, the Republican candidate for the Senate, will need to win.

"He's having a hard time with his base, and this is the kind of ad the Republicans believe appeals to their base," Mr. Jordan said of Mr. Corker. But, Mr. Jordan said, the advertisement and the angry reaction it has provoked will backfire nonetheless by offending more important swing voters.

Mr. Howell's latest ad says Mr. Ford voted to recognize gay marriage; Mr. Ford, in fact, twice voted in favor of a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex unions. The ad, which calls Mr. Ford slick and smooth, says Mr. Ford wants to give the "morning after" pill to school children, an outright falsehood, according to Mr. Ford's campaign.

Yet if angry voters are looking for a place to direct their anger, they may have a hard time.

Mr. Howell did not produce the spot for Mr. Corker, who has disavowed it. He produced it for a quasi-independent organization that is financed by the Republican National Committee but operates wholly out of the committee's control or direction.

Campaign finance regulations limit how much money the political parties can spend on campaigns with which they coordinate. But they allow parties to spend without limit if they set up committees that operate independent of the party leadership.

Advocates for stricter campaign finance laws say the regulations, a result of court decisions several years ago, do little more than provide a fig leaf for the parties, insulating them from controversy like the one that is now engulfing the advertisement in Tennessee.

Democrats have had their own run-ins with independent expenditure groups, though none as prominent as the controversy in Tennessee.

Station managers in Montana chafed at a Democratic senatorial committee advertisement, produced by an independent group, that featured Senator Conrad Burns using coarse language in discussing local firefighters. Mr. Howell, who once worked for Mr. Rove's direct-mail business in Texas, was hired by Mr. Nelson, who was political director of the Bush-Cheney campaign in 2004. Mr. Nelson was in turn hired by Ken Mehlman, the former Bush-Cheney campaign manager and White House political director who is now chairman of the Republican National Committee, to oversee the so-called independent expenditure operations.

All independent expenditure units are required to sign legal papers promising not to have contact with the campaign that they are hired to advocate on behalf of, and to receive only financial support, not strategic advice, from the national party. Mr. Nelson's firm, the Crosslink Strategy Group, employs as a consultant Chris LaCivita, who worked with the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, the group that produced negative advertisements about Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign, according to the firm's Web site.

Calls to a spokesman for Mr. Howell were not returned. Mr. Nelson, who has agreed to work with Mr. McCain if he runs for president in 2008, also did not return calls.

John Weaver, an adviser to Mr. McCain, said Mr. Nelson would continue as an adviser to the senator despite the incident. But, Mr. Weaver said: "We're pleased that the ad has been pulled down."

The Republican National Committee has said Mr. Howell's work against Mr. Ford was created out of sight of Mr. Mehlman, who did not even know what the spot would look like, when it would run or when it would stop running. And Mr. Mehlman was described by an associate who requested anonymity to share private conversations as frustrated by the process, which has occasionally made his committee responsible for advertisements that he has personally found objectionable.

"It may seem confusing and convoluted that the R.N.C. has no knowledge of these ads," said Brian Jones, a committee spokesman. "But that's the way the law's been written, and we abide by it."

Republican Attack Ad Offends Canada (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

TORONTO, Oct. 26 — A Republican television commercial that has drawn criticism in the United States has also become a political and diplomatic issue in Canada.

"Canada can take care of North Korea. They're not busy," says an actor in the campaign advertisement, against Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democratic candidate for the Senate in Tennessee.

Whatever its intent, the aside is seen in Canada as a suggestion that the country is a free rider when it comes to global security. While Canada did not participate in the invasion of Iraq, it has posted a large portion of its army in Afghanistan as part of NATO forces since 2002. On Wednesday, Michael Wilson, Canada's ambassador to the United States, spoke with an official at the White House, whom the Canadian government declined to name, to officially express Canada's displeasure.

Bernard Etzinger, a spokesman for the Canadian Embassy in Washington, would not discuss the conversation beyond saying, "They took the call and listened to what we had to say."

The advertisement, financed by the Republican National Committee, was pulled from the air on Wednesday after Democrats and the N.A.A.C.P. criticized some of its content as an attack based on racial stereotypes and fears.

In the advertisement, actors in staged interviews speak sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his positions. They include a white actress who says that she met Mr. Ford, who is black, at a "Playboy party." She looks into the camera and says, with a wink, "Harold, call me."

The perceived slight against Canada comes at an awkward time for its minority Conservative government. The recent deaths of Canadian soldiers have prompted criticism of the government's decision in September to increase its deployment by 500 troops to 2,500.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who increased military spending this year, has made developing close relations with the Bush administration a priority.

In the House of Commons on Wednesday, Omar Alghabra, a Liberal member from suburban Toronto, cited the Republican advertisement and asked, "Is this what Canadians should be expecting as the outcome of cozying up to Mr. Bush by the prime minister and his Conservatives?"

DOJ_NMG_0087087

David Wilkins, the United States ambassador to Canada, said Thursday at a meeting in Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, that the ad "certainly doesn't represent the view of the president, or the view of the administration, or the view of most Americans," reported The Canadian Press, a news agency.

Compounding A Political Outrage (NYT)

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

The sleazy way in which campaigns and the political parties use loopholes in the campaign finance laws to evade responsibility for their attack ads is on full display in the Tennessee Senate race. Slick as a leer, pernicious as a virus, a campaign commercial transparently honed as a racist appeal to Tennessee voters has remained on the air, despite assurances from Republican sponsors that it was pulled down.

The ad is directed at Representative Harold Ford Jr., the Democratic candidate for the Senate, who is African-American. It includes a bare-shouldered white woman claiming to have met the candidate at a Playboy party and signing off with a close-up, whispered come-on: "Harold, call me."

The ad, resonating with the miscegenation taboos of Old South politics, may or may not be the nadir in the low-blow salvos now assailing the nation. But it takes the statuette for political hypocrisy as G.O.P. leaders insist they were hobbled by campaign law from cutting off what is clearly their own handiwork. "We didn't have anything to do with creating it," insisted Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee.

All Mr. Mehlman's committee did was finance the ad by way of a supposedly "independent" political shop that serves as a shadow party operation specializing in attack ads on behalf of the Republican candidate, Bob Corker. Mr. Corker eventually criticized the ad as tacky and not part of his campaign, asking that it be killed. But Republican assurances that it was finally off the air after days of damage have proved untrue, according to news reports. The 30-second fiction continued to air like some monstrous G.O.P. orphan.

Strategists from both political parties use the "independent" route of the campaign law for launching sleaze and disclaiming provenance. Voters across the nation are hard-pressed to separate wheat from chaff in the whirlwind of political ads. But one of the few keys they have in figuring out who's responsible for something particularly egregious is the tag line required at each commercial's close.

In the anti-Ford ad, viewers transfixed by the blonde's vixenish sign-off may miss the commercial's only truly enlightening statement, tacked on in quick-talk: "The Republican National Committee is responsible for the content of this advertising."

It sure is.

Does The Code Still Work? (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The Republican Party built its "solid South" in part with an appeal to racism against African Americans and other minorities. Sometimes the message was explicit -- Jesse Helms's mugging of Harvey Gantt in 1990 was perhaps the most blatant example. Usually, though, latent prejudice had to be summoned more subtly, using a code that white voters could easily decipher: I'm on your side. The Democrats are with them . Who you gonna vote for?

Election results in Tennessee and Virginia will give us a benchmark, to use George W. Bush's new favorite word, of how much the South has changed -- and also, by the way, will probably determine whether the Democratic Party pulls off an upset and captures the Senate.

Rep. Harold Ford Jr., the scion of an African American political dynasty, wasn't expected to mount a serious challenge in Tennessee for the Senate seat being vacated by retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist. But with less than two weeks to go, most polls show him in a virtual dead heat with Republican Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga. That Ford is even within striking distance says a lot about how disillusioned many self-described independent voters are with the Republican pooh-bahs in Washington, who have been running the country long enough that they can't credibly blame Democrats for much of anything.

The Tennessee race is drawing national attention, and not just because Ford would be the first African American elected to the Senate from the South since Reconstruction. At issue is a television ad, paid for by the Republican National Committee, that speaks to white voters in the old tried-and-true Republican code -- very cleverly, I must say. If you haven't seen the ad, it's easy to find on YouTube.com.

It has to be one of the funniest, slickest, best-produced political ads of the year. A succession of stupid or shady characters expresses support for Ford, applauding him because he wants to make families pay higher taxes or take guns away from hunters. A greasy guy in dark sunglasses claims Ford has taken contributions from pornographers, but shrugs and adds, "Who hasn't?"

Among the mock endorsers is a blond bimbo -- sorry, but that's the only word -- who squeals, "I met Harold at the Playboy party!" At the end of the ad she reappears, suggesting a certain intimacy as she implores, "Harold, call me."

There you have it: a black man, a white woman, more than a hint of sex. Viewers are left to fill in the blanks, and clearly the hope is that they will free-associate to a word like "miscegenation." Or, if Republicans are lucky, something considerably worse.

Corker quickly disavowed the ad. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman claimed unconvincingly that even though the RNC paid for it, there was nothing he could do to get it off the air. The ad was finally pulled after it became something of a cause celebre.

In Virginia, the situation is more complicated. Sen. George Allen opened the door to a thorough examination of his attitudes toward race and ethnicity with his infamous "macaca" gaffe and his oddly startled reaction to discovering his own Jewish heritage. What reporters found isn't pretty. By now it's pretty much established that, at least in his youth, Allen was something of a swaggering bigot. It doesn't help his cause that as a grown man he kept a Confederate flag in his living room and a noose in his office.

Allen admits making mistakes when he was younger but says he has seen the light and now understands and embraces both the African American experience and his place in the Jewish diaspora. And, to be truthful, his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, has had to explain some antediluvian attitudes about women he seems to have held fairly recently.

But "macaca" was just a couple of months ago, and there was a meanness about the incident that has to make voters wonder. Even if you take Allen at his word that he is no longer the bully he seems to have been as a young man, he sure appeared to be establishing an us-vs.-them solidarity with his all-white audience by stigmatizing a dark-skinned young man by calling him a demeaning name. It was just an instant, but snapshots can be revealing.

The South has changed so much in my lifetime that in many ways I hardly recognize the place -- changed for the better, I should add. But are some white Southern voters still unable to shake that Pavlovian response to the Republican code? We'll have some data points to evaluate on Nov. 7.

Steele Finds Himself In A Purple Haze (WP)

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Cameras rolled and clicked yesterday as Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele strolled off a Red Line Metro train at the Grosvenor-Strathmore station and took his place before the microphones.

His Democratic opponent for the U.S. Senate, the Republican said, was so out of touch with the Washington suburbs' transportation woes he couldn't even locate a proposed link in the Metro system known as the Purple Line. It was a criticism Steele raised in a televised debate the day before.

The only problem: Steele held his media event on the "need for a Purple Line" at a Metro station two stops from where the proposed line would go. It turns out that the Grosvenor-Strathmore station in North Bethesda was part of an old proposal, called the "outer line," that Maryland dropped two years ago. The only path being studied now, the "inner line," would start in downtown Bethesda -- four miles from where Steele stood.

The question of the line's route -- hotly debated in Montgomery County -- came up in a candidates' debate Wednesday in which Steele accused Baltimore area Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin of paying too little attention to suburban Washington's concerns.

Quizzed by Steele about the line's termination points, Cardin sputtered "Chevy Chase," the wrong answer. Steele shot back that Cardin "has no clue" about the region's transportation issues.

DOJ_NMG_0087089

Steele repeated the criticism yesterday, saying he was "quite frankly a little surprised" that Cardin, after 20 years in Congress, didn't know more about a project that would rely heavily on federal funds. A Purple Line advocate, Ben Ross of Action Committee for Transit, said Cardin "wants to build it and forgot exactly where it was going. Steele has no commitment to building it."

Asked why he held yesterday's event so far from the proposed route, Steele appeared surprised. He then said the Grosvenor-Strathmore stop was "convenient and the easiest" site for his travel schedule.

When Steele was pressed, he explained that he was going back and forth to the District. So didn't his Metro ride take him right past the downtown Bethesda Metro stop, the inner line's western end?

"This is where they told me to come . . . " Steele snapped. "I'm not trying to draw any distinction between inner and outer. I'm focused on the Purple Line." Steele was whisked away in a black SUV. Two hours later, two staff members called The Washington Post to say they chose the Grosvenor stop because Baltimore area reporters would be able to find it easily.

Cardin Skips Debate In Charles County (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin last night skipped an NAACP-sponsored debate in Charles County, Md., a day after the Democratic Senate nominee stammered and stumbled during a faceoff with the Republican nominee, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Debate organizers said they had expected Mr. Cardin to participate but his campaign had not made a firm commitment to appear with Mr. Steele and Kevin Zeese, the nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said that a scheduling conflict prevented the 10-term congressman from attending the debate at New Community Church of God in Christ in Waldorf.

"He's campaigning at community events in Prince George's County tonight and has accepted an invitation to debate at the statewide NAACP conference [in Baltimore] on Saturday," Mr. Shur said. "We expect to see Michael Steele there."

Mr. Steele said last night that he would try to adjust his schedule to be there.

The candidates fielded a question about how they would end hate crimes such as the arson fire in 2004 in Charles County in which five white men set fire to more than two dozen homes owned mostly by black families.

Mr. Zeese said racism is still a large part of life for black Americans, and that the problem can be solved only through direct and honest conversation.

"We need to be honest about this big elephant in our living room and face up to racism in this country," he said.

Mr. Steele said he is still viewed as a black man every time he enters a room.

"Talking about it doesn't get us to where we need to be," Mr. Steele said. He also said there are still not enough blacks on corporate boards or running TV networks and major newspapers.

"I don't see us," he said. "We have a long way to go."

Mr. Steele also said the only way to break the cycle of racism is to teach children not to hate.

The debate last night was measured and sober, compared to the one Wednesday.

About 170 people were inside the church, where Mr. Steele and Mr. Zeese also took questions on education, transportation, jobs and the economy, and the Iraq war and foreign policy. The candidates agreed on several issues, including the need to explore alternative energy, cut taxes and modernize the Social Security system.

Mr. Steele suggested a federal-state-local partnership to improve traffic problems that have put a "chokehold" on commuting and other travel from Montgomery County all the way to Southern Maryland.

Mr. Steele said Charles County and the rest of Southern Maryland are often overlooked in political campaigns, so the debate was the first of its kind for the region. "It was important to be here and showcase the people of this part of the state," Mr. Steele said.

Mr. Cardin's name was rarely mentioned, except when Mr. Steele said Mr. Cardin as the House speaker in the General Assembly gutted the state teacher pension fund.

DOJ_NMG_0087090

Mr. Steele yesterday said he was "disappointed" that Mr. Cardin decided not to attend last night's debate.

"Both our teams negotiated with ... the NAACP to host it there," he told reporters at a campaign stop at a Bethesda Metro station. "We agreed to their rules, the format [and] the timing."

Mr. Cardin, who is from Baltimore, stumbled several times during Wednesday's televised debate at NewsChannel 8 studios in Rosslyn.

He was rattled when Mr. Steele said that he was "handpicked" by House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, a Maryland Democrat credited with boosting Mr. Cardin's primary campaign against Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"I won a competitive primary," a visibly flustered Mr. Cardin said. "Kweisi Mfume is supporting me."

Mr. Steele's remark came in response to Mr. Cardin's quip that President Bush "recruited" the lieutenant governor for the Senate race.

The congressman also stammered when Mr. Steele questioned him about the proposed route of Metro's Purple Line, which Mr. Steele used to portray him as being out of touch with the D.C. suburbs.

Mr. Cardin "is rattled and has gone back on their word that they have publicly given throughout their campaign," said Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye. "His campaign [said] they will be at a debate any time, anywhere. This was publicly announced. It was publicly reported. They never asked for it to be corrected."

Last night's debate was widely publicized as the second of three between Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele, culminating Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Cardin has struggled to woo black voters -- the Democrats' most loyal voting bloc -- amid criticism from Mr. Mfume and other black leaders about the party's lack of black candidates at the top of the Maryland ticket.

Mr. Steele, who lives in Prince George's and is the first black elected statewide in Maryland, has the potential to break the Democrats' lock on black voters.

Mr. Cardin, who is white, won the overall primary but lost by large margins to Mr. Mfume in Prince George's County and Baltimore, two of the state's most populous and heavily Democratic jurisdictions that are also more than 65 percent black.

At The Washington Times on Monday, Mr. Steele said he requested that last night's debate take place in Charles County, a rural area that was once mostly white but is experiencing a large influx of black residents. It now has the fastest-growing black population in the state.

William Braxton, president of the Charles County NAACP branch that sponsored the debate, said they first talked with the Cardin campaign a week ago.

"We were under the impression that this thing was going to work out and [Mr. Cardin] was going to be here," Mr. Braxton said. "Initially when we talked, he said they had some scheduling problems they had to work out, and his final comment was that they could not work them out."

The Rev. Willie Hunt, pastor of the church that hosted last night's forum, said he regretted that Charles County residents would not get to see the all the Senate candidates in action.

"So many events have taken place in Prince George's County and other parts of the region," he said. "This Southern Maryland area has not had the opportunity to witness this kind of debate."

Mr. Hunt also said that Mr. Hoyer called him Wednesday. "We talked about the debate, but [Mr. Hoyer] wasn't upset or anything like that," Mr. Hunt said.

Hoyer spokeswoman Stacey F. Bernards refused to confirm or deny that the conversation took place.

"You don't have anything substantive from us," Ms. Bernards said.

Ehrlich Warns Of Voting 'Crisis' (BSUN)

By Melissa Harris

The Baltimore Sun, October 27, 2006

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich, Jr. warned Thursday that a shortage of absentee ballots is "approaching crisis proportions" and asked the state elections administrator to develop contingency plans if more cannot be delivered in time.

DOJ_NMG_0087091

Maryland elections chief Linda H. Lamone acknowledged that some counties had run out of ballots or had yet to receive all they need, with the election 11 days away. But she said more deliveries were scheduled, and described the problems as manageable.

Demand for absentee ballots is high after a push by Ehrlich and others for the use of the paper alternative in the aftermath of the Sept. 12 primary, which was crippled by human and technological errors. A new state law makes absentee ballots available to voters for any reason.

The company that makes Maryland's heavily scrutinized electronic voting machines, Diebold Election Systems Inc., also prints the state's absentee ballots.

Local election directors have warned for weeks that increased demand could create havoc during a tight election timetable.

Meanwhile, some voters are growing frustrated that they have not received their ballots yet -- including some whose travel plans will take them out of state.

This week, the Attorney General's office announced a solution to one of the problems that marred the primary when it advised election officials to open precincts on time even if there aren't enough poll workers to meet state requirements.

No-show election judges caused havoc at some polling places in Baltimore last month, and sate law requires that four judges -- two Democrats and two Republicans -- be present for polls to open. Republican judges are typically in short supply in heavily Democratic Baltimore.

A spokeswoman for the state's Republican Party criticized the attorney general's advice as partisan and contradictory to a previous 1998 letter of advice which stated that polling places lacking the required judges should not open and voters should be diverted to the nearest precinct.

"This about-face from the attorney general can only be explained because we have a Republican governor running against the attorney general's son-in-law," said party spokeswoman Audra Miller. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic gubernatorial nominee, is married to the daughter of retiring Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr.

Two Democratic delegates, Samuel I. Rosenberg of Baltimore and Peter Franchot of Mongtomery County, requested Curran's advice after absent or late election judges delayed voting in about 10 percent of Baltimore's 290 precincts by more than an hour during the primary.

"I was concerned, as were several advocacy groups, that whether by design or by incompetence there could be a reoccurrence of Republican judges not fulfilling their duties and not showing up on time or at all," said Rosenberg. "The purpose here is to prevent efforts to suppress the vote."

In a 12-page letter of advice, lawyers in Curran's office argue that the 1998 decision was based on a law that has since been revised and did not take into account all constitutional arguments.

The letter and opposition to it comes in the final days of a fierce election season with each party reaching for advantages under new election reforms, including the use of paper ballots.

More than 120,000 Marylanders have requested an absentee ballot for the general election.

Ruth Fader of northwest Baltimore County has not yet received the ballot she requested in September. She is leaving on a month- long trip to Florida Sunday.

"How this is being handled is disgraceful," Fader wrote in an e-mail to the Sun Thursday. A democracy says that everyone has the right to vote. So where's my ballot?"

Some jurisdictions have run out of certain styles and are waiting for replenishments from Diebold. Others have enough but are struggling to keep up with requests. Prince George's County elections director Robert J. Antonetti said Thursday that he is missing five or six of his 37 ballot styles and has run out of envelopes in which to mail them. Anne Arundel County elections director Barbara Fisher said she is missing two of 27 styles.

"I've been out of one ballot style for three days," Fisher said. "They start to pile up and I'm praying they come tomorrow."

Mike Morrill, a spokesman for Diebold in Maryland, said that when the company is notified of ballot shortages, it prioritizes those orders for printing. Orders are filled within two days.

DOJ_NMG_0087092

"Almost every county has all the ballots they've ordered including multiple reorders in some cases," he said. "There should not be a situation where there is any wholesale problem."

Morrill also said that 84,000 absentee ballots will arrive in Prince George's County Friday.

Ehrlich raised the possibility of a "crisis" in a letter to Lamone, who responded in a letter that 19 of the state's 24 jurisdictions have received all of their ballots and that the remaining ones will get them Friday or early next week. She said that she ordered Diebold to find other printers to handle the additional requests, which the company agreed to do.

"I have been continuously monitoring Diebold's performance to ensure that everything possible is being done to ensure Maryland orders are being timely and efficiently completed," she wrote.

O'Malley Has Made Enemies For Himself, Allies For Ehrlich (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And John Wagner

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Prominent Baltimore lawyer William H. Murphy usually reserves his powerful rhetorical skills for the courtroom, but this year he's hitting the airwaves to try to sway voters.

"I don't think anybody understands the criminal justice system better than I do, and that's why I'm not voting for Martin O'Malley for governor," he says in a 60-second radio ad that has been airing for weeks in Maryland.

The former judge, a confidant to Baltimore's elite and a lifelong Democrat, has something in common with a number of influential figures in his city: He can't stand the brash young man who became mayor at 36, and now, at 43, is his party's nominee for governor.

Although scores of party insiders adore him, O'Malley's lightning-fast ascent has left a trail of wounded egos and bitter opponents. Several have become vigorous campaigners for incumbent Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., O'Malley's Republican opponent in this year's race for governor.

"Not everybody can be Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm all the time," said Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), an O'Malley supporter. "If you're going to be a leader, you have to have the guts to be disliked at times. To stand up to powerful people for things you believe in and risk criticism."

O'Malley has done that, confronting business owners over plans to redevelop some of Baltimore's blighted downtown neighborhoods and challenging the city's law enforcement orthodoxy over how best to tackle inner-city crime.

In the process, he made an enemy of Baltimore Orioles owner Peter G. Angelos, who was once one of the most prolific supporters of Democrats in the nation but who now has hosted a series of fundraisers for Ehrlich.

His pointed words helped turn two former Baltimore mayors -- Kurt L. Schmoke and William Donald Schaefer -- into outspoken backers of O'Malley's primary opponent, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan. Schaefer, whom Ehrlich has courted for four years, is still brimming with bile. He says O'Malley treated him "like I have cholera."

O'Malley has openly sparred with Baltimore's prosecutor, and three of his former police commissioners have become critics. Murphy has criticized the mayor's crime-fighting tactics, particularly the arresting of people for offenses such as loitering. Murphy backed an O'Malley opponent in the 1999 mayoral race and has done legal work for the Ehrlich administration.

In an interview yesterday, O'Malley acknowledged that he has acquired detractors since becoming mayor, but said that it has been an inevitable byproduct of trying to improve a troubled, lethargic city. "There was a fair amount of confrontation, particularly in that first year, because there were a lot of people pleased with the status quo," he said.

"In order to break through that, I did have to take on some battles," O'Malley said. "Over the long haul, I think people have generally been very fair and patient with me as I've done this job and hopefully grown in this job."

Daniel M. Clements, a Baltimore lawyer, said that although the mayor does "speak his mind, people like that about him. A lot.

"He's not afraid to bring bad news to other people in power, and those people may not appreciate it, but the public finds it commendable."

DOJ_NMG_0087093

O'Malley's popularity among the broader population is indisputable. He was reelected as mayor in 2004 with 88 percent of the vote and has won plaudits for his ability to work with the Baltimore City Council, an unwieldy body with a history of challenging the mayor's authority.

Still, questions about O'Malley's diplomatic skills date to the earliest days of his mayoral tenure, when he first went to Annapolis and asked then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening for $25 million for drug treatment in the city, more than twice what had been budgeted for the entire state. To punctuate the request, he proposed rounding up Baltimore addicts, busing them to Annapolis and dumping them on the State House steps.

"You can't run the risk of being a wallflower down here," O'Malley told reporters at the time. "You've got to be the squeaky wheel."

State Sen. Lisa A. Gladden (D-Baltimore), who called O'Malley "childish and rude" at the time, said he has matured. "He's learned that if you don't work with people, they're going to continue to make life difficult for you," she said.

On the campaign trail, O'Malley said he has "been moving our city to the politics of performance."

"Some people have felt their special interests should outweigh any benefits to the entire city," he said.

It is a transformation that he said has unnerved the city's old guard, including Orioles owner Angelos. It is unclear what incited their disagreement. City Hall officials point to a dispute over redevelopment plans near where Angelos owns a skyscraper. Angelos did not return telephone calls requesting comment.

Neither Angelos nor O'Malley has hidden his enmity. In 2003, as Duncan planned a bid for governor, Angelos threw a fundraiser for him. When the time came to tell guests why he backed Duncan, he turned talk to O'Malley.

The mayor is not "the presumptive heir to the governor's chair," he said. "I think we need to disabuse him of that idea."

Nine months later, O'Malley announced that he would support a new baseball club in Washington. The Orioles could count on fan support, he said, if the team would produce a "good product."

Miller, who is close to both men, says the dispute boils down to two powerful figures with differing visions for Baltimore. "There are certain people who feel the city owes them special concessions," Miller said. "No one has ever accused Martin O'Malley of giving away the store for anyone."

Schaefer, who said he started out as a supporter of the mayor, chalked up O'Malley's early struggles to arrogance, calling the mayor "a big kid who forgets friends as fast as he makes them." City Hall officials said Schaefer wanted to be O'Malley's liaison to the business community and grew frustrated when it didn't work out. Schaefer also feuded with Schmoke, who succeeded him as mayor.

O'Malley, a former prosecutor, also has sparred with State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy. The relationship tanked in 2001, when the mayor lashed out at Jessamy for dropping a police corruption case that O'Malley wanted prosecuted.

"She doesn't even have the . . . guts to get off her [rear] and go in and try this case, and I'm tired of it," he told a reporter. He later apologized, saying he had "allowed my tongue to get ahead of my head."

Since then, O'Malley and Jessamy have traded blame for the city's stubbornly high homicide rate, with O'Malley suggesting that the prosecutor was never fully committed to his goal of reducing the city's murder count. Jessamy, in turn, has become increasingly cozy with Ehrlich and rallied troops for Duncan.

O'Malley has had several high-profile falling-outs with former allies, including former police commissioners Edward T. Norris, Kevin P. Clark and Ron Daniel. His relationship with Norris soured after the commissioner left to serve as Ehrlich's state police superintendent. Norris later spent time in jail for misusing a city police account. Clark was fired amid allegations of domestic abuse. Daniel didn't support the mayor's plans for overhauling the department and resigned after 57 days.

Still, those relationships have left lingering political trouble for the mayor. Norris now hosts a popular radio talk show whose guests have included both Ehrlich and Duncan. Daniel recorded a radio ad for Ehrlich this week, in which he says: "I believe that Bob Ehrlich is a stronger leader, and I think that he would be a better governor."

Winning By Losing (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087094

When, just a week ago, Barack Obama showed a bit of ankle and declared the mere possibility of his running for the presidency, the chattering classes swooned. Now that every columnist in the country has given him advice, here's mine: He should run in '08. He will lose in '08. And the loss will put him irrevocably on a path to the presidency.

Obama's political challenge is to turn his current fame and sizzle, which will undoubtedly dissipate, into something concrete. In physics, it's the problem of converting kinetic energy into potential energy: Use the rocket fuel behind his current popularity to propel him to a higher national plane from which he would eventually move almost laterally to the presidency.

The reasons for running are clear.

First, at a time of ideological weariness, he has the persona: an affecting personal history, fine intelligence, remarkable articulateness and refreshing charm.

Second, this is a uniquely open race. Not since 1952 has there been a presidential election with no incumbent president or vice president running. Right now there is no serious challenger to Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination. The Democrats' quadrennial great white hope -- the young, attractive Southern governor in the mode of Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton -- was going to be Mark Warner, former governor of Virginia. Warner has bowed out.

Third, the country hungers for a black president. Not all of the country, but enough that, on balance, race would be an asset. It is no accident that when, a decade ago, another attractive, articulate African American with no experience in electoral office went on a book tour, he was met not just with rock star adulation but with a loud national chorus urging him to run for the presidency.

The object of affection then was Colin Powell. Today it is Obama. Race is only one element in their popularity, but an important one. A historic one. Like many Americans, I long to see an African American ascend to the presidency. It would be an event of profound significance, a great milestone in the unfolding story of African Americans achieving their rightful, long-delayed place in American life.

Of course there is racism in America. Call me naive, but I believe that just as Joe Lieberman was a net positive for the Democrats in 2000 -- more people were attracted to him as a man of faith than were turned away because of anti-Semitism -- there are more Americans who would take special pride in a black president than there are those who would reject one because of racism.

These are strong reasons for Obama to run. Nonetheless, he will not win. The reason is Sept. 11, 2001. The country will simply not elect a novice in wartime.

During our last great war, the Cold War, no foreign policy novice won the presidency, except for Carter in the anomalous Watergate election of 1976. The only foreign policy novices elected in the past half-century -- Bill Clinton and George W. Bush -- won the presidency during our holiday from history between the fall of the Soviet Union and Sept. 11.

In any circumstance, it is fairly audacious for any freshman senator to even think of the presidency. When freshman Sen. John F. Kennedy began his preparation for 1956, he was really seeking the vice presidency. And, unlike Obama, he had already served three terms in the House, which in turn had followed a celebrated military tour in the Pacific in World War II.

In 1956 Kennedy was preparing for a serious presidential run in 1960. Obama should be thinking ahead as well -- using '08 to cure his problem of inexperience. Run for the Democratic nomination and lose. He only has to do reasonably well in the primaries to become such a compelling national figure as to be invited onto the ticket as vice presidential nominee. If John Edwards, the runner-up in '04 did well enough to be made running mate, a moderately successful Obama would be the natural choice for '08.

Then, if the Democrats win, he will have all the foreign policy credentials he needs for life. Even if the ticket loses, assuming he acquits himself reasonably well, he immediately becomes the presumptive front-runner in the next presidential cycle. And if by some miracle he hits the lottery and wins in '08, well, then it is win-win-win.

He's a young man with a future. But the future recedes. He needs to run now. And lose. And win by losing.

Power Hitter In Texas Energy Deregulation, Top Company Is A Big Winner (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0087095

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

When natural-gas prices dropped this past spring, many Texans breathed a sigh of relief. Ever since the state partially deregulated its electricity market in 2002, utility companies had cited the rising price of gas to justify rate increases. Now it seemed a turnabout was near.

But under the Texas law, what goes up doesn't necessarily come down. Electricity suppliers such as TXU Corp. and Reliant Energy Inc. are allowed to adjust their basic rates if gas prices rise, but they needn't lower rates if gas costs fall. The only force that could push prices down is vigorous competition from upstart providers -- and that has been in short supply under deregulation. As a result, many Texans are paying 15 cents to 19 cents per kilowatt-hour, about double the national average of eight cents.

The stubbornly high electricity bills are one sign of how the state's four-year-old deregulation plan has failed to bring the benefits originally envisioned. Another is the allegation by the state's independent monitor last month that TXU's power-generation unit may have manipulated the market to get higher wholesale prices. The company denies doing this.

Yet Texas is barreling ahead. On Jan. 1, the last limits on what companies can charge the general public for electricity are about to expire. Texas is the first state in the nation to go that far, and its move comes as California, Arizona and other states have pulled back from deregulation.

Deregulating electricity has long been an ardent goal of many in the U.S. and other industrialized nations. Instead of stodgy utilities collecting nearly guaranteed profits and having little motive to improve their efficiency, backers have hoped deregulation would bring innovation and lower prices to an essential sector of the economy. The reality is messier, as consumers fail to take advantage of their new options -- or fail to gain any options -- while clever companies that know how to work the system prosper.

Exhibit A was the debacle in California in 2000-01, when power generators manipulated prices by purposely withholding capacity, among other moves. A combination of scarcity, faulty market rules and outright market manipulation cost the state billions of dollars.

Texas's $27 billion retail electricity market may be turning into another exhibit. Dallas lawyer Steve Wolens, who was a chief sponsor of the deregulation bill when he served in the state legislature, says it should have included a provision forcing retail prices to come down when gas prices do. And he frets that deregulation has failed to produce the kind of entrepreneurs who could transform the market, perhaps because control remains concentrated in too few hands. "What we need is a Southwest Airlines of the electricity business," says Mr. Wolens.

State officials say it's too soon to write off deregulation. Retail prices are beginning to come down, says Paul Hudson, chairman of the Texas Public Utility Commission. Companies say they're making efficiency gains that will help pricing. But critics say consumers have paid hundreds of millions of dollars too much this year because electricity prices haven't tracked gas prices.

The power industry is divided into three parts: generation (turning fuel such as natural gas or coal into electricity); retail (selling the electricity to consumers); and delivery (moving electricity over power lines). Under the traditional system, still in place in much of the world, a single company does all three and its prices are tightly regulated by the government.

Deregulation in Texas involves breaking up companies into three parts -- although the parts can still be united under a single corporate roof -- and freeing prices in the generation and retail parts of the chain. The middle link, delivery, remains regulated. In most of Texas, a state body called the Electric Reliability Council of Texas, or Ercot, operates high-voltage lines in the power grid.

The theory behind the deregulation: Let power generators compete to produce electricity cheaply, let retailers compete to give consumers a good deal, and let everyone deal on equal terms with Ercot and other grid operators. These operators make sure everyone has access to the delivery system.

The problem is that competition in generation and retail has sometimes failed to emerge. If generators can gain a pivotal position as wholesalers of power, they can sometimes control prices, critics say. Meanwhile, many retail customers are sticking with their "legacy" electric company, fearing the unknown and seeing only a small price advantage in switching.

Deregulated electricity markets are hard to police because a company can make windfall profits by exercising market power for only short bursts of time. Electricity can't be stored, and transmission bottlenecks sometimes leave wholesale power buyers with no choice but to turn to a single supplier.

In Texas, criticism often coalesces on a single company: TXU, which owns both the largest generation company in the state and the biggest electricity retailer by number of customers. TXU hopes to add to its generating lead by building 11 giant coal-fired power plants in the next few years, a project that has raised environmental as well as market concerns.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, who is married to Mr. Wolens, is a prominent opponent of the coal-fired plants. She finds problems with TXU's market clout at both ends of the chain. "It's mind-boggling bills are so high," she says. "And now they put forward this audacious plan to build all these coal plants. It's struck a chord."

In the second quarter, TXU earned $497 million on $2.67 billion in revenue, giving it a fatter profit margin than oil giants Chevron Corp. or Exxon Mobil Corp. Under the leadership of Chief Executive C. John Wilder, it has boosted its plants' productivity and rolled out programs to build customer loyalty and improve customer service. It says its profits are the fruit of those efforts.

Mr. Wilder has told investors recently that the fast-growing state needs new modern plants, such as the ones TXU hopes to build, to ensure a reliable supply of electricity. By his calculation, the new coal fleet could throw off profits of $1 billion a year for TXU.

On the retail level, the state has dozens of companies trying to pitch power to the average consumer. But many are struggling. They face high marketing costs to overcome lack of name recognition. Some say they were thrown for a loop by the sudden spike in natural-gas prices late last year, and they still are catching their breath.

The deregulation law established a transition period, starting in 2002 and concluding at the end of this year, during which the long-established retailer in each area posts a benchmark price and is allowed to change it twice a year. Officials call this the "price to beat." Upstart retailers try to offer a discount to it.

The incumbent retailers must justify any rise in their benchmark price by a rise in the price of natural gas, the predominant fuel for power plants in Texas. Last year, when natural-gas prices spiked after Hurricane Katrina, TXU raised its benchmark price to a level based on a index gas price of $11.53 per million British thermal units. Since then, the index price has fallen by about a third to $7.66 per million BTUs.

Once TXU and other incumbents have locked in the higher price, they have no obligation to lower it even if natural gas becomes cheaper. Since 2002, most incumbents have raised their benchmarks on six to eight occasions, but none has ever dropped its benchmark price.

The fall in natural-gas prices this year seemingly would represent a golden opportunity for upstarts to grab market share by offering consumers a big discount off the benchmark. It hasn't worked that way, in part because many companies got caught in a price squeeze last year. They had to keep their retail prices below the benchmark prices charged by the former monopoly utilities, but many were paying far more for wholesale power. Many suffered losses, making them feel less aggressive about pricing this year.

Last year was as devastating as "a hundred-year flood," says Rob Snyder, chairman of Stream Energy. The two-year-old company claims 240,000 customers, most gleaned from TXU's rolls. Mr. Snyder says his firm had a loss of $7 million in 2005 but returned to profitability in April. Even Reliant, an incumbent, "got hurt pretty badly late last year," says Chief Executive Joel Staff.

It takes a big discount to get even a little attention. Amigo Energy, which targets the Hispanic market, currently offers a 16% discount to TXU's benchmark price. On a good day it picks up 100 new customers, says Amigo President Javier Vega.

TXU's response to criticism about high prices is to roll out new pricing programs for loyal customers. The company is permitted to undercut its own benchmark price when it faces a certain level of competition. The "SmartSaver 36" program offers an 8% discount on a contract with a three-year term. TXU also is offering some customers a $100 "customer appreciation bonus," if they stay with TXU throughout 2007.

Pat Wood, a Houston-area resident who is past chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission as well as the Texas Public Utilities Commission, says he's frustrated by customers' unwillingness to change. He calls the benchmark the "dumb" price and says, "I wouldn't even mess with TXU or Reliant." Mr. Wood has switched suppliers three times in 15 months.

Some don't have the option of switching. Don Gateley, who owns a computer-software company, has waited almost five years for competition to come to Jacksonville, his town of 13,800 people in East Texas. TXU is still the only electricity retailer in town. His rates have grown steadily, most recently by 14% in January. This past month his electricity bill for his house and storage buildings ran to more than $300. Deregulation is "an absolute joke," he says. "I'm so sore, I can't sit down when I get my bill."

Meanwhile, the generation part of the market is also raising concerns. By law, no supplier in Texas is supposed to control more than 20% of the generating capacity. The goal is to prevent any one company from cornering the market and driving up prices. But there's no limit on how much power each plant can produce. TXU generated 22% of the power consumed in the competitive market in 2005. TXU's market share is greater in certain places, like North Texas, where many of its plants are located and where it's sometimes hard to bring in power from other parts of the state.

TXU's plans for coal-fired plants will add to regulators' difficulties. By putting efficient, 24-hour-a-day plants in operation and divesting older plants that can only operate part-time, TXU could amass an even more formidable market position and stay within the law. However, if regulators block the new plants, that could lead to scarcity of electricity and push prices higher.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission presumes that there's a problem with market power if a generator controls more than 20% of the electricity capacity in a market area. But the commission has no jurisdiction in Texas because power is generated and distributed within the state.

FERC has become more aggressive after the California energy crisis, when some pivotal suppliers took advantage of their position to push up prices. In 2005, it stripped Duke Energy Corp. of the ability to charge unregulated prices for wholesale power from certain plants it owns in the Carolinas, where it also owns regulated utilities.

In 2003, TXU was found to have engaged in "hockey-stick bidding," in which power is offered in ways designed to raise prices overall. In 2004, investigators at the Texas Public Utility Commission found that TXU had a "measurably dominant" position in the market. Wholesale prices were rising at the time, but the commission didn't reach a conclusion on whether TXU was intentionally causing the trend or exacerbating it because of its size.

This year, Texas hired a new independent market monitor, Potomac Economics Ltd. of Fairfax, Va. In a report last month, Potomac found that TXU "routinely" held back generating supply from the market in 2005 when it logically should have been offered. One reason for withholding supply is to force the grid operator to turn to more expensive plants to fill out its needs. Because the operator typically pays a single "market-clearing" price for its power, such a strategy can allow a power generator to get an across-the-board high price even when much of its supply is cheaply produced.

The monitor's report said TXU was most likely to withhold supply when the market was vulnerable and it had the best chance of turning a big profit. However, it cautioned that there may be a benign explanation for the odd behavior. The state's Public Utility Commission said last week it will investigate the matter. TXU denied manipulating markets. "We strongly condemn any improper withholding of electricity from markets and firmly reject any implication we have done so," the company said in a statement.

California, which experienced similar problems during its electricity crisis, now requires generators to offer power to the market whenever plants are capable of furnishing it.

The Potomac report also found TXU often offered electricity to the state grid operator at prices far above its generating costs, raising "significant concern."

Despite the worries, Texas is pushing ahead with further deregulation on the wholesale side, including lifting price caps on what generators can charge the grid operator. Currently the cap is $1,000 a megawatt-hour, the same cap used in many Northeastern and Midwestern states. Texas is raising the figure in stages to $3,000 by March 2009, the highest in the country.

Texas officials say the higher potential prices should motivate generators to build new plants and, provided there isn't any market manipulation, help consumers. But if new plants aren't built, the higher cap could lead to a windfall to those incumbents that already own generating plants.

Global Push To Cut Greenhouse Emissions (FT)

By Chris Giles In London

Financial Times, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087098

The drive to tackle climate change gathered pace on Thursday as Morgan Stanley, the investment bank, announced a $3bn plan to invest in the carbon trading market amid mounting evidence that some US states are growing more sympathetic to international action.

The moves come just days before a UK government report is expected to propose a huge expansion of the global market in trading permits for carbon dioxide emissions. It will also propose extending existing mechanisms for western companies to benefit from promoting cleaner energy in poor countries.

A bigger market could offer substantial business opportunities. One recent calculation suggests that global expenditure on curbing the effects of climate change could be worth about $1,000bn (£529bn) within five years of action being agreed.

On Thursday, the commercial opportunities were underlined as Morgan Stanley announced its big bet on the green energy market. It plans not only to invest most of the $3bn in buying carbon credits around the world but also to set up its own low-emission energy projects.

The prospect of building an international consensus on the back of the findings of the Stern review appeared to strengthen as Citigroup, the world's largest bank by market value, said in a research note that carbon trading was almost certainly going to become the most important weapon in combating global warming, including in the US.

Certain US states have recently taken steps to establish carbon markets. Seven states in the north-east have agreed a regional move to cap emissions from 2009, while California has set emissions limits.

The UK government-commissioned review, led by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist, will say that the cost of rising concentrations of carbon in the atmosphere far outweighs the cost of acting now to slow global warming.

It reflects the UK's efforts to lead the world towards fresh initiatives on climate change before efforts under the Kyoto protocol run out in 2012.

According to the review, big polluters would be able to cut emissions to the level of credits held, buy new credits in the market or earn new credits by making investments in carbon-efficient technologies in developing countries.

The review team has not been discouraged by the slump in carbon prices in the fledgling European carbon-trading market in April when most European countries said they had not used up allocations. One person close to the review told the Financial Times: "We have learnt a lot from Europe's experience."

A recent International Energy Agency paper suggested that the most important and available technology for reducing emissions would be carbon capture, in which carbon dioxide from burning fossil fuels is pumped underground.

Swamped by a Flood of Criticism

It's been a bad week for the Swedish rock band the Ark, which was forced to cancel appearances in Boston and New York after a tasteless joke sparked a diplomatic incident.

The glam-rock band kicked off a U.S. tour Sunday with an outdoor concert at Sweden's new embassy in Georgetown. Lead singer Ola Salo saw a plane approaching Reagan National Airport and told the audience, "In this country, you don't know where those planes are headed" -- then cracked it was going in the "right direction . . . the White House." The fallout was fast and furious: Salo apologized, Sweden's ambassador Gunnar Lund apologized, and the remark has been front-page news all week in Sweden.

To make matters worse, the band's U.S. work permits expired -- a spectacularly ill-timed coincidence, said manager John Gray. The musicians had permission to perform at the embassy Sunday, but planned to fly back to Sweden, get the proper paperwork and fly to Boston in time for Tuesday's gig. Salo's joke caused such an uproar that they hid out in New York for two days before flying home, and finally got the permits yesterday at the U.S. Embassy in Stockholm -- along with a short reprimand.

The band released a statement later in the day in which Salo admitted he "couldn't resist making a joke," but insisted it was not a political statement. "I'm used to the situation in Sweden, where we have a tradition of mocking authority. It was a totally unserious way of being cheeky toward the White House."

DOJ_NMG_0087099

The band headed back to the United States and will resume the tour tomorrow in Chicago. Says Gray: "It's been a bad week, but I think everyone learned a lesson."John Ashcroft, Ready to Sing For His Country

One lesson gleaned from John Ashcroft 's new book: Making fun of his singing is so not cool. In his new memoir, "Never Again," Ashcroft writes about the challenges he faced as attorney general after Sept. 11 -- including the time he went on David Letterman's show.

The talk show host spent weeks in early 2002 making mirth of a video clip in which the AG sang his own composition, "Let the Eagle Soar," in a strong, clear tenor. Letterman then coaxed Ashcroft onto his show to talk about the Patriot Act -- and by the way, maybe sing a song? Ashcroft writes that he was suspicious of Letterman's nice-guy act and wondered if singing "would expose the office to ridicule." (He eventually agreed to play "Can't Buy Me Love" on the piano instead.)

So it was with some timidity that we approached Ashcroft on Wednesday at his book party, hosted by the National Music Publishers' Association. Any chance the Singing Senators -- his old group with Trent Lott , Larry Craig and Jim Jeffords -- might get back together? Ashcroft smiled warmly. "I hope so! I think that Washington needs more singing these days."

Goodbye Notes for Ambassador Ourisman

"Call Me Madam," the Sequel: In 1949, Harry Truman appointed Washington "hostess with the mostest" Perle Mesta as U.S. minister to Luxembourg, and Irving Berlin wrote "Call Me Madam" for Ethel Merman in her honor. Yesterday, newly minted Ambassador Mary Ourisman -- heading off to Barbados in four days -- was sent off with a musical tribute by longtime gal pals Wilma Bernstein, Ann Hand and Marlene Malek. The party at the Georgetown Club included a performance of patriotic songs and the presentation of a U.S. flag that flew over the Capitol on Oct. 11, the day she was sworn in.Surreal Estate

SELLERS: Joe Wilson and Valerie Plame

ASKING PRICE: $1.995 million

DETAILS: Washington's high-security-clearance fun couple may not be much longer for this town. Three years after he got into a WMD scrap with the White House and she was unmasked as a spy, the couple are selling their home in D.C.'s Foxhall neighborhood. The five-bedroom Colonial (which they bought new in '98 for $735K) boasts 10-foot ceilings and stunning monument views. Listed for the first time last week at $2.2 million, the price has already dropped slightly, according to their agent's Web listings. Where to now? Wilson didn't return calls, but Roll Call heard whispers they're considering a move to Santa Fe, N.M.

In 'Sing,' A Trio Whistles Dixie (CSM)

By Peter Rainer

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

You could say that "Dixie Chicks: Shut Up & Sing" is a terrific music documentary, but who would think of it in those terms? That's like saying "Bowling For Columbine" is a great movie about guns.

Actually, it's unfair to invoke Michael Moore here, since the directors of "Dixie Chicks," Barbara Kopple and Cecilia Peck, don't wear their agenda on their sleeves. They straight-forwardly document what happened to the Chicks after lead singer Natalie Maines told her cheering London audience in March 2003 that she was "ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas."

Once the press picked up her comment, the group became country music pariahs and their bookings dwindled. Ms. Maines's remark particularly galled many of her hard-core fans because it was uttered outside the US. The biggest-selling female group of all time has been gamely fighting back ever since.

Kopple, who has directed two documentary masterpieces, "Harlan County, U.S.A." and "American Dream," and Peck, who produced Kopple's 2002 TV documentary "The Hamptons" and is Gregory Peck's daughter, astutely capture how the Chicks attempted both to make nice and stand fast.

DOJ_NMG_0087100

From the get-go, Maines never backs down from her statement. The other Chicks, Martie Maguire and Emily Robison, clearly wished Maines had kept silent, but they support her throughout.

I suppose one could put a cynical spin on their steadfastness - why break up the band and lose all that moolah? - but that's not how it comes across. These women obviously care a lot about one another, and they have families and children who are just as much a part of their lives as their music.

They even seem to enjoy the controversy, posing near-nude for an Entertainment Weekly cover as if to tell the rabble-rousers, "You still like looking at us, don't you?"

The filmmakers had impressive access to the group, and the results are eye-opening. When Maines receives a highly credible death threat days before a concert, we see how the situation is handled - and its effect on her. In a hotel suite, Maines watches Tom Brokaw on television questioning President Bush about her statement in London, then launches into a diatribe that makes her London dig seem tame.

This movie brings out the irony that Maines's in-your-face spiritedness - so integral to the Chicks' appeal - pushes her to say things that end up turning off longtime fans. You can't have one Maines without also having the other. The film may be subtitled "Shut Up & Sing," but you can't sing with your mouth closed. Grade: A-

South Korea made its first concrete move Thursday to enforce U.N. sanctions imposed on North Korea for its nuclear test, saying it will ban officials from the communist country who fall under a U.N. travel restriction and control financial transactions between the rivals.

Meanwhile, a South Korean Defense Ministry report underscored the lingering threat posed by the North, saying the regime is believed to have enough plutonium to make as many as seven nuclear bombs. The North is also working to make a small, lightweight nuclear warhead that can be carried by ballistic missile, according to the report released by an opposition lawmaker.

The U.N. resolution, passed in response to the North's underground nuclear blast on Oct. 9, seeks to ban the country's weapons trade and calls for North Korean ships to be searched for suspected illegal materials. The resolution asks all member countries to state how they plan to implement the sanctions within 30 days of its Oct. 14 adoption.

Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok said Seoul would ban some North Korean officials from traveling to the South and control transactions and remittances related to inter-Korean trade and investment with Pyongyang, the South's Yonhap news agency reported.

It was unclear how tough the South will be in enforcing the restrictions. Seoul had been hesitant to take strong measures to support the sanctions, mindful of North Korea's massive armed forces poised at the border, its family and cultural ties, and its wish to expand economic relations with its neighbor.

Also at issue was whether South Korea would expand its participation in a U.S.-led drive to interdict North Korean ships and aircraft suspected of carrying weapons of mass destruction or related material.

On Friday, South Korea's foreign minister — the next U.N. secretary-general — was to visit China, as Seoul and Beijing ponder how to sanction North Korea over its first-ever nuclear test.

Ban Ki-moon was scheduled to meet Chinese President Hu Jintao and other officials.

The visit is part of Ban's tour of the five permanent member countries of the U.N. Security Council following his election earlier this month as the next U.N. chief, but his discussion in Beijing will also cover the North Korean nuclear issue, his ministry said.

South Korea has been reluctant to participate fully in the Proliferation Security Initiative because of concerns it could lead to clashes with North Korea and undermine efforts to persuade the communist state to give up its nuclear ambitions through diplomacy.

Still, Seoul's announcement is certain to be welcomed in Washington, where Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday urged South Korea to show "a strong commitment" to the sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0087101

On Wednesday, Pyongyang warned that any move by the South to impose trade, travel and financial sanctions would be seen as a "declaration of confrontation" that would elicit "corresponding measures" from the North. It also said sanctions could cause a breakdown in inter-Korean relations.

"If North-South relations collapse due to reckless and imprudent sanctions against us the South Korean authorities will be fully responsible for it and will have to pay a high price," said a statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

South Korea rejected the North's warning Thursday.

"If North Korea is concerned about the future of Korean people, it should not aggravate the situation any more (and) return immediately to the six-party talks," the Unification Ministry said, referring to negotiations among the two Koreas, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia aimed at resolving the nuclear standoff.

The South Korean Defense Ministry report on the North's nuclear capabilities was based on a meeting of top military officials a day after the North's test.

The report says the North is believed to have extracted 110 pounds of high-grade plutonium, enough for up to seven nuclear weapons. The North can use its Russian-made bombers to drop the bombs, the ministry said, adding that the North has 82 Il-28 bombers at bases in Uiju and Jangjin.

North Korea also has built a nuclear warhead weighing some two to three tons. To be mounted on a missile, the warhead would need to be less than a ton, the ministry said.

The North stunned the world in 1998 by firing a long-range ballistic missile over Japan into the Pacific. It also test-fired seven missiles in July, including a long-range missile believed capable of reaching the U.S. that crashed shortly after launch.

Meanwhile, a Japanese Foreign Ministry official said Japan wants a meeting with the U.S. and South Korea as soon as possible to solidify a common stance on the North Korean nuclear standoff. Their foreign ministers met in Seoul last week.

"Of course it's quite important to consolidate the three nations on the issues," the official said on condition of anonymity, citing ministry protocol. "It's important for us to have such meetings as soon as possible."

Also Thursday, a leading international think tank warned of a looming humanitarian crisis in North Korea, saying more people could try to flee amid increased isolation and food shortages.

The Brussels-based International Crisis Group urged regional governments to improve their treatment of more than 9,000 North Korean refugees in the region.

"There's a very real possibility that the nuclear crisis will be followed by a humanitarian crisis," said Peter Beck, head of the group's Seoul office. "The more belligerent the North is, the less the world wants to help them, no matter how much you try and separate politics from humanitarian issues."

S. Korea Moves On Sanctions As N. Korea Issues Warning (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 27, 2006

SEOUL — South Korea made its first concrete move Thursday to enforce United Nations sanctions imposed on North Korea for its nuclear test, a government minister said.

Unification Minister Lee Jong Seok said Seoul would ban officials from the communist country who fall under a U.N. travel restriction and control financial transactions between the Koreas.

It was unclear how tough the South would be in enforcing the restrictions. Seoul had been hesitant to take strong measures because of concerns over North Korea's massive armed forces poised at the border, family and cultural ties between the two Koreas and the South's wish to expand economic relations with its neighbor.

Also at issue: whether South Korea would expand its participation in a U.S.-led drive to intercept North Korean ships and aircraft suspected of carrying weapons of mass destruction or related material. U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has accused the North of proliferating weapons technology.

On Wednesday, the government in Pyongyang warned that any move by the South to impose trade, travel and financial sanctions would be seen as a "declaration of confrontation" that would elicit "corresponding measures." It also said sanctions could cause a breakdown in inter-Korean relations.

"If North-South relations collapse due to reckless and imprudent sanctions against us, the South Korean authorities will be fully responsible for it and will have to pay a high price," said a statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

Sanctions Don't Dent North Korea-China Trade (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

SANHE, China, Oct. 25 — At the isolated border crossing in this small Chinese town, no one noticed when North Korea conducted its nuclear test in an underground mine about 90 miles away. Nearly three weeks later, no one seems to have noticed the recent United Nations sanctions against North Korea, either.

Truckers carrying goods into North Korea across the sludge-colored Tumen River say inspections are unchanged on the Chinese side. Customs agents rarely open boxes here or at two other border crossings in this mountainous region, truckers and private transport companies say.

Nor are any fences visible, like the barrier under construction near China's busiest border crossing at the city of Dandong. There were early reports that inspectors in Dandong were at least opening trucks for a look, but so far statistics and anecdotal reports in the Chinese news media indicate that, essentially, everything remains the same.

What is visible here, though, is the growing and, in some ways, surprisingly complicated trade relationship between China and North Korea. China remains North Korea's most important aid donor and oil supplier, but, conversely, China is now importing growing amounts of coal and electricity from North Korea. Chinese entrepreneurs, meanwhile, are starting to buy shares in North Korean mining operations and, in one case, trying to gain access to the Sea of Japan by leasing a North Korean port as a potential shipping hub.

The upswing in Chinese economic activity — which is already raising questions about whether the intent is more strategic than commercial — is one of the reasons that China has sent mixed signals about how aggressive it will be in inspecting border trade to meet the United Nations sanctions. For now, at least, some truckers in this region say the only change in border inspections has come on the North Korean side, where customs agents are checking loads more carefully for items deemed contraband by Kim Jong-il's government.

DOJ_NMG_0087103

"We used to sit with North Koreans that we know and have a chat," said Jiang Zhuchun, a trucker waiting to cross into North Korea on Tuesday afternoon. "But after the nuclear test, we are only allowed to sit alone in our trucks."

The United States has praised China for approving the sanctions against North Korea, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice used her visit to Beijing last week to emphasize the common desire to restart diplomatic talks on North Korea's nuclear program. China's leaders are said to be deeply angered over the nuclear test and have signaled they may take a harder line against their longtime ally. Last week, some banks in Dandong froze certain accounts and financial transactions with North Korea.

But the question of inspections along the 866-mile border between China and North Korea is a different matter. The sanctions authorized countries to inspect cargo entering and leaving North Korea and barred the sale or transfer of material that can be used to make nuclear weapons. Yet the sanctions are still less than two weeks old, and some details have still not been worked out. For example, the sanctions ban luxury goods without defining them.

The United States wants tightened border inspections by China as a tool for squeezing the North Korean economy and ensuring that North Korea cannot buy or sell nuclear materials. China is worried that destabilizing North Korea could begin an exodus of refugees and has resisted changing inspections. This week, with rumors swirling about a possible border crackdown, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said China intended to comply fully with the sanctions, but also said inspections along the border would remain "normal."

The Yanbian Korean Autonomous Region, the name of the sprawling district that includes the Sanhe border checkpoint, is not the primary trade route between China and North Korea; Dandong, with its more direct route to Pyongyang, the North's capital, is by far the busiest. But the Yanbian area is wedged into a geopolitical hotspot where China, North Korea and Russia all come together.

In interviews and visits to three crossings from Yanbian into North Korea, truckers, transportation company agents, investors and others confirmed without exception that trade is continuing across the border much as it always has. Customs agents examine bills of lading but usually open shipments only when they are tipped in advance to someone trying to smuggle goods like beer or liquor without paying customs duties, several people said.

"No matter who you talk to, they will tell you there is not much difference," said Jin Lanzhu, whose trading company is one of the largest in the region.

On Wednesday morning inside the Chinese customs yard in the border city of Tumen, small groups of North Koreans, each wearing their mandatory pins with images of either North Korean leader Kim Jong-il or his father, Kim Il-sung, waited to cross the bridge. They had nylon sacks stuffed with shoes and clothes, television sets, a refrigerator. Some carried bags of rice.

"How many bags do you have?" asked a female Chinese customs agent in a blue uniform. She looked them over and walked away without opening any. She did forbid the North Koreans to take several boxes of fruit because of a problem with worms. Then, the men began loading the sacks onto a flatbed truck operated by the customs office to carry smaller loads to the North Korean side. Two North Korean women complained to a local taxi driver that they had to pay 400 yuan, or about $50, for the service.

"They don't really check over here," one North Korean woman said of Chinese customs. "They do on the North Korean side."

A similar scene unfolded later in the day at a smaller crossing in the dingy town of Kaishan, where the customs port is so small that trucks take a dirt road to a crumbling checkpoint. On Wednesday, a young soldier watched laborers load about 150 used televisions and boxes of medicine into a North Korean truck that had crossed the river to collect the shipment.

"I'm here for security," the soldier said.

Trade between China and North Korea has grown rapidly in recent years — as has North Korea's trade deficit with China, in part, because China no longer appears to be selling oil at a subsidized rate. China now accounts for almost 40 percent of North Korea's total foreign trade; bilateral trade has more than doubled to $1.1 billion in 2005 from $490 million in 1995. In Yanbian alone, trade with North Korea jumped 82 percent in 2004 and another 20 percent in 2005, according to a local newspaper account.

DOJ_NMG_0087104

Divining what the increased traffic says about the state of North Korea's economy is a subject of debate. New research and interviews in the Yanbian region suggest that North Korea, a country that regularly suffers blackouts, is now exporting growing amounts of coal, minerals and even electricity to China, which is hungry for energy and raw materials. In exchange, North Korea is no longer importing as much raw material and machinery as it had in the past.

Instead, North Korea is importing food, clothes, daily sundries, outdated televisions and appliances and, of course, oil. The trend could suggest that North Korea's recent experiments with private markets may be expanding, some analysts said.

A recent study by the Nautilus Institute, a San Francisco-based research group, used customs statistics to describe the trend, but also concluded that it might indicate that North Korea's nonmilitary manufacturing industries were in sharp decline. One Chinese investor in a North Korean coal mine agreed. "They seemed to have stopped the factories," said the investor, who asked not to be identified. He said doing business with North Korea was very risky and cautioned that numerous Chinese businessmen had lost money. "There are zero guarantees and protections."

Even so, Chinese entrepreneurs and companies, both private and state-owned, are starting to buy interests in North Korean mines to export raw materials. The amount of investment is not clearly defined, but different Chinese proposals call for building truck routes between inland trade centers in northeast China to the North Korean coast, according to Chinese media accounts.

A Chinese property developer, Fan Yingsheng, told the Chinese news media that despite the nuclear test, he was still pursuing plans to develop the North Korean port of Rajin into a shipping center for goods from China. He said he would soon fly to Pyongyang to sign a final agreement.

The flurry of Chinese activity has not gone unnoticed by South Korea and others in the region, analysts say. Like China, South Korea has resisted harsh economic sanctions and refused to shut down its own trade deals with North Korea in part because of concerns about a swift collapse of the North Korean government. But South Korea is also positioning itself, to some degree against China, to be the dominant player in the future of North Korea.

China, meanwhile, has said the activity is not strategic positioning but natural economic outgrowth for a booming, entrepreneurial economy in need of resources. Li Dunqiu, a North Korea specialist with a research institute under China's State Council, or cabinet, recently wrote that "laws of the market economy" were the driving force in Chinese investment in North Korea.

Along the border, it is easy to see how the daily traffic from China is a lifeline for North Korea. One woman from Yanbian said her family had recently come across to buy rice and other essentials. But Mr. Jin, the owner of the trading company, said charity was not at the essence of China's trade with North Korea.

"The business interest is the most important thing," he said. "Helping them comes after that." Then, pausing to reflect on the potential and perils of trading with North Korea, he added: "North Korea is just like China in the past. It is a blank sheet of paper. You can draw wherever you want to. The question is whether the paper is going to be there at all times for you to draw on."

Six-party Talks Only Route For US Dialogue With North Korea: Hill (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 26, 2006

Stalled six-party talks have to restart for the US to talk to North Korea, following the isolated regime's nuclear test earlier this month, US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Thursday.

"The North Koreans haven't expressed an interest in having a dialogue with anyone really," Hill told reporters on the sidelines of a meeting of Pacific Island Forum countries in Fiji.

"We've made very clear that if they come back to the (six-party) process, we're certainly prepared to talk to them directly," he said.

Hill was asked about calls for the US to engage in direct dialogue with Kim Jong-Il's regime following the October 9 declared nuclear test.

But Hill said the six-party agreement was very important to the US, because it ensured a united stand by countries in the region over North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

North Korea's nuclear test caused a global uproar with the UN Security Council issuing a resolution imposing economic sanctions aimed at curbing Pyongyang's weapons program.

DOJ_NMG_0087105

Threats by Pyongyang against South Korea over adopting sanctions imposed after the test flew in the face of Seoul's clear undertaking to follow the resolution "to the letter", said Hill, who has responsibility for East Asian and Pacific affairs.

North Korea needed to understand UN Security Council resolutions were binding on everyone, he said.

"North Korea needs to take some time to think about this, and get themselves back to the table and back to what the United Nations has demanded that it do," he said.

North Korea pulled out of the six-nation talks in November last year in protest at financial sanctions imposed by Washington against Pyongyang for alleged money-laundering and counterfeiting.

Aside from the US and North Korea, the other nations involved in the talks are China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

Returning to the talks is one of the key planks of the UN Security Council resolution imposed against North Korea for conducting its nuclear test.

Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Wednesday his country should reopen the debate on whether to develop a nuclear weapon capability in light of the North Korean programme.

"We need to discuss once again why Japan came to decide not to possess nuclear arms," Aso told a parliamentary foreign affairs committee.

"On the assumption that North Korea really owns nuclear arms now, the situation in the Far East has changed drastically.

"We should discuss if Japan can stay as it is."

But Hill said Japan's non-nuclear policy remained intact.

Hill recently travelled with US Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice to Japan and South Korea, following the North Korean test.

"We understand from the Japanese that they have had no change in their policy against developing, importing or using nuclear weapons, so there is no change in Japan," he said.

"Proliferation of that kind is something we all need to be concerned about, it's one of the reasons why Secretary of State Rice wanted to get out there to assure our allies that the US is prepared to use all our deterrent capability if South Korea or Japan is threatened."

Reworked Device A Few Months Off, U.S. Analysts Say (WT)

By Anju S. Bawa

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

North Korean scientists will only need a few months at most to correct technical problems connected with the Oct. 9 test of the country's first nuclear device, U.S. analysts estimate.

U.S. government and private analysts are still trying to gauge the effectiveness of the test, which sparked global condemnation and a drive to impose new sanctions on the isolated Northeast Asian state.

"North Korea's nuclear test was a partial success," said David Albright, a former inspector for the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, and president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security. "They will fix the problem, and maybe try again."

U.S. intelligence officials have confirmed the explosion was a nuclear device, but basic questions about the test remain. Pyongyang reportedly told Chinese officials before the test that it would be a 4-kiloton blast, but the actual measured explosion was estimated at less than 1 kiloton.

The smaller blast suggests a problem with the chain reaction, Mr. Albright said at a forum on the North Korean nuclear program at Johns Hopkins University earlier this week. "It blew apart before [the] optimal time."

The most likely cause of the failure was a component that initiates the chain reaction that produces the explosion, Mr. Albright said.

Frank N. von Hippel, a nuclear physicist and professor of public and international affairs at Princeton University, said a successful nuclear blast requires an intricate sequence of events that must be timed perfectly for complete detonation.

"There are lots of things that could have gone wrong," he said in a phone interview. The timing may have been off, or something else could have started the chain reaction, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0087106

Daryl Kimball, executive director of the D.C.-based Arms Control Association, said the test could have developed problems even before the chain reaction started, owing to the poor quality of the plutonium used or faults with the detonators.

"We can't say what was the cause or what the device was expected to do," Mr. Kimball said.

It also is not clear exactly how much the North Koreans expected the device to yield, analysts said.

"We don't know what they meant when they said 4 kilotons. They may have meant 4 to 10 kilotons," Mr. Albright said. By comparison, the nuclear bomb dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, in 1945 was 20 kilotons.

All of the U.S. analysts agreed that it would take the North Koreans only a few months to fix these types of problems.

It is possible that a crude 4-kiloton nuclear device can be carried by North Korea's Nodong missile, Mr. Albright said. Such a missile could easily reach U.S. allies Japan or South Korea and "threaten American assets" in the region.

He estimated that North Korea has enough weapons-grade plutonium to make between four and 13 nuclear weapons.

Mr. Kimball said the North Koreans "learned a lot from the test, even if it did not detonate fully."

"This was a political test. Whether it performed exactly as designed or not, the world now knows North Korea has nuclear weapons," he said.

In '97, U.S. Panel Predicted A North Korea Collapse In 5 Years (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — A team of government and outside experts convened by the Central Intelligence Agency concluded in 1997 that North Korea's economy was deteriorating so rapidly that the government of Kim Jong-il was likely to collapse within five years, according to declassified documents made public on Thursday.

The panel described the isolated and impoverished country as being on the brink of economic ruin and said that "political implosion stemming from irreversible economic degradation seems the most plausible endgame for North Korea." The majority among the group argued that the North's government "cannot remain viable for the long term" and could fall within five years.

Nearly a decade later, the assessment has not been borne out, and its disclosure is evidence of past American misjudgments about the internal dynamics of North Korea's closed society. American intelligence agencies still regard North Korea as among the toughest of intelligence targets and have made little progress inserting human spies into the country to steal secrets about the government.

The assessment was produced by a group that included senior intelligence analysts, Pentagon war gamers and independent academic experts. It was made public on Thursday by the National Security Archive, a research group.

"Conventional wisdom was completely wrong," said Ambassador Wendy Sherman, who during the late 1990s was the Clinton administration's coordinator for North Korea policy. "People constantly underestimated the staying power of the North Korean regime."

The North Korean economy has stabilized in recent years, in part because of a sustained humanitarian aid campaign carried out by the country's neighbors, especially China and South Korea. Today, there is less belief in Washington that Mr. Kim could lose his grip on power because of an economic collapse within the country.

The documents released Thursday chart a pattern of growing concern about North Korea's economic crisis during the second half of Bill Clinton's presidency.

The belief that the North Korean economy was collapsing helped shaped White House thinking in 1994 when it promised to deliver light-water nuclear reactors to North Korea by 2003 in exchange for Pyongyang's halting its covert nuclear weapons program. Senior Clinton administration officials said privately at the time that they did not expect Mr. Kim's government to be in power by the time the United States had to make good on its pledge.

By early 1997, according to another document released Thursday, the C.I.A. had concluded that North Korea "cannot reverse its economic fortunes without sweeping reform that would take time to produce results that could unleash destabilizing forces."

DOJ_NMG_0087107

The documents disclosed a misjudgment by the C.I.A. that is the mirror image of an earlier one: while it was predicting an imminent North Korean collapse, the agency was still being criticized for failing in the 1980s to anticipate the speed with which the Soviet Union would eventually fall.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recently traveled across northeast Asia to build support for a slate of tough economic sanctions intended to punish North Korea for its recent nuclear test.

Publicly, Bush administration officials say that the sanctions can be useful for bringing North Korea back to the negotiating table. Privately however, some officials hold out the hope that the economic squeeze could work to undermine Mr. Kim.

Some members of the C.I.A.-led team of experts interviewed Thursday said they never suspected in 1997 that North Korea's neighbors would undertake such a concerted aid effort.

"Maybe I just don't have a great imagination, but the idea that South Korea and Japan and other countries would come to North Korea's rescue wasn't one of the hypotheses that I was entertaining," said Nicholas Eberstadt, a North Korea expert at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

Deterring Kim Jong Il (WP)

By Graham Allison

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

In an interview aired last week, George Stephanopoulos put the question to President Bush: What would he do if "North Korea sold nukes to Iran or al-Qaeda?" Bush replied, "They'd be held to account."

Seeking specifics, Stephanopoulos asked: "What does that mean?" The president answered, "I want the leader of North Korea to understand that he'll be held to account. Just like he's being held to account now for having run a test."

Say what? If North Korea sells a nuclear weapon to Osama bin Laden or Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, he should expect the United States to go to the United Nations and negotiate further sanctions? And if al-Qaeda sneaks that bomb into the United States and we awake to the president's nightmare in which a mushroom cloud engulfs Washington or Los Angeles, then what? If this formulation stands -- without further specification -- America risks becoming the victim of a catastrophic "deterrence failure."

Deterrence emerged as a central concept in Cold War strategy. It meant convincing the adversary that the costs of taking an unacceptable action would greatly exceed any benefits it could hope to achieve. How did the United States prevent the Soviets from seizing Berlin? By convincing Soviet leaders that such an attack would trigger a response that would destroy their country.

Effective deterrence required three components: clarity, capability and credibility. Clarity meant bright lines and unacceptable consequences. Credibility was understood to be in the eye of the beholder. How credible was the threat to trade Boston for Berlin? Never 100 percent. But U.S. forces, exercises and communication were crafted to convince Soviet leaders they dare not test it.

To date the Bush administration has demonstrably failed to deter Kim Jong Il. Successive U.S. demands that Kim not develop nuclear weapons, not test a missile and not test a nuclear bomb have been defied. In each case, the president has asserted that this would be "intolerable." Pressed to be precise about what this threat meant, however, Bush refused, responding instead, "I don't think you give timelines to dictators and tyrants." National security adviser Stephen Hadley has gone further, arguing that red lines make no sense in dealing with North Korea because "the North Koreans just walk right up to them and step over them."

Having stiffed Bush -- and the world -- in building a nuclear arsenal, testing a long-range missile and testing a nuclear weapon, might Kim now imagine that he could also sell nuclear weapons?

America's challenge is to prevent this act by convincing Kim that he will be held accountable for every nuclear weapon that originates in North Korea. This requires clarity, credibility about our capacity to identify the source of a bomb that explodes in one of our cities (however it is delivered by whomever) and a believable threat to respond.

Kim must be convinced that American nuclear forensics will be able to identify the molecular fingerprint of nuclear material from his Yongbyon reactor. He must feel in his gut the threat that if a nuclear weapon of North Korean origin explodes on American soil or that of a U.S. ally, the United States will retaliate precisely as if North Korea had attacked the United States with a nuclear-armed missile: with an overwhelming response that guarantees this will never happen again.

Here, the president can take a page from President John F. Kennedy in the Cuban missile crisis. In 1962, as the Soviet Union was emplacing nuclear-tipped missiles in Cuba, some worried that these weapons could be transferred to a young revolutionary named Fidel Castro. Kennedy issued an unambiguous warning to Nikita Khrushchev. "It shall be the policy of this nation," he announced, "to regard any nuclear missile launched from Cuba against any nation in the Western Hemisphere as an attack by the Soviet Union on the United States requiring a full retaliatory response upon the Soviet Union." Khrushchev knew that meant a nuclear war.

Russia Opposes Draft Resolution On Iran (WP/AP)

By Henry Meyer, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russia signaled its opposition Thursday to a draft U.N. Security Council resolution proposed by European nations that would impose sanctions on Iran over its disputed nuclear program, calling it a departure from existing agreements between world powers.

Russia and China, veto-wielding permanent members of the council that have strong commercial ties with Tehran, have been reluctant to support sanctions against Iran. A key concern for Moscow is the future of its $1 billion contract to build Iran's first nuclear power station.

"Our goal is to eliminate the risks of sensitive technologies getting into the hands of Iran until the IAEA (the International Atomic Energy Agency) clarifies issues of interest to it, while maintaining all possible channels of communication with Iran," Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said in comments on state television.

"And it seems to me that, in this context, the draft resolution clearly does not correspond to those tasks agreed on by the six sides," he added, speaking on the sidelines of an international Arctic conference in Russia's far north.

The six major powers of United States, Russia, Germany, France, Britain and China have offered Iran incentives to halt uranium enrichment, but Tehran has rejected them. Enrichment can produce material for nuclear power reactors or weapons.

European nations this week proposed sanctions _ banning the sale of missile and atomic technology to Iran and ending most U.N. help for its nuclear programs _ after weeks of exploratory talks with an European Union negotiator ended without progress.

The sanctions would impose limits on the Russian-built nuclear power station in the southwestern city of Bushehr, although they do not force an end to it. Russia has consistently rejected U.S. demands to halt work on the project and last month it agreed to supply fuel for the plant in March 2007, enabling the facility to go online in September.

Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Kislyak said the project was one of several obstacles holding up agreement on the U.N. resolution. "Lengthy negotiations will be needed to find a mutually acceptable solution," he was quoted as saying by Interfax news agency.

Washington has been pushing for even tougher sanctions, and Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the United Nations, said Wednesday there would be "American changes to the proposed European text." He refused to elaborate.

In Paris, Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei said consultations would continue at U.N. headquarters to try and win the Russians over. "We have taken note of the Russian declarations. ... We will now pursue discussions in New York," he said.

Iranian state radio voiced confidence that Russia's opposition to the draft resolution could thwart the EU's moves against the Iranian nuclear program.

"If Russia opposes the resolution, then Europe's position in further negotiations with Iran would be worse than it is now," the radio said in a commentary, adding that "sanctions would not be effective, satisfactory or conclusive."

DOJ_NMG_0087109

In a sign of Russia's determination to safeguard the Bushehr contract, the head of the Russian state company that is building the power plant said Thursday it would be completed on time.

"All work on the nuclear power station is being carried out in line with the existing timetable," Atomstroiexport's chief Sergei Shmatko was quoted as saying by ITAR-Tass news agency.

Lebanon's Aftermath (WP)

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

TWO MONTHS after the end of the Middle East's summer war the good news is that the Israeli-Lebanese border is quiet and looks as if it may remain so for some time. The bad news is that neither the small nor the large factors that triggered the fighting -- the abduction of Israeli soldiers by Hamas and Hezbollah, and Iran's new drive for power in the region -- have been alleviated. Though the European-led peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon may give that shattered region a respite, the danger is growing of a new eruption of fighting between Israel and the Palestinians -- and maybe even between Israel and Syria.

Judging from what Israeli raids have been uncovering in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian militants are eager to imitate what they perceive as Hezbollah's success in standing up to the Israeli army in the villages of southern Lebanon -- and Iran's agents are just as eager to help them. Entering the border zone between Gaza and Egypt last week for the first time in months, Israeli forces found some 15 tunnels that they say were being used to smuggle sophisticated weapons, such as Russian-made Concourse anti-tank missiles, 122-millimeter Grad rockets and more than 15 tons of TNT. Firings of crude Qassam rockets from Gaza at nearby Israeli towns have continued, along with Israeli raids to capture or kill the militants behind them.

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, who considered himself a winner of the war, is still sounding belligerent, warning publicly of the possibility of war between Israel and Syria. Israel responded this week by carrying out military maneuvers on the Golan Heights. Mr. Assad continues to harbor one of the architects of the war, Hamas leader Khaled Meshal. Mr. Meshal ordered the June raid inside Israel that began the fighting; now, from his perch in Damascus, he torpedoes attempts by Egypt and other Arab governments to broker accords to release the Israeli captive in Gaza and create a more moderate Palestinian government.

The Bush administration's policy for defusing this dangerous situation has amounted mostly to encouraging Egyptian mediation as well as a deal between Israel and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to ease the flow of goods between Gaza and Israel. But Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert resists acting before the Israeli soldier is released; meanwhile, he has bolstered his government by allying with a hard-line nationalist party that opposes most concessions to the Palestinians. Feelers by Syria about peace talks with Israel have been shunned.

It's not hard to predict where this is heading: toward events that will serve to further advance Iran's goal of radicalizing the Middle East. Those who stand to lose the most from that development -- Israel, Egypt and the United States -- are running out of time for their agenda of negotiations and confidence-building.

Assad's weakness

An intelligence source tells us Bashar Assad, who inherited leadership of Syria, is no strongman like his late father, Hafez. In his sixth year as leader, Bashar is largely controlled by Ba'ath Party operatives who oppose better relations with the West.

The source tells us it is Bashar Assad's aides who push the 40-year-old dictator to support Hezbollah destabilization activities in Lebanon and allow al Qaeda jihadists to use Syria as a staging point for infiltrating Iraq and killing Americans and Iraqis. "He could not keep them out even if he wanted to, unless he cracks down on his own operatives," said the source, who estimates there are hundreds of al Qaeda terrorists moving through Syria unencumbered.

DOJ_NMG_0087110

Syria, like Iraq under Saddam Hussein, is a Ba'ath Party socialist police state. Damascus has no interest in seeing a Democracy sprout next door. The Bush administration once hoped that Bashar Assad, an ophthalmologist by training who only sought power after the death of his older brother, would moderate Hafez's strident anti-Israel policies. But he has not.

The one time that Bashar Assad appeared triumphant over his coterie of advisers is when he pulled army troops out of Lebanon, as the United Nations demanded. But he has kept operatives inside the war-torn Lebanon and is furiously rearming Hezbollah in violation of a U.N. cease-fire.

Pakistan and Iran

It is somewhat surprising how little the Bush administration knows about what could be become a historic agreement in the war on radical Islamists. Last summer, Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf approved a deal with tribal leaders with whom his army had been fighting and dying in Waziristan, an ungoverned expanse on the Afghan border.

Gen. Musharraf insists the deal is good for the U.S. It calls for a cease-fire as long as the tribes stop providing aid and comfort to Taliban members who regroup in Pakistan before going back into Afghanistan. Some pundits have ripped the agreement as a surrender to tribal militants who may be hiding Osama bin Laden.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, said he did not know much about the deal when he met recently with reporters and editors of The Washington Times. The CIA declined to comment.

Now we see that the top U.S. commander in the region, Gen. John Abizaid, is at best skeptical.

"Well I guess like anybody I'm kind of wait and see," he recently told a group of defense reporters. "I hate to answer one of your questions with 'I don't know,' but I don't know. I did talk to President Musharraf about it. I told him I was concerned about it ... The long run is, you've got to go forward in the tribal areas with economic, political and military solutions that the tribes cooperate with. But I'm very, very skeptical about this notion that people that have been harbored in the tribal areas are no longer going to be harbored. I'll believe that when I see it."

Gen. Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command, also presented facts on which any observer could conclude that the U.S. is in a war in Iran.

It appears that Iran is supplying insurgents with RPG-29, a dual-headed warhead that is destroying U.S. armored vehicles. Worse, Iran is manufacturing and exporting explosively formed penetrators (EFPs). It is a more devastating edition of the ubiquitous improvised explosive device. The EFP unleashes an array of warheads certain to hit any object within range. Iranian-backed Hezbollah developed the bomb to kill Israelis. Now, Iran is making EFPs and shipping them into Iraq to kill U.S. troops.

Baghdad show

It was a double-barreled press conference. The two most-powerful men in Iraq, Gen. George Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, appeared before a skeptical Baghdad press corps to give the impression of war momentum. Gen. Casey talked of Iraqi security-force progress; Mr. Khalilzad trumpeted a "national compact" that could end the violence in a year.

The press reaction?

A CBS news reporter said U.S. commanders in the field say they cannot count on a full Iraqi unit to arrive on the scene. Some units are only half strength. "So the numbers really are a lie, and we want the truth, and your soldiers on the ground want the truth out there," said reporter Lara Logan.

"The numbers aren't a lie, and the numbers are prepared by the soldiers in the field and their Iraqi counterparts on a monthly basis," Gen. Casey said. He conceded, however, that not all brigades are manned at 100 percent and that a defense ministry policy allows 25 percent of a unit on leave at any one time.

A reporter for the British Broadcasting Corp., a consistent critic of the Iraq war, suggested the country was better off with Saddam Hussein in charge. Said Mr. Khalilzad, "During Saddam thousands upon thousands of Iraqis were killed as a result of a government policy. Now these killings are taking place by the terrorists, by death squads. And the government, with support of the coalition, is trying to bring that to an end."

Sinking polls

A new Gallup Poll shows more Americans are not happy with events in Iraq, where more than 2,800 U.S. service members have died since April 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0087111

The survey showed 65 percent of respondents said things are going badly in Iraq, compared with 35 percent who say things are going well. A majority of 58 percent say neither side is winning the war.

Yet, only 20 percent support an immediate withdrawal of all troops, a position endorsed by Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat. But another 34 percent want withdrawal in 12 months. Nearly 45 percent either back getting the job done first (35 percent) or sending more troops (9 percent).

Rumor mill

One constant in Washington since the Iraq war went sour is that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is out the door. The latest word from Weekly Standard editor Bill Kristol is that Mr. Rumsfeld will leave after the Nov. 7 elections.

Mark Larson, host of a popular radio talk show on KOGO in San Diego, asked Mr. Rumsfeld about the prediction during a live interview this week at the White House. "Rumsfeld will leave after the election," Mr. Kristol said on Fox News Sunday.

"That fellow said the same damn thing in April of 2001," Mr. Rumsfeld responded. "He has been on that shtick, and people keep repeating it and repeating it. I don't know why they listen to him. He's been wrong so many times. There ought to be some accountability."

Dissent Grows Over Silent Treatment For 'Axis Of Evil' Nations (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — Ever since President Bush first proclaimed there to be an "axis of evil" in 2002, pundits, diplomats and politicians have urged him to talk to its members. But in the last few weeks, with Iraq experiencing a further surge in violence, North Korea testing a nuclear bomb and Iran continuing to defy a Security Council demand to stop enriching uranium, the cries for dialogue have grown louder.

James A. Baker III, the Republican former secretary of state, said this month that he believed "in talking to your enemies." After North Korea tested its nuclear device earlier this month, former President Jimmy Carter said that "the stupidest thing that a government can do that has a real problem with someone is to refuse to talk to them."

Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, said last weekend that even at the peak of the cold war, "when there were nuclear missiles pointing at every major U.S. city, there was a direct line between the White House and the Kremlin."

The question arises: Is any of this cutting ice with the administration?

Officially, the administration is sticking to form. President Bush said as much during a news conference on Wednesday, when he was asked, again, whether he would be willing to work with Iran and Syria if it was determined that they could help bring stability to Iraq, their neighbor.

His reply did not veer from the script, which basically withholds American dialogue with "axis of evil" members until they change their ways. "Iran and Syria understand full well that the world expects them to help Iraq," Mr. Bush said.

He said that if the Iranians stopped enriching uranium, American diplomats would talk to them. He also had a to-do list for President Bashar al-Assad of Syria to get into America's good graces: "Do not undermine the Siniora government in Lebanon; help Israel get back the prisoner that was captured by Hamas; don't allow Hamas and Hezbollah to plot attacks against democracies in the Middle East; help inside of Iraq."

But within the administration, things are a little more nuanced, Bush officials said. One administration official distilled the internal deliberations this way, "On Syria, there's a very healthy debate about whether we should talk to them; on Iran, there is no debate internally."

The American officials who agreed to speak about the internal discussions are all involved in that debate, with some opposed to any discussions with Iran, Syria and North Korea, and others saying that such talks should be considered.

Among those inside the administration who are urging more engagement with Damascus, most come from the State Department's Near Eastern Affairs bureau, including Assistant Secretary C. David Welch, the officials said.

But, surprisingly, in recent months, the usually hawkish deputy national security adviser, J. D. Crouch, has been pushing for the administration to talk directly to Syria, officials say. "His style with the Syrians is that we need to be very strict with them," one senior administration official said. “It’s not a friendly ‘Let’s go for coffee.’ More like, ‘Let’s directly deliver a very strong message to them.’ ”

The administration officials would not speak on the record because they did not want to be identified when discussing internal deliberations.

The original “axis of evil,” as defined by Mr. Bush, comprises Iraq, North Korea and Iran. But after the United States-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, Iraq was replaced by Syria, given the 2005 assassination in Lebanon of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister. American officials and some at the United Nations have said Syria had a hand in the Hariri assassination. The Bush administration and Israel have also accused Syria of supporting Hezbollah in its raid into Israel this summer, an attack that set off a monthlong war.

Officially, the United States has diplomatic relations with Damascus, where there is an American embassy. But it is manned by a chargé d’affaires and not an ambassador; Mr. Bush recalled the ambassador to Syria, Margaret Scobey, after the Hariri assassination.

There is less debate within the administration when it comes to Iran. Ms. Rice is believed to have pushed the White House as far toward dialogue with Iran as it would go when she prodded Mr. Bush in May to offer to join European talks with Iran over Tehran’s nuclear ambitions.

Ms. Rice herself has offered to sit at the table with the Iranians, but she includes the usual caveat: Iran must first verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment program.

As for North Korea, American officials continue to espouse the view that the United States, by insisting on talking to North Korea only within the confines of a regional group, can better share the burden of power.

Ms. Rice offered reporters the diplomatic version of that argument last week. “There’s this myth out there that we haven’t been willing to talk to the North Koreans,” she said. “What we’ve been unwilling to do is to negotiate bilaterally with the North Koreans, another agreement that they are going to be free to disregard because it will only be with the United States and not with states that frankly have more leverage than the United States, like China and South Korea.”

But the administration will continue to take hits over not talking to its enemies until it can demonstrably show that this strategy has had results, diplomats said. Said one European diplomat in Washington: “They’ve isolated Cuba for 40 years, and you see how well that’s worked.”

EU Chief Ask Israel To Reopen Border (AP)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana said Thursday he hoped a crucial crossing between Gaza and the outside world, which has been closed by Israel for most of the past four months, would be reopened on a regular basis soon.

European Union officials who monitor the Rafah crossing between Gaza and Egypt have threatened to abandon their mission if Israel keeps closing the passage for what it says are security reasons.

"We hope to have in a few days or weeks — we hope days — a response on a renewal of our presence in Rafah," Solana said at a joint news conference with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni after they met in Tel Aviv.

The Rafah passage, previously controlled by Israel, was handed to EU-supervised Palestinian control last year under a U.S.-brokered accord.

Israel has kept the crossing closed for all but 12 days since Palestinian gunmen captured an Israeli soldier on June 25 and took him into the Gaza Strip. It fears militants would try to sneak the soldier across the border to Egypt and also says Rafah has become a conduit for weapons smuggling into Gaza.

Livni said that while there needed to be talk about operational issues at Rafah, Israel was happy with the EU's involvement there, the first time it has accepted a European role in security aspects of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

"We are going to negotiate with the Europeans on the future terms," she said. "But we are very positive about the role of Europe in monitoring the Rafah passage."

DOJ_NMG_0087113

Solana arrived in Israel Wednesday for meetings with top Israeli and Palestinian officials, the first leg of a six-day tour of the Middle East meant to assess the political mood of key players in the region.

EU officials were doubtful that Solana's trip, his first to the region in three months, would yield breakthroughs, acknowledging early on in the trip that divisions between Israelis and Palestinians remain as deep as ever.

After meeting Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in the West Bank city of Ramallah, Solana said he reported on his efforts with the Israelis.

"I have tried to work with the government of Israel to try to upgrade the crossings which are very fundamental," he told reporters.

Solana was expected to push Abbas and his Fatah Party to boost efforts to form a unity government with the Hamas-led Palestinian government, which is isolated from the international community over its refusal to recognize Israel and renounce violence.

But Abbas said after the meeting that there is no point in further dialogue between his Fatah movement and Hamas.

"Dialogue has overused its purposes, and everything is clear now," he said.

Hamas Gets $2 Million To Help Offset Cutoff (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 26 — The Palestinian interior minister took home $2 million in cash from Muslim countries when he returned to the Gaza Strip this week, part of a continuing effort to meet government expenses in the face of a cutoff in aid from Western countries, an aide to the minister said Thursday.

The minister, Said Siam, entered Gaza on Tuesday at the Rafah border crossing with Egypt, after a trip that also took him to Syria and Iran. The aide, Maher Ramli, said the money had come from “Arab and Muslim countries,” but declined to identify them.

“He was very well received on his trip,” Mr. Ramli said.

The Interior Ministry, which is responsible for various security agencies, plans to spend half the money by making $50 payments to 20,000 members of the security forces, Mr. Ramli said.

Like other government employees, security force members have received only partial and sporadic salary payments since Hamas, the militant Islamic group, came to power in the spring after winning Palestinian legislative elections in January.

Mr. Ramli said the remaining $1 million would go toward restoring the Interior Ministry building, which was damaged in a recent fire set by members of Fatah, the faction that has been battling Hamas in Gaza.

Israel, the European Union and the United States all cut money to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas took over. They have demanded that the Palestinian Authority meet several conditions, including the recognition of Israel, which Hamas leaders in the government have refused to do.

As a result, the Palestinian Authority is desperately short of cash and has not been able to raise anywhere near the more than $150 million a month it needs to pay salaries and cover basic operating expenses.

Several Arab and Muslim countries have pledged to help. However, the United States has threatened sanctions against banks that conduct transactions with Hamas. The banks, unwilling to risk their access to international financial markets, have refused to handle such transactions.

Mr. Siam is the latest of several Hamas officials who have carried large sums of cash into Gaza in recent months. The foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, returned with $20 million stuffed in suitcases back in June.

Palestinians may carry in unlimited sums of money as long as they declare it, which Mr. Siam did, said European Union monitors who assist Palestinians at the Rafah crossing point.

Officially, the Palestinian Authority has controlled its Rafah border crossing with Egypt for the past 11 months, with the European monitors also present. But in practice, the crossing has been mostly closed since the end of June, when Israeli troops re-entered southern Gaza after the capture of an Israeli soldier, who was taken to Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0087114

Israel is allowing the crossing to open periodically, and Palestinians were let in and out on Tuesday and Wednesday, but Rafah was closed again on Thursday.

Israeli troops shot and killed three Palestinians in separate incidents overnight Wednesday and during the day on Thursday.

Near the southern town of Khan Yunis, a Palestinian policeman was killed in gunfire exchanged with Israeli troops during the night, both sides said. An Israeli soldier was wounded, the military added.

Key American To Leave U.N. (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- Christopher Burnham, the outspoken American who has been trying to modernize U.N. management practices, announced yesterday that he will leave next month to take a job in the private sector.

Mr. Burnham will leave the United Nations on Nov. 16. He said he will spend time with his family before starting with his new employers, who he declined to name.

Sources with the United Nations said he is going to work for Deutsche Bank but were uncertain about his responsibilities there.

Mr. Burnham, 50, became the undersecretary general for administration and management in June 2005, after running the State Department's management office.

He is the highest-ranking American inside the U.N. Secretariat.

He is the first of many high-ranking U.N. officials expected to leave the organization as South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon takes over as secretary-general.

An experienced administrator with the direct manner of the Marine Corps Reserve colonel he used to be, Mr. Burnham has focused on bringing accountability and transparency to the often Byzantine U.N. bureaucracy.

He crafted protection for U.N. whistleblowers and reorganized the scandal-tainted procurement department that buys nearly $2 billion worth of goods and services annually. He also built up the U.N. Ethics Office and negotiated contracts and financing to refurbish the U.N. headquarters buildings.

"I enjoyed immensely my work at the State Department, and it has been particularly challenging and rewarding to be here at the U.N. as we have pushed forward a broad management reform agenda," he told The Washington Times yesterday.

"I think the U.N. is advancing into the 21st century, and over the last 18 months we have given the new incoming secretary-general strong foundations on which to build a strong organization."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said that he accepts the resignation "with regret" and described Mr. Burnham as a "driving force" in management reform efforts.

His efforts often alienated or at least bruised some delegations that distrusted Mr. Burnham, seeing him as Washington's budget cutter rather than a servant of the larger organization.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton praised Mr. Burnham for "reforming the United Nations through his tireless efforts to achieve a more efficient, more transparent, and ultimately more effective organization."

Mr. Bolton, who has repeatedly said that senior officials should leave with Mr. Annan and allow Mr. Ban to pick his own team and advisers, added, "We expect many other senior U.N. officials to transition out as well, and we thank all of them for their service."

U.S. Relations Won't Stop If Correa Wins (AP-Y)

By Gonzalo Solano, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

Ecuador's leftist presidential candidate said after a meeting with the U.S. ambassador on Thursday that he will not break off relations with Washington if he wins his country's Nov. 26 runoff election.

"I will not break off relations with the United States, but Ecuador's international policy will be sovereign," Rafael Correa told reporters after a closed-door meeting with the ambassador, Linda Jewell.

DOJ_NMG_0087115

"We will condemn the errors that the whole world recognizes, like the invasion of Iraq in search of weapons of mass destruction that did not exist," said Correa, an open admirer and ideological ally of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, the region's most vocal critic of President Bush.

Jewell asked to meet with Correa to discuss a "wide range of bilateral issues," and also planned to meet with his opponent, pro-U.S. banana tycoon Alvaro Noboa, U.S. Embassy spokesman Aaron Sherinian said.

Correa has alarmed Wall Street and Washington with threats to default on foreign debt payments to fund social programs, and a pledge not extend the U.S. military's use of the Manta air base on the Pacific coast for drug surveillance flights when a treaty runs out in 2009.

Adopting the language of Chavez, who called Bush the devil at the United Nations, Correa last month said that the devil himself should be offended by the comparison, and that Bush was "tremendously dimwitted."

But since the Oct. 15 vote, Correa has tried to distance himself from Chavez, whom he earlier described as a friend, after Noboa started to attack the relationship.

Chavez has remained silent on Ecuador's presidential race. His open endorsements backfired against leftist presidential candidates in Peru and Mexico earlier this year.

Final results from the first-round vote released Wednesday by Ecuador's Supreme Electoral showed Noboa as the top vote-getter, winning 26.8 percent, or more than 1.4 million votes. Correa, 43, was second with 22.8 percent, winning 217,918 fewer ballots. The rest of the votes were spread among 11 other candidates.

Polls released this week show Noboa leading Correa by 13 to 15 percentage points.

Noboa, a billionaire and old-style populist, made a surprising surge in the final days of the first-round campaign.

His first-place finish prompted cries of fraud from Correa. Correa, a former finance minister, had been the front-runner in polls before the vote.

On Thursday, Attorney General Cecilia Armas said she will investigate allegations of irregularities in the Oct. 15 ballot, which Correa and his supporters contend were rigged against him.

Election observers from the Organization of American States said there was no sign of foul play in the first round vote.

Correa's party reported finding pre-marked ballots outside of polling places, and alleged that rival parties had infiltrated the tables where the votes were counted and totals were entered onto tally sheets.

Muslim Groups' Suit Over Cartoons Rejected (WT/AP)

By Jan M. Olsen

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

COPENHAGEN -- A Danish court rejected a lawsuit yesterday against the newspaper that first printed prophet Muhammad cartoons, some of which depicted Islam as a violent religion.

The City Court in Aarhus rejected claims by seven Danish Muslim groups that the 12 drawings printed in the Jyllands-Posten daily were meant to insult the prophet and make a mockery of Islam.

The court conceded that some Muslims saw the drawings as offensive, but found there was no basis to assume that "the purpose of the drawings was to present opinions that can belittle Muslims."

Jyllands-Posten's editor in chief hailed the court's decision as a victory for freedom of speech.

"Everything but a pure acquittal would have been a disaster for press freedom and the media's ability to fulfill its duties in a democratic society," Editor in Chief Carsten Juste said.

The newspaper has apologized for offending Muslims, but stands by its decision to print the cartoons in September 2005 as a challenge to a perceived self-censorship among artists afraid to offend Muslims.

The caricatures were reprinted in European newspapers in January and February, fueling protests in the Islamic world. Some turned violent, with Danish outposts attacked and people killed in Libya and Afghanistan.

Muslims were outraged at the court decision.

DOJ_NMG_0087116

"The dismissal of the lawsuit against the newspaper, which was expected, confirms the ongoing intention to harm our religion and our prophet," said Mahmoud al-Kharabsheh, an independent legislator who heads the Jordanian parliament's legal committee.

The plaintiffs plan to appeal the verdict, spokesman Kasem Ahmad told Danish radio, adding that he feared Muslims around the world would be upset by the ruling.

In Lebanon, where protesters set fire to the building housing the Danish consulate in February, Islamic studies professor Radwan el-Sayyed said yesterday's verdict was a "misinterpretation of freedom of expression."

He said he did not expect a repeat of February's riots, however, saying people knew they were counterproductive.

"There will be anger, newspaper articles condemning the court decision, but I don't expect there to be street protests," Mr. el-Sayyed said.

In Syria, where a mob attacked and set fire to the Danish and Norwegian embassies in February, legislator Mohammed Habash, who heads the Islamic Studies Center in Damascus, said the ruling would "widen the gap between the Western and Islamic world."

One of the cartoons showed the prophet wearing a turban shaped like a bomb with a burning fuse.

The court said some of the drawings could be perceived as linking Islam to terrorism, but added the purpose was to provide social commentary rather than to insult or ridicule Muslims.

Islamic law, which historically was not intended to apply in nations outside the Muslim world, forbids any depiction of the prophet.

The seven Danish Muslim groups filed the defamation suit in March, after Denmark's top prosecutor declined to press criminal charges, saying the drawings did not violate laws against racism or blasphemy.

The plaintiffs, who claimed to have the backing of 20 more Islamic organizations in the Scandinavian country, had sought $16,860 in damages from Mr. Juste and Flemming Rose, the culture editor who supervised the cartoon project.

Muslim Cleric Apologizes For Rape Remark (AP-Y)

By Rohan Sullivan

AP, October 27, 2006

Australia's most prominent Islamic cleric vowed Thursday to stand strong against widespread outrage over his description of women who don't wear head scarfs as "uncovered meat" who invite rape.

Sheik Taj Aldin al-Hilali, long a lightning rod in strained relations between the government and the Muslim minority, apologized for any offense he caused women in making the comments a month ago during a sermon marking the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

But he said he had no intention of stepping down. Instead, al-Hilali will not give sermons for two or three months, though he will not face censure for his comments, a spokesman for the governing association of his mosque said.

The decision prompted further condemnation.

"I think this is a slap on the wrist," Australia's Sex Discrimination Commissioner Pru Goward said on Friday, a day after she accused Hilali of inciting rape.

Prime Minister John Howard and others denounced al-Hilali's remarks as blaming women for rape, and there were calls for the cleric to quit or be removed from his role as mufti in the faith.

The controversy comes amid tense relations between Australia's estimated 300,000 Muslims and the rest of the mostly Christian-heritage population of about 20 million. Last December, the nation was gripped by riots that often pitted gangs of white youths against youths of Middle Eastern decent.

Howard recently offended parts of the Muslim community by singling out some Muslims as extremists who should adopt Australia's liberal attitudes to women's rights.

After last year's deadly London transit bombings, Howard accused Australian Islamic leaders of not doing enough to condemn extremism and offered government money to train local imams and reduce dependence on migrant clerics. The government has also introduced tough counterterrorism laws and is proposing tighter citizenship rules.

DOJ_NMG_0087117

The issue of how Muslim women should dress has caused debate in Britain since former Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, now leader of the House of Commons, said this month that Muslim women visiting his office should remove their veils. Similar passions raged when France banned head scarves and other religious symbols in public schools two years ago.

Al-Hilali, 65, is the top cleric at Sydney's largest mosque, and is considered the most senior Islamic leader by many Muslims in Australia and New Zealand, having been appointed mufti by Australia's top Islamic body.

His remarks about women drew national attention after they were printed Thursday in a national newspaper, The Australian.

In a translation from Arabic by the newspaper, later verified by other media, al-Hilali was quoted as saying in the sermon: "If you take out uncovered meat and place it outside ... and the cats come to eat it ... whose fault is it, the cats' or the uncovered meat's?"

"The uncovered meat is the problem. If she was in her room, in her home, in her hijab, no problem would have occurred," he was quoted as saying, referring to the head scarf worn by some Muslim women.

Goward said al-Hilali's comments encouraged rape and that Muslims should force him to step down.

"This is inciting young men to a violent crime because it is the woman's fault," Goward told television's Nine Network. "It is time the Islamic community did more than say they were horrified. I think it is time he left."

Howard said the comments were "appalling and reprehensible."

"The idea that women are to blame for rapes is preposterous," he told reporters.

Al-Hilali also faced pressure from within the Muslim community.

"Whether he steps down or not, I think it's time for Australia's Muslim faith to have a religious leader who has a better understanding of Australian laws, Australian values, and the Australian way of life," said Alia Karaman, a female member of a leaders' group at a Sydney mosque.

Al-Hilali issued a statement Thursday saying The Australian had selectively quoted from the sermon, and that he was shocked at the reaction.

"I would like to unequivocally confirm that the presentation related to religious teachings on modesty and not to go to extremes in enticements," the statement said.

"This does not condone rape, I condemn rape," he said. "Women in our Australian society have the freedom and right to dress as they choose, the duty of man is to avert his glance or walk away."

Asked if he would quit his senior post, al-Hilali told Seven Network television news: "No, no, no."

Al-Hilali is an Egyptian-born Sunni who has been a staunch critic of Australia's alliance with the United States in the Iraq war. He triggered a controversy in 2004 for saying in a sermon in Lebanon that the Sept. 11 attacks were "God's work against the oppressors." Al-Hilali said later he did not support the attacks, or terrorism.

Last year, al-Hilali traveled to Iraq to help negotiate the release of an Australian engineer from kidnappers, winning thanks from the hostage's family.

Many Australian Muslims say they are increasingly treated with suspicion since the Sept. 11 and other international terrorist attacks.

Waleed Aly, a member of the Islamic Council of Victoria state, said al-Hilali's comments would result in more antagonism toward Muslims.

"I am expecting a deluge of hate mail," he said. "I am expecting people to get abused in the street and get abused at work."

Nicaraguan Congress Bans All Abortions (AP)

By Filadelfo Aleman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

Nicaragua's Congress voted Thursday to ban all abortions, including those that could save a mother's life.

If signed into law by President Enrique Bolanos, the measure would eliminate a century-old exception to Nicaragua's abortion ban that permits the procedure if three doctors certify that the woman's health is at risk.

Fifty-two lawmakers voted for the measure. Nine lawmakers abstained and 29 others did not attend the legislative session.

DOJ_NMG_0087118

Bolanos has proposed increasing prison sentences for illegal abortions — currently around six years — to 10 to 30 years for women who have the procedure as well as those who assist them.

But it was unclear whether he would sign the bill approved Thursday after lawmakers decided not to increase the penalties in this predominantly Roman Catholic country.

The bill has drawn protests from women's rights groups, and the Women's Autonomous Movement has said it was prepared to seek an injunction to block the measure if it passed.

Congress approved the bill despite a letter from European Union diplomats and U.N. representatives asking lawmakers to hold off on voting on the issue until after the Nov. 5 presidential elections.

U.N. official Rebeca Grynspan, who is in Nicaragua this week, told reporters, "It's very difficult that this (be determined) during an electoral period."

Nicaragua's medical association also urged legislators to postpone the vote, saying the issue had become politicized.

Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, who was a supporter of abortion rights as a young revolutionary, has said he has become a devout Roman Catholic and now opposes abortion.

Ortega's socialist government of the 1980s had a contentious relationship with the Catholic church, but Ortega recently has established warm ties with leading church figures in Nicaragua.

Congressman Wilfredo Navarro, of the ruling Liberal Constitutionalist Party, said the exception to Nicaragua's ban had allowed for cases in which healthy women who did not want to have their babies had convinced doctors to say an abortion was needed for health reasons.

Aside from Cuba, which permits abortions in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, Latin America has some of the world's most restrictive anti-abortion laws.

El Salvador and Chile also ban all types of abortions.

Most of the other countries in this heavily Roman Catholic region allow abortion when a woman's life is in danger but deny it to pregnant victims of rape or incest, according to the Center for Reproductive Rights, a New York-based advocacy group that supports abortion rights.

In May, Colombia's constitutional court legalized abortion in cases where fetuses were severely malformed, the pregnancy was the result of rape or incest or the mother's life was in danger.

Some 85 percent of Nicaragua's 5 million people are Catholics.

Around the world, more than a dozen countries have made it easier to get abortions in the past decade, and women from Mexico to Ireland have mounted court challenges to get access to the procedure.

Nicaragua Passes Total Ban On Abortion (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 26 — Nicaragua's legislature on Thursday banned all abortions, eliminating exceptions for rape and when the life of the mother is threatened.

The measure, expected to be approved by President Enrique Bolaños, was voted in 52 to 0, with 9 abstentions and 29 representatives not showing up to vote.

Nicaragua joins El Salvador and Chile as the only countries in the Western hemisphere to ban abortion without exception. But across Latin America, abortion is outlawed except in rare circumstances. It is readily available only in Cuba and a few English-speaking Caribbean countries.

The ban in Nicaragua comes two weeks before a hotly contested presidential election on Nov. 5, and opponents of the law say it was introduced now because no one dared to oppose it in the political climate.

"The presidential election is so polarized that the church saw this as an opportunity to force this issue now," Dr. Mirma Cunningham, a former minister of health and member of the National Assembly, said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0087119

The measure was supported by Daniel Ortega, the front-runner in the presidential race. He favored the right to an abortion during his presidency in the 1980's but has since embraced the Roman Catholic Church and has spoken out strongly against abortion.

Edmundo Jarquín, the candidate of the Sandinista Renovation Movement, a breakaway group challenging Mr. Ortega's candidacy, is the only one of the four leading presidential candidates to oppose the ban.

When asked about the issue at a presidential debate in September, Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, who is the candidate backed by Washington, recounted how his wife faced a difficult pregnancy nearly two decades ago but proceeded with it. Two of the three triplets she was carrying died but one survived and is now 18 years old. "That's why I oppose abortion," he said.

Health officials estimate that 32,000 illegal abortions are performed every year in Nicaragua, most of them unsafe. Advocates of the ban hope to reduce that number by making doctors and patients think about the consequences. Opponents of the law maintain that prohibiting the ending of problematic pregnancies will only lead to more clandestine abortions.

Nicaragua now allows abortions if three doctors agree that the mother's life would be in danger. This amounted to a total of six legal abortions in 2002, the last year for which data is available. Health officials say that the number has remained in the single digits since.

Illegal abortions can be punished with jail terms of up to six years for the woman and the doctor. Lawmakers put off discussion of sentences under the new law, though far stricter terms are expected to be added.

China's Corruption Inquiry Targets Beijing (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 26 — A widening Chinese anticorruption investigation is taking aim at Beijing's party leaders, a sign that President Hu Jintao intends to continue removing officials he considers insufficiently loyal, people told about the leadership's planning said.

Some 300 Communist Party investigators have been examining property deals and procurement practices in the capital city since at least late September and have uncovered suspicious dealings that implicate top Chinese leaders, the people said.

None of the people interviewed would allow their names to be used, fearing official retribution for speaking about a continuing investigation into an area of extreme delicacy for the Chinese leadership.

Among those seen as likely targets of the inquiry are Jia Qinglin, a member of the nine-member Politburo Standing Committee and a former party secretary of Beijing, as well as the current Beijing party secretary, Liu Qi, who is a regular member of the Politburo.

If the investigation results in the removal of one or both of the men, it will make the housecleaning the most sweeping since the shake-up after the 1989 suppression of democracy protests.

In September, security forces detained Chen Liangyu, the party chief of Shanghai and another Politburo member. They also removed numerous Shanghai officials from office and arrested or sidelined leaders in Tianjin, Fujian and Hunan, among other places.

Nearly all of those implicated to date are viewed as loyalists to China's former top leader, Jiang Zemin, or as having resisted the policies of Mr. Hu, the party boss since 2002.

As such, the crackdown serves two purposes, the people told about the leadership's goals say. Mr. Hu and Zeng Qinghong, the vice president and day-to-day coordinator of Communist Party affairs, have sought to warn underlings that they intend to punish corruption, widely seen as a worsening problem within the ruling party, even at the highest levels.

But the two leaders have also signaled that only those they consider allies will have the power to resist investigations of their financial affairs. That message seems intended to shore up support as the leadership prepares for its five-yearly political transition with the convening of the 17th Party Congress next fall.

The party leaders of Beijing and Shanghai, who control great wealth and enjoy broad autonomy, have traditionally served on the ruling Politburo. No major investigations of their activities are likely to be initiated without the approval of the top-most leaders.

Mr. Hu has recently worked hand in hand with Mr. Zeng, the No. 5 ranking leader who is also viewed as one of Mr. Hu's possible rivals, to consolidate power. Though China's one-party system concentrates authority in the hands of Mr. Hu, he must also navigate personal, regional and institutional allegiances that can make it difficult to carry out decisions made in Zhongnanhai, the leadership compound.

The investigation has significant policy implications. The economies of both Beijing and Shanghai, fueled partly by state-directed investment and rapid real estate development, have grown faster than the rest of the country at a time when Mr. Hu has sought to reduce speculative investment and stabilize soaring property prices.

One concern is that China remains too vulnerable to boom-bust economic cycles. If today's double-digit growth rates were to tumble, the resulting slowdown could threaten social stability and the ruling party's hold on power.

Mr. Hu's drive to build a "harmonious society" aims to steer more state resources into underdeveloped parts of the economy, including rural areas, rather than supporting frothy investment in the wealthiest cities.

At the same time, Mr. Hu has appealed for calm and sought to show that he remains on good terms with Mr. Jiang, the predecessor he pushed from his final post, as head of the military, in 2004.

Mr. Hu and Mr. Jiang appeared together at the Great Hall of the People last weekend to mark the 70th anniversary of the Long March. Mr. Hu delivered a speech that emphasized the "unity of the whole party."

Party officials said that although the investigation has mainly been directed at people considered part of Mr. Jiang's ruling circle, Mr. Jiang has been consulted about the need to control corruption. They added, however, that he no longer had the power to resist even if he chose to.

The current crackdown began in June, when a Beijing vice mayor, Liu Zhihua, was removed from his post after being accused of leading a "dissolute lifestyle." People told about the charges said they included misusing state funds and maintaining luxurious homes where he entertained mistresses and call girls.

There has been no announcement in the state news media about further investigations in Beijing. The Beijing mayor, Wang Qishan, recently dismissed speculation about stepped up inquiries in the capital city as nonsense.

But two people told about the leadership's planning said that top officials have ordered a renewed anticorruption push here. The most likely targets are Liu Qi, the party chief, and Mr. Jia, the standing committee member, they said.

Mr. Jia, a longtime loyalist of Mr. Jiang, has been dogged by allegations that he presided over rampant corruption in areas that he supervised. He was party secretary of Fujian Province in the early and mid-1990s. Mr. Jiang moved him to head the Beijing party apparatus in 1996, and he was elevated to the Politburo Standing Committee in 2002.

Mr. Jia, 66, still supervises the affairs of Beijing in addition to leading the Chinese People's Political Consultative Congress, which manages the party's relations with nonparty social interests, like business leaders and religious groups.

Liu Qi replaced Mr. Jia as party secretary and is thought to answer mainly to Mr. Jia.

The ultimate goal of investigating Beijing's affairs may be to incapacitate Mr. Jia politically so he cannot exercise much sway during the jockeying for positions and power that precedes the party congress, people told about the planning said.

But any broader crackdown in the capital poses some risks for China because Beijing will stage the 2008 Olympics, an event the leadership views as confirmation of the country's rise as a global power and as a chance to display China's best face to the outside world.

Liu Qi manages the tens of billions of dollars invested in Olympics-related venues, infrastructure and urban improvements. Leaders are eager to show that any corrupt activities in Beijing do not involve the Olympics and that planning for the event remains on track.

People told about the leadership's planning say that Liu Qi may remain head of the Beijing Organizing Committee for the 2008 Olympic Games even if he is replaced as party secretary. It is the latter post that carries significant political clout.

DOJ_NMG_0087121

If Mr. Jia were removed or forced to resign, he would most likely be the first person ousted from the elite body for corruption since the Communist Party took power in 1949, though Mao purged several members of the Politburo Standing Committee during his long reign.

The most recent high-level purge was that of Zhao Ziyang, the party's general secretary, who was ousted by Deng Xiaoping in 1989 for opposing the crackdown on student-led democracy protests that year.

Some party officials and political observers think Mr. Hu would be reluctant to confirm that corruption extends to the top ruling body. They say it is more likely that any evidence gathered against Mr. Jia would be used to push him into retirement in 2007 and to reduce his political influence in the meantime.

A Prisoner Of Global Impact (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

President Bush hopes to go to Vietnam next month bearing a gift -- passage of a bill to create the closest trade relations between the two countries since the end of the Vietnam War. But the plight of an ailing 58-year-old Florida woman who has been held in a Vietnamese prison for more than a year on terrorism suspicions is threatening to derail the president's plans.

The case against Thong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee highlights both Vietnam's human rights record and the lingering passions of former refugees for the country they fled three decades ago. It also exposes the tension between the administration's dual efforts to promote business and foster democracy.

Foshee, a prominent Republican supporter of Bush from Orlando, was seized by Vietnamese authorities in September 2005, a day after she arrived to attend the wedding of a nephew, according to her family. Vietnamese officials have alleged that she, two other American women and an American man -- who were all arrested about the same time -- were plotting to take over radio stations and undermine the Vietnamese government, U.S. officials said. Foshee, a Vietnamese immigrant who became a U.S. citizen in 1972, had visited Vietnam several times previously.

Some Bush administration officials suggest that the Vietnamese government may have evidence against Foshee, but they fault its failure to bring formal charges.

Vietnam is the fastest-growing market for U.S. products in Asia, with exports growing by 150 percent since 2001, according to the U.S.-Vietnam Trade Council. After 12 years of negotiations, Vietnam yesterday cleared the last hurdle to becoming the 150th member of the World Trade Organization before the end of the year.

A bill granting Vietnam permanent normal trade relations is necessary for U.S. companies to benefit from the low tariffs that Vietnam will introduce as a WTO member, opening up a market considered the economic tiger of Asia. Executives from at least 200 companies will join Bush on his visit to Hanoi.

But Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) has blocked the bill from coming to the Senate floor until Foshee's case is resolved, forcing the administration to raise the case at senior levels. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke to her Vietnamese counterpart three weeks ago, seeking Foshee's release. Martinez, a Cabinet official in Bush's first term, buttonholed the president about the matter as they flew back from a campaign event earlier this week.

In a letter to Rice dated Oct. 13, Martinez wrote: "I feel strongly that substantive progress must be made that will lead to Mrs. Foshee's release before I can lift the hold I have placed on the legislation."

The Senate will not be back in session until Nov. 13, and Bush is to leave Nov. 15 for Vietnam. The president, who has never visited the country, will attend the annual summit of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, which the Vietnamese government hopes will showcase the country's emergence.

U.S. officials also must deal with retailers' concerns about a deal struck with U.S. textile manufacturers just before Congress went on recess.

Foshee has actively demonstrated against the Vietnamese government and has been associated with the Government of Free Vietnam, a virulently anti-government group that maintains a military base on the Vietnamese-Cambodian border. Her daughter, Elizabeth McCausland, 37, a lawyer, said that she does not know whether her mother is a member of the group but that her mother helped train members of the group in public speaking and in education about democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0087122

The Government of Free Vietnam, based in Garden Grove, Calif., says it aims to "save the nation to terminate the dictatorship of the current communist government." Nguyen Van Don, secretary general of the group, issued a statement saying Foshee was in Vietnam for "personal and family reasons" and has never "undertaken any projects for the party."

McCausland said her mother "was very vocal about her wish that Vietnam become a democracy." She said Foshee demonstrated in Washington during Bush's meeting with Vietnamese Prime Minister Phan Van Khai in June 2005, and a photograph of her holding a sign demanding religious freedom in Vietnam was printed in newspapers. But she scoffs at the idea that her mother -- who she said is barely over five feet tall, has high blood pressure and was overweight when arrested -- knew anything about radio equipment or taking over radio stations.

"It's entirely ridiculous," McCausland said. "I truly believe what she is being punished for is her speaking out for democracy here in the United States."

In another recent case, the family of Cong Thanh Do, a San Jose resident, was surprised to learn that he secretly oversaw a network of anti-communist dissidents from his laptop. His activities came to light after he was arrested on a trip to Vietnam with his wife and 9-year-old son in mid-August. He was released after being held for 38 days.

Foshee, who owns a landscaping business, served as Asian coalition regional chairman for the Bush-Cheney campaign in 2004 and contributed $2,000 to the Republican National Committee in 2001, campaign records show. She also contributed $10,000 in 2000 to the successful Senate campaign of Democrat Bill Nelson, who as a House member helped bring her brother to the United States.

U.S. officials declined to discuss details of the case. Frederick Jones, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said the White House is aware of Foshee's detention and Martinez's action. "We have urged the government of Vietnam to abide by international legal standards and not to hold her indefinitely without due process," Jones said.

The case is "an obstacle to getting the trade package forward," said a senior State Department official. Rice has received assurances from Foreign Minister Pham Gia Khiem that he understands how important the case is and will work to resolve it, the official said.

Martinez declined to comment. Spokeswoman Kerry Feehery would only say that Martinez "is doing everything in his power as a U.S. senator to get Mrs. Foshee home to Florida."

The Vietnamese Embassy did not return phone calls.

In Brazil Campaign, A Barroom Brawl And A Class War (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett And Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Scenes from the class struggle in Brazil:

One evening last week, Danielle Tristão walked into a bar in a tony neighborhood of this seaside city wearing a T-shirt emblazoned "Lula Yes." She was declaring her support for Brazil's blue-collar president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, who is a heavy favorite to win re-election on Sunday but is despised by Brazil's upper crust. Ms. Tristão, who is 38 years old, said hostile patrons were soon pelting her with fliers for Mr. da Silva's centrist opponent, Geraldo Alckmin, and even scuffling with her. In the melee, one of the customers bit off part of Ms. Tristão's left ring finger.

To leftists she became a martyr, especially since Mr. da Silva as a young man had lost the pinky of his left hand in a metalworking accident. "Some fascists ate the finger of a Workers Party activist so that she would bear on her body Lula's mark," leftist playwright Augusto Boal proclaimed at a political rally for Mr. da Silva and his political party.

Not so, says the woman who did the biting, Ana Cristina Luzardo de Castro. Through her husband, Ms. de Castro, 39, says that Ms. Tristão was drunk and belligerent, calling her an "uninformed preppy." Even though her husband says she was biting in self-defense, Ms. de Castro is now being vilified by Brazilian bloggers as "Hannibal" and the "Pit Bull of Leblon," the neighborhood where the bar fight occurred.

Ms. de Castro's husband says his wife actually votes for Mr. da Silva, but that doesn't seem to matter in Brazil's politically charged environment. In a vast and diverse nation that has long taken pride in its live-and-let-live ethos, this year's presidential campaign has laid bare profound frictions between social classes and regions. Brazil's image of itself as a super tolerant "racial democracy" is getting a rude reality check.

Mr. da Silva is the overwhelming favorite of voters in the sprawling, arid Northeast, where he himself was born and people tend to be poorer, less educated and darker-skinned than those in the South. The South, which encompasses Brazil's most modern and glamorous cities and its media centers, has been considerably cooler to Mr. da Silva.

College-educated Brazilians, like the students in São Paulo who recently dressed up as clowns to satirize Mr. da Silva, often look down on a president who quit school after the fourth grade. But the vast majority of Brazilians with only a basic education embrace him. Overall, a survey by the Datafolha polling group projects Mr. da Silva getting 61% of the vote compared with 39% for Mr. Alckmin.

There have always been social and regional divisions in Brazil, but they have been worsened by the two defining features of Mr. da Silva's administration: aggressive welfare spending and brazen corruption scandals. Mr. da Silva's program of providing cash subsidies to 11 million poor families has fired up fierce loyalty toward the president -- and antagonism toward Mr. Alckmin -- in working-class neighborhoods.

Meanwhile, scandals in Mr. da Silva's administration have turned off many members of the Southern middle class and elite who had voted for the president in 2002. In the latest impropriety last month, Workers Party operatives were caught with $770,000 that they allegedly intended to pay for a dossier damaging to an opposition candidate. That scandal, one of whose alleged masterminds was a favorite barbecue chef of Mr. da Silva's, sapped the president's support in the Oct. 1, first-round balloting and set the stage for Sunday's runoff.

Mr. da Silva has further heightened class tensions by arguing that corruption cases in his government are being blown out of proportion because of his humble background. "There is a reason I'm being persecuted," Mr. da Silva said last week. "It's a matter of skin, of social origin." He rails against "a small minority that has leeched from the country for 500 years." The divisions exposed during the campaign will likely haunt Mr. da Silva throughout his next four-year term, making it harder for Brazilians to unite behind the tough measures the country needs to boost a slow-growing economy.

Both sides have played on negative stereotypes. Earlier this month, the Workers Party Web site ran an item noting that the daughter of Mr. Alckmin, who is an anesthesiologist from the wealthy Southern state of São Paulo, had worked at a boutique that had been raided by tax authorities. His wife had gotten a gift of "400 chic dresses" from a leading fashion designer, the note said. Mr. Alckmin's wife said there were far fewer dresses and she donated them to charity.

A couple of weeks ago in the prosperous Southern city of Porto Alegre, a 69-year-old engineer was handing out stickers bearing the legend, "Out With Lula" and a drawing of a hand with four fingers inside a circle marked with a slash. A 42-year-old woman who is an activist in Mr. da Silva's Workers Party got into a shoving match with the man, who insisted he would "print another 20,000 stickers," according to the police report.

An anonymous email that has been circulating on the Web this month, under the title "The Solution Is Separating," showed a map of Brazil, divided between the North and South. Alongside the North was a photo of Mr. da Silva, and the phrase, "They get him." Alongside the South was a photo of Mr. Alckmin, captioned, "We get him." (The Alckmin campaign has deplored and disavowed responsibility for the email and the stickers, which have been turning up in several states.)

Though he has exploited class issues in this campaign, Mr. da Silva was often victimized by working-class stereotypes in three unsuccessful races for the presidency in the 1980s and 1990s. Finally, in the 2002 election, Mr. da Silva found a shrewd political consultant who gave him a makeover. Mr. da Silva had his teeth fixed and his beard trimmed and got a better tailor. He won in a landslide.

Then in 2005, prosecutors alleged that the Workers Party had operated a massive slush fund to finance campaigns and buy support in Congress. That has led to the resignation and indictment of many of the president's closest allies, including the consultant. Mr. da Silva, who hasn't been charged, claims a vendetta against his government by "the elites." Last year, Sen. Jorge Bornhausen, a top opposition figure, gleefully said that the scandals meant "we are going to get rid of this race for the next 30 years." Many people took "this race" to mean not only the Workers Party, but also Mr. da Silva's blue-collar supporters.

A few days later, billboards sprang up in the capital of Brasilia showing Mr. Bornhausen wearing a Nazi uniform and a toothbrush mustache, alongside the slogan: "Blacks, poor and blue-collar workers never again."

DOJ_NMG_0087124

Mr. Bornhausen has long been known for his fierce opinions, but even mainstream Brazilian culture is becoming more politically polarized, analysts say. Diogo Mainardi, a popular columnist for the huge newsweekly Veja, has emerged as the politically incorrect voice of affluent and educated Brazilians horrified by the prospect of four more years of Mr. da Silva. "Brazil isn't dominated by an evil elite," Mr. Mainardi wrote recently. "Brazil is dominated by a mass of ignorant poor people. They are deciding for us. And they are deciding very badly."

Veja is the Brazilian equivalent of Time magazine, with a circulation of 1.2 million, making it the largest newsweekly in Latin America.

Mr. Mainardi insists his provocative style has a serious purpose. He maintains Mr. da Silva's handlers have shielded the president from criticism by manipulating the guilt of middle-class Brazilians over Mr. da Silva's impoverished roots. To cut through the political packaging, Mr. Mainardi explains, "I almost force myself to say what can't be said." Of Mr. da Silva, he recently wrote, "I wouldn't even choose Lula to open and close the garage door of my apartment building."

The president's supporters say Mr. Mainardi and Veja are mouthpieces of an establishment that has it in for him. "Veja has some journalists who are deserving of the Nobel Prize for irresponsibility," Mr. da Silva said.

Cubans Begin To Just Say No (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Did Brazilian President Luiz Inácio "Lula" da Silva misspeak last week when he said that it's a pity that Fidel Castro did not democratize the island while "he was still alive"? Or did he inadvertently blurt out a secret that only friends of the Cuban regime are supposed to know?

Lula has corrected himself. But the rumor mills are in overdrive since the utterance of those four little words, in part because the last time Cubans were shown proof of life was more than a month ago and the patient looked pretty bad.

Whenever the old man finally passes away, a public statement is likely to be delayed until Fidel's little brother Raul, who as of now is only the "temporary" despot, feels sure he has the upper hand. As we go to press, that effort appears to be a work in progress.

At this time the military seems to be loyal to Raul. Nevertheless, the dictator in waiting has at least two reasons to be worried. The first is Hugo Chávez, who pours an estimated $2 billion into the Cuban economy annually and seems to believe that he is the rightful revolutionary successor to Fidel. Rumor has it that attitude is not going down too well with Raul or his men. As Brian Latell, former CIA analyst and author of "After Fidel" (Palgrave Macmillan, 2005), pointed out this week: "It may also be reasonable to speculate that Raul and his military commanders feel contempt for the mercurial and often bizarre Venezuelan, who rose no higher than lieutenant colonel in the decidedly less professional and accomplished Venezuelan military."

Fold into this mix the tension that already exists between elements of the regime that see themselves as ideologically pure and loyal to Fidel and Raul's army, which seems to enjoy making money -- as Mr. Latell describes so well in his book -- and all kinds of complications arise.

Yet Hugo and the fidelistas might be the least of Raul's troubles. Less noticed by the international press but at least as threatening are the island's dissidents, who are once again stirring things up, this time with their "non-cooperation campaign." While conventional wisdom discounts the movement as weak, disorganized and easily infiltrated, every action of the government suggests that popular resistance to the regime is spreading, even after a brutal wave of repression was unleashed more than a year ago.

It is also worth noting that Lula, a left-wing president of a country that has traditionally supported the Cuban dictatorship, has publicly lamented Castro's failure to democratize. That doesn't bode well for continued international support for the island slave plantation.

Non-cooperation is a strategy aimed at whittling away at the most fundamental tool of every totalitarian regime: fear. The system can survive only if each Cuban believes he is greatly outnumbered by lovers of the revolution and that in speaking out, he is doomed. This is why the regime risked so much bad press to crush the dissidents in March of 2003 in a brutal island-wide crackdown. Intense, debilitating fear must be kept alive if the regime is to survive.

Opponents of the regime also understand the power of fear and it is why they are hopeful about the non-cooperation campaign, which provides a passive way for Cubans to quietly discover solidarity. Rather than calling on citizens to actively rebel against the government, "non-cooperation" asks them simply to refuse to participate in the oppression.

The concept of non-cooperation was born in response to the government's practice of mobilizing neighbors to attack dissidents. This tactic, known as "acts of repudiation" is a longstanding totalitarian weapon. On Nov. 8 of last year Eliécer Consuegra Rivas, an activist in the eastern part of the country, graphically described how the regime was attempting to gin up hatred: "We, the human-rights activists, are being threatened before the public eye by representatives of the regime who claim we are going to poison the water, that we throw rocks, that we are terrorists, even that they will cut off our heads; they are threatening us with death.

"I would like to tell the people of Antilla that the municipal authorities are planning to collect signatures at the workplace in order to apply a label of 'dangerousness' to us and imprison us for our political stance," Mr. Consuegra said. "We encourage all workers to not accept this villainy and fallacy." The petition effort failed and non-cooperation was born.

A few months later the dissident movement's highly revered Jorge Luis Antúnez (pictured nearby) began echoing the call for non-cooperation from his prison cell in Camaguey. Mr. Antúnez is a Cuban hero. During his 16 years in the gulag he has been beaten, isolated for weeks at a time -- once for 47 days -- in tiny, filthy, rat-infested spaces with no windows or ventilation, and has consistently been denied medical care. (Harry Belafonte where are you?)

In January, Mr. Antúnez was allowed to make a phone call, using the moment to publicly endorse non-cooperation. On Aug. 4 he repeated his message: "We invite you not to cooperate with the repression and . . . to join those who defend your human rights, justice, and struggle for a free, pluralistic and prosperous society," Mr. Antúnez told his Cuban brethren.

For speaking out, Mr. Antúnez was thrown back in isolation. But it's likely he judges his gamble worth it. The idea is spreading and reports from the island say that local participation in repudiation squads is down. The government now has to bus thugs into neighborhoods where it organizes attacks.

The non-cooperation campaign is also aimed at the Cuban worker. With low pay and poor conditions, laborers have never been highly motivated. The campaign strives to link this reality to the politics of resistance. It could be generating results: Since the spring the regime has been complaining, in the state newspaper Granma, about inefficient workers, and in September Raul gave a speech at a labor convention exhorting the country's work force to improve productivity and discipline.

You won't learn much about this from the foreign media with bureaus in Havana or from correspondents or academics who visit Cuba. The quid pro quo for getting an island visa is good behavior toward the regime, and that means ignoring the groundswell of grumbling in politics and economics. Raul, on the other hand, is well-informed, which is probably why Fidel's "status" remains under wraps.

South African Government Tries To Unlock Economy (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, October 27, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — More than a dozen years after the demise of South Africa's apartheid regime, one out of every four workers is officially unemployed. Including those who've given up looking for work, the country's jobless rate is a staggering 40%.

Fearing that such persistently high joblessness threatens the stability of this multiracial African democracy, the government wants to rev up its slow-growing economy. The goal is to achieve an annual growth rate of 6% by 2014, double the average figure for the first decade of democratic rule, by eradicating a handful of “binding constraints.” Priorities include improving substandard education, accumulating foreign exchange reserves, and spending $49 billion over three years on new roads, ports and power plants.

Such robust growth would represent a big improvement for South Africa, but it would pale alongside the performance of fast-growing developing countries such as India or Vietnam. South Africa's ambitions also remain in the notable shadow of China, which over the past two decades has averaged 9.5% annual growth while lifting tens of millions of people from poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0087126

"I went to China last year; I was completely blown away," says Alan Hirsch, an adviser to President Thabo Mbeki and the architect of South Africa's new economic plan. "It's a very different system than ours. (But) when they decide to do something, they do it."

South Africa has made enormous strides since vanquishing race-based rule in 1994. It inherited from apartheid a pair of conjoined economies: a small first-world oasis of about 4 million whites and a deeply poor and deprived backwater for 40 million blacks. Strict race laws had prevented blacks from owning businesses, living outside designated areas or even having a telephone.

"White people had a GDP like Canada. Black people had a GDP like the Congo," says consultant Duma Gqubule.

Since apartheid's negotiated end, a sizable black middle class has emerged, acquiring new cars and patronizing upscale malls and restaurants in northern Johannesburg's suburban enclave of Sandton. In central Gauteng province, the heart of South Africa's economy, monthly new car sales of about 21,000 this year are almost double those of four years ago.

No one wants to trade this young democracy, whatever its inefficiencies, for Chinese authoritarianism. With a per-capita income of more than $5,000, the average South African is wealthier than the typical Chinese.

Yet South Africa's new formula for goosing the economy, developed with the aid of Harvard University economists, only illustrates the development challenge for countries that lack China's strengths: a stable currency, low-cost export factories, rivers of foreign investment and a decisive, unified government.

On each count, South Africa has been unable to match the Chinese. Its currency, the rand, has traveled a roller coaster through five separate shocks in 12 years. Apart from minerals, it has few exports of any consequence. And while the government has avoided the free-spending trap and rampant corruption so common elsewhere in Africa, it lacks a coherent strategy for capitalizing on globalization.

As public impatience with chronic unemployment mounts, South Africa's inability to attract foreign investment looms as a particular shortcoming. Funds from outside the country accounted for just 2.3% of capital formation in 2004 vs. 8% in China and 15.3% in Brazil. Even last year, when its figures improved sharply because of a large corporate acquisition, South Africa ranked 103 out of 141 countries on its ability to attract foreign direct investment, according to a United Nations scorecard.

"Clearly, we're way behind a lot of countries: certainly China, Brazil, the oil-exporting countries" in outside investment, says Hirsch. "We need more of it."

Still, South Africa's relative stability and prosperity, measured against the rest of the African continent, has made it a magnet for portfolio investment from abroad. All 94 U.S.-based emerging markets mutual funds have stakes in South African companies, according to Todd Moss, senior fellow at the Center for Global Development in Washington, D.C. "If you're in emerging markets, you have to be in South Africa," Moss said.

Net foreign investment on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange reached an all-time high this summer. Among the homegrown corporations with sizable foreign ownership is energy producer Sasol, one-third owned by foreigners, according to CEO Patrick Davies.

As Asia's economies discovered during that region's 1997 financial crisis, however, portfolio investment can exit a country as fast as it enters. Investment in tangible assets such as factories and machinery is less fickle; plus, foreign executives involved in building plants often bring more than cash. Foreign direct investment (FDI) also helps developing countries by transferring advanced technologies and first-world management skills.

"The importance of FDI is when it helps to promote a country's broader efficiency," says Stephen Gelb, executive director of The Edge Institute, a non-profit economic policy center in Johannesburg.

Perceptions of political risk may explain some of South Africa's poor showing, which lags behind even the African average. The country's ruling African National Congress surprised detractors by pursuing pro-market policies after winning power in South Africa's maiden democratic election in 1994. Nelson Mandela, elected president that year, inherited a budget deficit of more than 9% of GDP. Today, after years of shrewd management, public sector red ink has shrunk to just 0.3% of the economy. In the United States, it's 3.2% of GDP.

Foreign observers were slow to acknowledge that the new rulers weren't succumbing to pressures for massive redistribution of wealth from whites who had benefited from apartheid to blacks who had been locked out of economic power. Yet today, there is renewed controversy over the pace of what the government calls "black economic empowerment" and the transfer of land from white landowners to black would-be farmers.

As the ANC prepares to select next year a new party leader, who would be virtually certain to succeed Mbeki in 2009 as the country's president, powerful voices within the governing coalition are pushing for more focus on spreading the wealth to the black masses. The trade union federation COSATU and the small Communist Party are using the leadership battle to advocate greater social spending and faster progress on distributing economic gains to blacks, who make up more than 80% of the country's 46.9 million people.

COSATU, which claims 2 million members, also is resisting calls for the relaxation of labor laws that business leaders say unintentionally keep unemployment high. Employers say they are reluctant to hire new workers because it can be difficult and time-consuming to fire those who don't perform. To avoid involvement in often-protracted labor arbitration proceedings, Murray & Roberts, a giant engineering and construction firm, has subcontracted much of its hiring to labor brokers, says CEO Brian Bruce.

"You can't plan for an unemployment figure below 15% for a long time," says Bruce. "So we've just got to work out what it means to be in a growing economic environment with such a high unemployment rate."

It's been more than a decade since apartheid's historic collapse, more than a decade since Mandela completed his remarkable journey from prison to presidency. Yet, South Africa continues to struggle daily with the tangible legacy of generations of race-based rule. Vexing social problems, such as a recent surge in violent crime and the toll taken by one of the world's worst AIDS epidemics, spill over into the economic realm. Life expectancy at birth, about 47 years, is lower than in impoverished Bangladesh or chronically chaotic Haiti.

With blacks now full participants in South African life, it's apparent that the country has simply outgrown its physical limits. As the miles of vehicles crawling between Johannesburg and Pretoria attest, the road network that once adequately served a few million whites is no match for an ever-increasing number of black drivers.

The government has far-reaching plans to address its infrastructure shortcomings with new roads and a high-speed inter-city train, which are supposed to be ready in time for the 2010 soccer World Cup here. New roads. Labor reform. Better-trained workers. It's a daunting to-do list and one that some doubt the government can accomplish simultaneously.

"One of the dilemmas government faces is this is a country with really two economies: a first-world economy and a developing-world economy," says Solomon Ngubane, an official in the government communications ministry. "The question is: Where do you prioritize?"

In South Africa, A Dramatic Shift On AIDS (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

JOHANNESBURG -- The South African government is seeking to shake off years of international denunciation for its handling of the AIDS epidemic -- including a fixation on the supposed protective powers of beets and lemons -- while expanding treatment, testing and prevention programs, officials and activists say.

In public comments and private meetings over the past six weeks, Deputy President Phumzile Mlambo-Ngcuka has emphasized that the government now believes unequivocally that HIV causes AIDS, a connection that President Thabo Mbeki once publicly questioned. She has also said that antiretroviral drugs must be the centerpiece of the government's response while playing down the dietary recommendations long cited by Health Minister Manto Tshabalala-Msimang as key to fighting AIDS.

"The beetroot and all that lemon stuff is out the window," an adviser involved in recasting the government's policy said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about it. "These guys are now serious about getting it right."

Driving the recent change is a growing realization of the severity of AIDS in South Africa -- an estimated 5.4 million of 47 million citizens have HIV, among the highest totals in the world -- and concern that the controversy surrounding the disease was damaging the country's international reputation.

The Treatment Action Campaign, the country's leading AIDS activist group, said that after years of hostility and legal battles, government officials were working cooperatively with members to realize some of their long-standing demands, such as setting targets for dramatically expanding the availability of antiretroviral drugs through the public health system. Mlambo-Ngcuka, who has taken control of the national AIDS commission, has met privately with the group.

"There's clearly a shift taking place," said Zackie Achmat, the head of the Treatment Action Campaign.

Officials say that Tshabalala-Msimang, often ridiculed as "Dr. Beetroot," will maintain some role in AIDS policy, but activists say they are confident she has been effectively marginalized by the appointment of Mlambo-Ngcuka to oversee the government's response to the disease. Government officials privately acknowledge that Tshabalala-Msimang had become an embarrassment, and activists say the tenor of conversations with the government has changed dramatically since the deputy president took over.

"I'm still skeptical, and I'm still waiting for the proof," said Francois Venter, head of the Southern African HIV Clinicians Society. "But there's been a switch, the most hopeful switch in years, over the past four or five weeks."

Mbeki's comments questioning the relationship between HIV and AIDS stirred international outrage in 2000, and the government lagged even some less developed African nations in introducing subsidized antiretroviral drugs, which can prolong the lives of those with the disease by many years, perhaps decades. The first government program distributing the drugs began here in April 2004. South Africa's far smaller northern neighbor, Botswana, began two years earlier.

The South African program has grown steadily in the past 2 1/2 years and now reaches about 200,000 people with AIDS -- roughly one-quarter of those estimated to need the medicine immediately. But the demand for the drugs has grown faster than the program could handle despite major new government spending, including $400 million for AIDS programs this year alone.

"There were weaknesses on the implementation side of things," a government spokesman, Themba Maseko, said from Pretoria.

A turning point came in August, at the International AIDS Conference in Toronto, where Tshabalala-Msimang sponsored a display featuring lemons, beets and garlic but no antiretroviral drugs. An interview that Tshabalala-Msimang had with ABC's "Nightline" that same week renewed fears that she and Mbeki did not accept the two-decade-old scientific consensus that HIV causes AIDS.

"President Mbeki said, 'It cannot be the virus alone, we must look at other, other issues that predispose people to the immune system being depressed,' and I am of the same view also," Tshabalala-Msimang said on "Nightline."

The following day, Stephen Lewis, the U.N. special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, denounced the South African government's view as "wrong, immoral and indefensible." Two weeks after that, 81 AIDS scientists from South Africa and around the world signed a letter calling on Mbeki to fire Tshabalala-Msimang.

The president refused. But those events, combined with a government report blaming AIDS for a massive surge of deaths among South Africans in their 20s, 30s and 40s, prompted Mbeki to appoint Mlambo-Ngcuka to lead an urgent review of AIDS programs, pushing Tshabalala-Msimang out of the spotlight, officials say.

In a speech to labor leaders on Sept. 19, Mlambo-Ngcuka said, without qualification, that HIV causes AIDS. She acknowledged "shortcomings" in the government's response to the disease so far. She mentioned the value of a sensible diet but made clear its limits.

"It should be stressed that a healthy lifestyle and good nutrition are not alternatives to treatment," she said, according to a transcript.

Mlambo-Ngcuka also called for peace between the government and its many critics on AIDS. "Our collective response has for too long been undermined by finger-pointing and despair. I appeal to you that we change that," she said.

AIDS activists said they initially reacted warily, but after meeting privately with Mlambo-Ngcuka, including a session Tuesday in Cape Town that lasted nearly two hours, they have grown more confident of the government's desire to improve its handling of the disease.

The activists say they are pushing for several concessions, including a target of treating 1 million South Africans with antiretroviral drugs. They also want targets for expanding HIV testing and for cutting the rate of new infections. Prevention efforts have largely failed in South Africa, experts say, even as Zimbabwe and several East African countries are showing success in curbing new infections.

Maseko, the government spokesman, said that after years of resisting calls from activists, officials have decided to set firm targets for expanding prevention programs and the availability of antiretroviral drugs in the five-year government plan due for release Dec. 1, celebrated around the globe as World AIDS Day.

"We will be accelerating implementation to make sure those who need treatment are getting it," he said.

As discussions continue, activists say the shift in the government's intentions is tangible and hope officials are capable of carrying through on their new promises.

"They have lost at least five years," said Mark Heywood, head of the AIDS Law Project at Witwatersrand University in Johannesburg. "They're behind on prevention. They're behind on treatment. They're behind on planning for the social impact of HIV. But it's not too late to prevent a whole other generation of people from getting HIV."

AIDS Could Have Bigger Growth Effect (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, October 27, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — This nation's virulent AIDS epidemic may have a larger-than-expected impact on economic growth, sabotaging productivity gains and sharply inflating health care and training costs, economists say.

By 2010, AIDS will cut the annual economic growth rate by 1.5 percentage points, says Christo Luus, chief economist for Absa, the country's largest bank, and a member of a financial industry group studying the epidemic.

Other analyses have found smaller impacts. The Bureau for Economic Research in Stellenbosch, South Africa, last year concluded AIDS would trim no more than a half-point off annual growth rates. But Luus says the earlier studies were less comprehensive.

Almost one of every three adults here is infected with the HIV virus that causes AIDS. Every day, 1,000 people become infected. By 2015, total deaths from the disease will reach 5.4 million, vs. 1.8 million at the end of this year, the Actuarial Society of South Africa says.

By repeatedly sidelining workers, the disease can inflate training costs and complicate efforts to improve productivity. Yet, thanks to the availability of modern drugs and South Africa's labor surplus, the business community is relatively sanguine about the economic toll. “With the right programs, this is manageable, to use a cold-blooded term,” said Michael Spicer, chief executive of Business Leadership South Africa.

The epidemic's economic epicenter is the mining industry. Traditionally, laborers from remote provinces leave wives in their home villages to live for months in all-male dormitories at the mine.

Many mine workers become infected through casual sex with prostitutes who cluster around the company housing. When the workers return home for visits, they frequently infect their wives.

Amid a runaway epidemic that is outstripping government resources, some mining companies provide anti-retroviral drugs to their workers who test positive for the HIV virus. About 90% of those treated are able to return to work, says Spicer.

The cost of providing medicine is tiny compared with the fast profits. For Impala Platinum Holdings, AIDS is adding about $4 an ounce to its platinum mining costs, says CEO Keith Rumble. On world markets, an ounce of platinum fetches more than $1,000.

As Wells Dry Up, Mexico Could Be Forced To Privatize Oil (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY

Even as popular pressure grows around Latin America for a stronger state hand in developing natural resources such as oil and gas, Mexico's president-elect Felipe Calderón may be forced to consider putting more power in private hands.

The country's flagship oil company Pemex, has been a point of pride since the industry was wrenched from foreign hands and nationalized in 1938. Its revenues alone cover one-third of Mexico's budget.

But prosperity from years of record oil prices has allowed Mexico to postpone what most agree are much-needed reforms. And now, as production at Pemex's top oil field declines, pressure to find new fields is mounting. But industry analysts say

Mexico's constitutional restriction on foreign direct investment will hamstring costly exploration efforts, and possibly disrupt the flow of oil, 80 percent of which heads to the US.

Indeed, with his fragile political mandate, Mr. Calderón may find that oil becomes the issue that will define his presidency.

"This is an important first battle," says Benito Nacif, a political scientist at the Center for Research and Teaching in Economics (CRTE), a Mexico City think tank. "In the industry sector, there is a consensus that this reform is necessary, that you have to open it up [to the private sector]. The question is: 'Will [Calderón] be able to build sufficient [political] consensus?' "

Many industry analysts had hoped that outgoing President Vicente Fox would be able to push through energy-sector reforms to open up Pemex to more private direct investment, in order to boost exploration and production.

Mexico is the second-biggest supplier of oil to the US, favored because of its proximity and relative political stability.

In the end, Mr. Fox didn't push through a consitutional change, largely because trying to privative Pemex, even partially, is so politically unpopular.

Also, when Fox came to office in 2000, capacity at Cantarell, the world's second-largest field and Mexico's most important, was not in question. The complex, located in southern Gulf waters, actually increased production during Fox's term, peaking in 2004 with 2.1 million barrels a day.

But since then, production has been dropping off at Cantarell. David Shields, an independent energy expert in Mexico City, says production declined by 10 percent in the first six months of 2006. He contends that Pemex is in much worse shape than is publicly expressed. "Pemex says everything is great," he says. "But [Cantarell] is going to run out, and they [in the long-term] don't have other things to replace it."

Earlier this month, the state monopoly announced that crude output from another offshore field, Ku-Maloob-Zaap, was expected to double in 2009. That, Pemex officials said at a press conference, would help maintain oil production at an average 3.2 million barrels a day, and offset losses from Cantarell.

George Baker, an energy analyst at the consulting firm Energia.com in Houston, says he is not surprised by Pemex's announcement. "Pemex has a way of making magic," he says. Still, he says that potential finds in the Gulf of Mexico, similar to Chevron's recent announcement of a big discovery in US waters, are currently out of reach because Pemex does not have the technical know-how or money to undertake such exploration. The issues have been here all along, says Baker, but now that Cantarell is facing declines, "the slope downward is slipperier." US oil firms watching closely

Experts say that American companies are watching oil production in Mexico, but because of politics, cannot interfere by pushing for more foreign participation. If the US needed to purchase oil from more-distant countries, additional transportation costs would be passed onto the consumer, Baker says.

So far, Calderón has reiterated that he will not consider private direct investment. "There will be deliberations that we Mexicans will have in Congress to find the means by which Pemex can access the probable reserves, particularly in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico," he said at a September press conference. "But, for now, I will be very respectful of national legislation on the matter, which doesn't permit foreign investment in petroleum extraction...."

In its legislative agenda, his incoming administration has also remained unclear when it comes to its energy plans, focusing on the need to "modernize" and increase investment in Pemex.

"These things are very vague, one could interpret them as minor fiscal reforms, or ... major constitutional reforms," says Allyson Benton, an expert on economics and politics at the CRTE in Mexico City. "They want to wait to see what kinds of coalitions can be built around these things." Privatizing very unpopular

When it comes to obtaining gasoline here, drivers have only one, decidedly Mexican, choice: the green and red pumps at Pemex. That's the way many want it. Calderón barely squeaked out a victory in the July 2 election, winning by just half a percentage point. While his rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, disputed the race this summer, López Obrador used many of his protest gatherings to rally supporters about keeping foreigners out of the energy sector. Each appeal brought wild applause.

Indeed, the divided electorate means that Calderón is unlikely to find the political capital to challenge nationalization, even partially. "It is too much of a political danger for them under the conditions they won," says Miguel Tinker-Salas, an oil and politics expert at Pomona College in California.

DOJ_NMG_0087131

Mr. Shields puts it more starkly, saying that allowing international companies back into Mexico is tantamount to letting "the invader back in," he says. "There will be a revolution before there is foreign direct investment."

Those against foreign investment received a boost this month when businessman Carlos Slim, the third-richest man in the world according to Forbes magazine, announced that Mexico did not need foreign help to reach deep-sea oil.

Some analysts say that more foreign investment is not the only solution for Pemex. Mr. Tinker-Salas, for example, says that with more oversight, Pemex could become more efficient.

Ms. Benton says that Calderón might have the most room for change by addressing fiscal reform. One option would be to lift the heavy tax burden from Pemex, which sees nearly half of its earnings go to government coffers, so that Pemex can focus on daily operations. The budget is so stripped, she says, that Pemex has to import a significant portion of its refined products.

But some still hope that Calderón will be able to open the industry to more private participation, beyond the current flat-fee subcontracts that foreign companies can participate in. The long-ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), for example, moved to the right of the spectrum on the issue this election, says Mr. Nacif. The PRI is also more likely to cooperate with the Calderón administration because it is in a weaker position, having dropped to the third-largest party in Congress.

But more than anything, the reality of dwindling oil production may help to change sentiments. "One of the factors that drives policy change everywhere is the deterioration of the status quo," says Nacif, "and the perception is that the status quo is worsening. It's going to help [Calderón]" move toward opening the industry up to private firms.

Allies Dressed In Green (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Heidelberg, Germany

Since the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Western allies have been asking: What will replace the threat of communism as the cement that holds together the Atlantic alliance? Some have argued terrorism, but I don't think so. I think my German friends have the best idea: the issue that will and should unite the West is energy and all its challenges.

After all, nothing is a bigger threat today to the Western way of life and quality of life than the combination of climate change, pollution, species loss, and Islamist radicalism and petro-authoritarianism — all fueled by our energy addictions. And no solution is possible to these problems without concerted government actions to reduce emissions, to inspire green innovation and to shift from oil to renewable power.

Therefore, green is not just the new red, white and blue — the next great American national security project — it should also be the color, focus and cement of the Atlantic alliance in the 21st century. As a German official remarked to me, "The whole issue has the potential of becoming a big trans-Atlantic project at a time when we have no other good big project that [embodies] a vision."

The intertwined environmental and energy challenges we face today are so acute that they can no longer be addressed by "virtuous individuals hopping on a bus instead of taking the car," argued Jonathan Freedland, a columnist for the British newspaper The Guardian. "This is a job for government."

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, recently gave a major address on how "energy security will strongly influence the global security agenda in the 21st century." And Britain's foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, just delivered a speech declaring that climate change "is not just an environmental problem. It is a defense problem. It is a problem for those who deal with economics and development, conflict prevention, agriculture, finance, housing, transport, innovation, trade and health."

The fact that the foreign ministers are making this their agendas suggests that energy will soon move to the heart of the alliance's agenda. As Mr. Freedland put it, "If climate change is a foreign policy problem, foreign policy can surely be part of the climate change solution."

However, for what I call "geo-greenism" — thinking about green in strategic terms — to become the new core of the alliance, European greens will have to become more "geo" and the U.S. government more "green."

DOJ_NMG_0087132

European Green parties have tended to wrap their environmentalism in a very high-minded tone that was always more moralizing than strategic. For instance, Europe's Greens led the global campaign against genetically modified crops, which will be critically important if we want to grow more of our fuel — à la corn ethanol or soy biodiesel. The Greens in Germany also forced the previous government to agree to phase out Germany's nuclear power plants by 2021. That would mean uninstalling 30 percent of Germany's energy capacity. It would be great if it were all replaced by wind or solar power, but it will most likely be replaced by coal.

Jürgen Hogrefe, who was spokesman for the Green Party in Lower Saxony, Germany, in the 1980s, is today a senior executive with EnBW, a German energy company with nuclear plants.

"The Green Party has been extremely important for German society," he said, helping to transform the post-Nazi society into a more liberal domain. But an antinuclear stance has been at the core of the party, and now that the German mainstream has embraced a green agenda, the Greens need to rethink nuclear energy. "The Green Party should redefine itself," added Mr. Hogrefe. "In some fields they are very modern party. ... But concerning nuclear energy and ecology they are stubborn, not open enough to see what is happening around the globe."

One reason President Bush has failed to become the leader of the West is because he has failed to lead on green, which has become so important to all our allies. I doubt that he'll redefine U.S. policy in his last two years, but the issues around climate change and energy conservation are now rising so fast it's impossible to imagine that his successor won't — whoever it is. And once that happens, it is impossible to imagine that living green, instead of fighting reds, won't become the new glue of the Atlantic alliance.

Or as Hermann Ott, head of the Berlin office of the Wuppertal Institute for Climate, Environment and Energy, remarked to me, "We don't need aliens to unite our world, we have a problem right at the center" now — and the solution is green.

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. AG Says He May Consider Proposal To Investigate Updating Geneva Conventions (AP)

By Mike Corder, Associated Press

AP, October 27, 2006

THE HAGUE, Netherlands (AP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday the Bush administration may consider a Dutch proposal to set up an international group to investigate updating the Geneva Conventions or establishing a new treaty to deal with the threat of global terrorism.

In a speech Tuesday at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., Dutch Foreign Minister Ben Bot said it was legitimate to question whether international law _ framed mainly to deal with armed conflict between nations and conventional armies _ needs updating.

"Suggestions to explore such options as an additional protocol to the Geneva Conventions or a new ... Terrorism Convention or Treaty, cannot be dismissed out of hand," Bot said. "As I have suggested to Dutch Parliament, we should create a trans-Atlantic group of eminent experts to identify these possibilities."

After visiting Dutch ministers in The Hague, Gonzales told reporters Washington was not formally investigating updating international law, but he added: "We are not averse to looking at that."

"Obviously, we assess every day what is effective in dealing with the threat against the United States, in dealing with the threat against our friends and allies around the world," Gonzales said. "And this would be another thing I think that we would look at to see: do we have the necessary legal tools to deal effectively with terrorism?"

Facing a barrage of criticism from opponents and human rights groups about its incarceration of terror suspects at the Guantanamo Bay naval base in Cuba and the system of military tribunals set up to try them, Gonzales stressed that the Bush administration still fully supports current international law aimed at protecting the rights of those captured during armed conflicts.

"Obviously we want to be careful in not sending the message that we are in any way backing away from the principles of, say, the Geneva Conventions in terms of the protection of basic human rights," he said. "That's something we believe very strongly in and re-examination of Geneva would have to be done ... with the understanding that we all remain committed to the basic principles of the Geneva Conventions."

Gonzales is touring European capitals discussing Washington's new law paving the way for trials of terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

The administration's original legal framework for trying the suspects at military tribunals was rejected by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional, leading Washington to revamp the process.

U.S. President George W. Bush signed the act into law last week after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the legislation. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

In Germany, U.S. Official Addresses Rift With Allies (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, October 26, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 25 — Seeking to heal one of the deepest rifts between the United States and its European allies, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said here on Wednesday that the Bush administration had done a poor job of explaining its legal principles in its effort to prevent terrorism.

But he also faulted European countries, which have criticized the American military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. He said they were reluctant to take back their own citizens when released and had been insufficiently helpful in negotiating with other countries for the safe return of prisoners facing mistreatment in their own lands.

“We have repeatedly asked our European allies to join in these efforts,” Mr. Gonzales said in a speech to a polite, skeptical invited audience. “But despite demands that Guantánamo be closed, the United States has received little help from our European allies regarding the fate of these detainees.”

The diplomatic initiative by Mr. Gonzales comes amid growing concern over the conduct of German soldiers, including photographs that surfaced on Wednesday that appeared to show German troops in Afghanistan posing with a human skull.

Mr. Gonzales declined to name the countries he said were being uncooperative with regard to returned prisoners — especially, he said, while standing on a podium “in this great country.”

DOJ_NMG_0087137

His comment, delivered with a thin smile, seemed to suggest that Germany was among those the United States regarded as laggards.

Germany's responsiveness has come under scrutiny in the case of Murat Kurnaz, a Turkish-German man who was imprisoned at Guantánamo for more than four years, partly because of Germany's reluctance to take him back. Last August, Mr. Kurnaz was finally returned home, eight months after a new chancellor, Angela Merkel, raised his case in a meeting with President Bush.

In general, however, Mr. Gonzales seemed intent on reaching out to Europeans rather than rebuking them.

"There has been a lot of friction" in the trans-Atlantic relationship, he said. "We are partly to blame for that. We didn't do as good a job as we should have from the outset in explaining ourselves."

Mr. Gonzales, the legal architect of some of the Bush administration's toughest policies toward suspected terrorists, said he was deeply disappointed that many people overseas did not believe that the United States, or Mr. Bush himself, were committed to protecting the rule of law.

He defended American policies on the detention of "enemy combatants," the rights afforded them by military commissions, and the role of the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of prisoners.

Mr. Gonzales's European tour, which includes stops in Spain and the Netherlands, coincides with a growing concern here that Germany has compromised its own principles in helping the United States in its worldwide effort against terrorism. It also comes at a time when Germany published a proposed new defense policy that would pave the way for the country to play a bigger role in international peacekeeping missions.

There are no fewer than five formal investigations under way here relating to terrorism and the German military. The issues raised include accusations that the Central Intelligence Agency transferred prisoners to secret prisons in Eastern Europe, and questions about whether the German government was aware of such transfers, as well as whether German soldiers mistreated Mr. Kurnaz in Afghanistan, as he contends, before he was sent to Guantánamo.

The Defense Ministry denies that German soldiers abused Mr. Kurnaz. But the military has opened an investigation into his accusations.

"Our guys are supposed to be in Afghanistan to help stabilize things, not to kick around prisoners," said Volker Perthes, director of the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "This embarrasses us and qualifies a bit our discussion about what American soldiers are doing in Abu Ghraib."

The photos that appear to show the German troops posing with a human skull have added to the concerns. Some of the photos, published Wednesday in the mass-market newspaper Bild, depict the soldiers placing the skull on the hood of a jeep as a grisly emblem.

Bild did not say how it had obtained the photos. The paper said they were taken in 2003 near Kabul, and involved German troops serving as part of the international security force in Afghanistan.

The defense minister, Franz Josef Jung, has ordered an investigation. "Such activities are diametrically opposed to the values and behavior we teach our troops," he said to Bild.

Reports of military abuse carry an obvious historical echo in Germany, Mr. Perthes said, and could generate opposition in Parliament to the country's continuing involvement in Afghanistan.

In particular, there are questions about the deployment of soldiers belonging to an elite rapid-response unit of the German Army known as the KSK. The activities of these troops in Afghanistan are cloaked in mystery.

Parliament is also investigating whether the German government was aware of the possible C.I.A. activities in Europe. That has put Mrs. Merkel in an awkward position, since her foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, was a high-level adviser to her predecessor, Gerhard Schröder.

The previous government is also under scrutiny in the case of Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen who was abducted in Macedonia in 2003 and turned over to American agents, who flew him to Afghanistan, on the mistaken belief that he was involved in terrorism.

Somewhere it is written in the Book of Politics that when the race gets tight, the leaders call in the Scribes. It is for this reason that I found myself at LaGuardia Airport Wednesday enroute to an afternoon meeting in the Oval Office with President Bush. That would be followed by lunch the next day with the vice president. The airport deserves mention because the very small group of writers who sat with the president was in fact exponentially larger than the number of travelers there who stopped to watch his 10:30 a.m. news conference on the TV monitors.

Two weeks from an election, perhaps their minds are made up. The president's certainly is. "This war is different than the other wars we've been in," Mr. Bush said a few hours after his news conference while sitting beneath a portrait of George Washington. "If we leave, they will follow us here."

Meetings with the president at election time are overtly political, but the remarkable irony here was how little election politics came up in our discussion. Mr. Bush talked expansively about Iraq, the Maliki government, Iran, Syria, North Korea and the broader war on terror. When his own party's infatuation with immigration was raised, Mr. Bush briefly ticked off his own thoughts on immigration policy and swung back to this:

"I'm campaigning like mad, and I'm looking at people in the eye and saying, you better have a government that does everything in its power to protect you from attack. You're right here in the office where I get briefed every morning and I'm telling you it's on my mind, and I can't keep it off my mind. I was affected deeply by the attacks of September the 11th. It became clear to me that day that we were at war. I know we're at war."

The room in which Mr. Bush is briefed every morning on the war, the Oval Office, is a cheerful room, full of light along high lemon-yellow walls. There are fine busts of Abraham Lincoln, Winston Churchill and Dwight Eisenhower, and the Washington painting. These icons of Mr. Bush's political formation no doubt were chosen after his first inauguration. But it is hard not to notice that the room today is occupied full time by three former war presidents and a prime minister of war.

The Oval Office today is a war room, and this is a war presidency. In these most partisan of times, Mr. Bush barely mentions the media and not once utters the word "Democrats." But as in 2004, we are again going to the polls to vote on national security. With Baghdad a cauldron of violence, this is the fight the Democrats say they want, and the one they are going to get Nov. 7. However many Republican candidates are separating themselves from Mr. Bush's war, the president is guaranteeing that the subject goes to the voters.

What struck me Wednesday was how Mr. Bush's public news conference was almost wholly about the Iraqis and their government, and how his private conversation with us was mostly about the stakes for the American people. Over these war years, there should have been more of the latter. Admittedly, it is difficult to convey in public the urgency about the war on terror that Mr. Bush conveys in private. But it is obvious that he regards the threat to the American people as palpable.

"My biggest issue that I think about all the time," Mr. Bush says, "is the next attack on America, because I am fully aware that there are people out there that would like nothing more than to have another spectacular moment by killing American people. And they're coming. And we've got to do everything we can to stop them. That's why we need to be on offense all the time." This, he insists, is the justification for the terrorist wiretaps, the Patriot Act, the interrogations and the Iraq war.

Mr. Bush goes on offense himself in the kind of plain speech that maddens his detractors but may endear him in the heartland: "Maybe it's not nuanced enough for some of the thinkers and all that stuff -- that's fine. But that's exactly what a lot of people like me think."

On the nation's sense of frustration: "You don't have to tell me people are out there looking for something. I'm from Texas. My buddies are saying, 'Are you doing enough?' -- not, 'Are you doing too little?' They want to know, 'Are we winning?' They want to know, this mighty country, are we doing what it takes to win?"

The burden of war, however, has not sapped Mr. Bush physically as it did Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon. Recalling the deep toll that war and partisanship imposed on their presidencies, I looked closely at Mr. Bush for similar evidence: none. The hair's gone gray, but there is little sign of fatigue in his face or demeanor. I asked how he stays normal: "Prayer and exercise."

He dismisses the notion that Iraq is a mistake or a distraction: "This stuff about how Iraq is causing the enemy . . . whatever excuse they need, they have made up their mind to attack and they grab onto things to justify. If it's not Iraq, it's Israel. If it's not Israel, it's the Crusades. If it's not the Crusades, it is the cartoon."

Still, it's evident that Baghdad's sectarian violence has sent the U.S mood into a trough. The next day in a similar conversation with Vice President Cheney -- ballast to the energy of his president -- I ask if he senses a nation veering again toward the disillusion of the Vietnam War. He says no. "9/11 changes a lot. It's a watershed event and makes it more difficult for someone to argue that if we just bring the troops home we'll be safe and secure behind our oceans. The threat is there and it's real."

No matter the election results, it's obvious this president won't step back. He says, "We will press and press and press to protect ourselves. . . . If this country lets down its guard, it will be a fatal mistake."

Maybe it's too much. Maybe the country, or most of it this fall, doesn't share Mr. Bush's desire to be on offense all the time. Maybe they think he's exaggerating the threat for political effect. Maybe. But with or without a Republican Congress, if the country has a commander in chief who feels this deeply about protecting American soil from another 9/11 for at least another two years, it's fine by me.

Cheney Endorses Simulated Drowning (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 27, 2006

Dick Cheney, US vice-president, has endorsed the use of "water boarding" for terror suspects and confirmed that the controversial interrogation technique was used on Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, the senior al-Qaeda operative now being held at Guantánamo Bay.

Mr Cheney was responding to a conservative radio interviewer who asked whether water boarding, which involves simulated drowning, was a "no-brainer" if the information it yielded would save American lives. "It's a no-brainer for me," Mr Cheney replied.

The comments by the vice-president, who has been one of the leading advocates of reducing limitations on what interrogation techniques can be used in the war on terror, are the first public confirmation that water boarding has been used on suspects held in US custody.

A spokeswoman for Mr Cheney denied that he had endorsed or confirmed the use of water-boarding.

"The VP was talking about the interrogation programme, clearly noting that we do not torture and we live up to our international treaty obligations. He does not discuss any techniques or methods that may or may not be used in questioning," said Lea Anne McBride.

Mr Cheney said recent legislation passed by Congress allowed the White House to continue its aggressive interrogation programme.

But his remarks appear to stand at odds with the views of three key Republican senators who helped draft the recently passed Military Commission Act, and who argue that water boarding is not permitted according to that law.

"[It's] a direct affront to the primary authors of the Military Commission Act in the Senate – John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner – all of whom have publicly stated that the legislation signed by the president last week makes water boarding a war crime," said Jennifer Daskal, advocacy director at Human Rights Watch. "This is Cheney ignoring the consensus of his own Pentagon," she said, referring to comments by senior officials that harsh interrogation techniques do not produce reliable intelligence.

John Bellinger, the State Department legal adviser, last week declined to answer specific questions on water boarding, saying Congress would have to determine whether specific interrogation techniques were permissible under the Geneva -conventions.

The Bush administration was forced to work with Congress to pass the Military Commissions Act after the Supreme Court ruled that al-Qaeda suspects were entitled to some protections under the Geneva convention. "Any procedures going forward would have to comply with the standards of Common Article 3 [of the Geneva conventions], including the prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment . . . ," Mr Bellinger said. "Congress would have to agree that they are permitted under the law."

Asked in the radio interview whether he would agree that the debate over terrorist interrogations and water boarding was "a little silly", Mr Cheney responded: "I do agree".

"I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation," he said.

Cheney's Remarks Fuel Torture Debate (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0087140

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Vice President Cheney said this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water during questioning was a "no-brainer," prompting complaints from human rights advocates that he was endorsing the use of a controversial technique known as waterboarding on prisoners held by the United States.

In an interview Tuesday with Scott Hennen, a conservative radio show host from Fargo, N.D., Cheney agreed with Hennen's assertion that "a dunk in water" may yield valuable intelligence from terrorism suspects. He also referred to information gleaned from Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the captured architect of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, but stopped short of explicitly saying what techniques were used.

"Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Hennen asked.

"Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Cheney said, "but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

The comments underscore continuing uncertainty over precisely which techniques can be used legally during CIA interrogations of terrorism suspects. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and other lawmakers have said recent legislation that established ground rules for interrogations should effectively bar waterboarding and other methods that are viewed as violations of the Geneva Conventions and U.S. criminal law.

Bush administration officials have repeatedly declined to say which techniques they believe are permitted under the new law and have steadfastly declined to discuss methods used in the past.

Numerous sources have said that the CIA subjected Mohammed and other "high-value" terrorism suspects to waterboarding, a technique that gives the prisoner the sensation of drowning.

A Cheney spokeswoman said yesterday that he was not confirming the use of any specific interrogation techniques.

"He was talking about the interrogation program without torture," spokeswoman Lee Anne McBride said. "The vice president does not discuss any techniques or methods that may or may not have been used in questioning."

Congress passed legislation last month putting limits on interrogation techniques that can be used on prisoners declared to be "unlawful enemy combatants." Lawmakers largely left it to the executive branch to decide whether many techniques would be legal.

The U.S. Army revised its field manual last month to ban waterboarding and other techniques as "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment" outlawed by the Geneva accords. Military officials said experience had shown that abusive techniques do not work in yielding reliable intelligence from prisoners.

John Sifton, a senior researcher on terrorism and counterterrorism at Human Rights Watch, said Cheney's comments seem to both endorse waterboarding and suggest its use on Mohammed and other prisoners.

"I think the context is clear that he's agreeing that what the interviewer suggested -- dunking people in water to interrogate them -- is a no-brainer," Sifton said. "Basically, what the vice president did is inject ambiguity into a situation in which Congress and the military thinks there is no ambiguity."

Neal Sonnett, chairman of an American Bar Association task force on enemy combatants, said Cheney's comments were "a little equivocal" on details but clear in their overall meaning.

"It may be too much to characterize it as a direct admission," Sonnett said. "But he is certainly suggesting that he doesn't see anything wrong with waterboarding."

In waterboarding -- one of a number of drowning-simulation techniques that date to the Spanish Inquisition -- a prisoner is generally strapped down with his feet higher than his head. Water is then poured on his face while his nose and mouth are covered by a cloth. The technique produces an intense sensation of being close to suffocation and drowning, according to interrogation experts and human rights advocates.

The Khmer Rouge and other outlaw regimes have employed the method, and it has been condemned by many human rights and military lawyers as a clear example of illegal torture.

In 1947, the United States prosecuted a Japanese soldier for war crimes and sentenced him to 15 years hard labor for using the technique on a U.S. prisoner.

Israeli Agent Tells How Suspect Admitted Meeting Terrorists (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

October 26, 2006 (CHICAGO) - An Israeli security agent told a courtroom cleared of spectators Thursday how a suburban Chicago grocer admitted under days of questioning that he had met secretly with Palestinian terrorist leaders.

"Did you think that he had information that could lead to an imminent threat to human life?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Reid J. Schar asked. "Yes," said the agent who testified under the one-name alias Nadav rather than his real name out of concern for possible reprisals. The testimony came at the racketeering trial of Muhammad Salah, 53, of suburban Bridgeview and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va. They are accused of bankrolling Hamas terrorists and have pleaded not guilty to the indictment. Prosecutors say they were part of a U.S.-based cell that furnished money and fresh recruits to the group that wants to overthrow the State of Israel and replace it with a Palestinian government.

Nadav was granted permission not only to testify under an alias but to appear on the stand in disguise. Reporters were able to see the prosecutor and listen to the testimony, through a translator, on television in a separate courtroom where the audio was sometimes less than sharp.

Before even entering the separate courtroom, five floors from where the trial was taking place, reporters were required to pass through a metal detector. Comet, an explosives-sniffing Labrador retriever who is a familiar face at the courthouse, shuttled between the two rooms.

Salah was arrested in January 1993 as he tried to enter Israel from the Gaza Strip and served four and a half years in prison after making a series of admissions about his ties to the Hamas terrorist organization.

The same admissions obtained by Nadav and other interrogators are now being used as evidence by federal prosecutors at the racketeering trial.

Salah says that the admissions were tortured out of him.

By contrast Nadav testified he built a close rapport with Salah and that the two men ate salad and drank tea together between questionings.

Salah's attorneys maintain that Israel's Shin Bet security service, of which Nadav is a member, used a so-called good-cop, bad-cop technique in which one interrogator is very tough while the other professes friendship.

They say Nadav was the so-called good cop.

Nadav testified that Salah readily admitted meeting with Adil Awadallah, allegedly the Hamas military leader in the Ramallah area.

"Did the defendant Salah tell you about a second meeting with Adil Awadallah?" Schar asked. Nadav said that he did.

"Did he tell you about providing any money to Awadallah?" Schar asked.

"Yes," Nadav said. He said Salah told him he agreed to provide the alleged Hamas commander with $60,000 and "this is what actually happened."

Nadav said Salah also told of meeting with other terrorist leaders.

Salah defense attorney Erica Thompson objected, saying the message to the jury was that Salah knew high-level terrorists. Salah maintains he was actually delivering money to Palestinian charities.

"This is insidious," Thompson said. Judge Amy J. St. Eve told the jury the testimony was not being offered as proof that the individuals named were actually terrorists but only to show what Nadav believed.

After his arrest, Israeli security men searched Salah's East Jerusalem hotel room and found $100,000 in cash.

Nadav testified that at the end of January, he made a deal with Salah who agreed to provide a map to the whereabouts of the remains of an Israeli soldier who had been kidnapped and murdered by Hamas terrorists.

But he said that Salah's wife told him in a telephone conversation that the map had been destroyed. Salah drew a version of the map from memory and an all-night search followed but the remains were not found.

Nadav testified that the Israelis agreed in return for help in finding the body to return the $100,000 and free a number of female prisoners.

Ga. Terror Case Files To Stay Open (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 27, 2006

A federal magistrate Thursday denied prosecutors' attempts to seal court documents containing unclassified material in the case of two Atlanta area men held on terrorism-related charges.

Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn G. Brill ruled that prosecutors' requests were too broad and "would seal (at least initially) virtually all filings" and impose a "significant administrative burden on the court."

Prosecutors in the case of Syed Haris Ahmed and Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, who are charged with providing material support to terrorists, had argued that unclassified but "sensitive" information handed over to defense attorneys could not be used in further court pleadings unless first put under seal. The judge then would have had to determine what could be released to the public and what could not.

Prosecutors said such "sensitive" information might disclose ongoing investigations, implicate people who are not charged with crimes and shine light on foreign governments' operations.

Brill wrote that, if the government wants unclassified information to remain under seal, it must "narrowly tailor" its arguments for doing so — not seek a blanket order.

Classified information that is turned over to the defense will be kept in a secure room where lawyers can go to view it. If defense attorneys want to quote any classified information in their motions, they must turn the documents over to a court security officer, who's charged with producing filtered versions for the public file.

The case highlights the difficulty of trying suspects in terrorism-related cases using foreign intelligence and other sensitive and classified information.

Tom Clyde, attorney for The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, the Associated Press and WSB-TV, said that the prosecution's arguments for enhanced secrecy was a "reversal of the presumption of openness" and "is plainly unworkable."

"The order reflects that fact that our court system is founded on a principle of openness," Clyde said Thursday. "Even in a terrorism case, the government does not get a free pass to litigate the case in secret. If the government wants to have records sealed, it is going to have to demonstrate why that is necessary."

Sadequee, 20, of Roswell, and Ahmed, 21, a former Georgia Tech student, are accused of traveling to Canada in March 2005 and meeting with others to discuss "violent jihad." The two men allegedly took "casing videos" of potential targets in Washington in April 2005 and discussed an attack on Dobbins Air Reserve Base in Marietta.

Suspected Terrorists To Face Hearings (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba-Fourteen high-profile suspected terrorists recently transferred to the Guantanamo detention center are expected to face hearings soon, military officials said Wednesday.

Brig. Gen. Ed Leacock, deputy commander of detention operations at Guantanamo Bay, said officials are gathering evidence for the hearings now. Officials have also identified individuals who could work with the men as their representatives during the hearings, but no appointments have been made yet.

It was not clear Wednesday whether any of the 14 men have been questioned by the military interrogators. The hearings - officially called Combatant Status Review Tribunals - for the 14 men would determine whether or not they are enemy combatants, and therefore subject to a military trial.

The 14 men include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who allegedly planned the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, as well as the alleged architect of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole and the alleged plotter of the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

They had been held in CIA custody at secret locations, and were transferred several weeks ago to the Guantanamo Bay detention center in southeastern Cuba.

Military leaders, who took a few reporters on a tour of the detention center Wednesday, said the 14 high-profile detainees have not created any problems for the guards. And they said other detainees know the men are there, but have had little reaction to that.

The defense officials, including Cully Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, also would not say where the men are being held at the facility - which includes five separate camps and a sixth one to be completed in a few months, a maximum security building. Some portions of the camps are not being used because of ongoing repairs and upgrades, including fixing damage done during an uprising by some 20 detainees earlier this year.

Stimson also said he expects military tribunals for some of the other detainees could begin as early as next spring. Officials have drafted new rules and procedures for the military trial that were authorized by a law signed last week by President Bush.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that trying detainees in military tribunals violated U.S. and international law, so Bush urged Congress to change the law. Six weeks later, after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the bill, Bush signed the new law.

Leacock said engineers and planners have been at the facility this week and would be making recommendations for a courthouse complex for the military commissions when they begin next year.

The plans would include housing and media facilities, as well as added security.

Two options would be presented to Pentagon leaders that could include anywhere from a few to 10 new courtrooms. Stimson said there was "very little difference between the two" options.

Members of Congress would also weigh in on the decision because appropriators would have to find funding for the construction. Staff from the appropriations committees are planning to visit the facility soon. Defense officials had no cost estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0087143

Construction will take longer than other similar projects because all the materials will have to be delivered by barge to Guantanamo Bay, said Leacock.

Previously 10 detainees had been charged with war crimes, and it is expected that they would be charged again under the new law. Officials expect to charge another 60 to 80 detainees, and bring them to trial.

The Guantanamo tour came just one week after the military began a new investigation into alleged prisoner abuse at the detention facility. Army Col. Richard Basset is looking into allegations, made by a Marine sergeant, that guards she met bragged about hitting detainees and denying them water.

There are currently 435 detainees at the prison, most considered enemy combatants. About 120 have been approved for transfer to either their home countries or another nation that was willing to accept them.

U.S. Seeks To Limit Detainees' Contact (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-The U.S. government has proposed limiting contact between defense lawyers and detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to court documents.

The government argues that it must restrict the detainees' communications, as news of world events could incite the prisoners to violence.

The U.S. proposed the rules in a filing to a federal appeals court in Washington that was examined by The Associated Press. The case deals with an Afghani detainee but the government wants them to apply to other prisoners at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba. The prison camp holds some 430 detainees.

The rules, which would apply to detainees pursuing court challenges to their designations as "enemy combatants," would tighten censorship of mail from attorneys and give the military more control over what lawyers can discuss with their clients, according to the filing.

The number of face-to-face meetings between defense attorneys and detainees would be limited to four total. There are now no restrictions on the number of times they can meet, although lawyers' access to the base is already hampered because it is so remote.

The government says current rules have allowed detainees to receive books or articles about terrorist attacks in Iraq, London and Israel, as well as details of the prisoner abuse investigation at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In the court filing, which was first reported Wednesday by The Boston Globe, a military lawyer said security at Guantanamo Bay has been threatened by the introduction of a book on Abu Ghraib, a speech given at an Amnesty International conference about the war on terror, and other materials.

"Such materials could incite detainees to violence, leading to a destabilization of the camp," wrote Navy Cmdr. Patrick M. McCarthy.

The government petition was filed in August in the case of Haji Bismullah, an Afghanistan native who is among several Guantanamo detainees represented by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

Currently, mail from lawyers is examined only for physical contraband. The proposed rules call for all of a detainee's mail to be examined for forbidden information.

Wells Dixon, an attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, said he suspects the proposal is aimed at controlling the information coming out of Guantanamo. Accounts from defense lawyers who have visited Guantanamo have cast doubt on government assertions that most detainees are hardened terrorists, Dixon said.

"What's happening is the government wants to hide this indisputable fact," he said "They're not happy we've been able to bring a lot of these developments to light."

In 2004, the Supreme Court said detainees can contest the legality of their detentions. A law signed by President Bush on Oct. 17 bars detainees from protesting their detentions in court, but they still have a right to challenge their designations as "enemy combatants." The new rules would restrict legal representation for those challenges.

The Paradox Behind The Paralysis On Security (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087144

A theory that explains the chaotic world of 2006 -- one where people from Baghdad to Beijing seem unable to cooperate on projects that would make them better off -- was written more than 40 years ago by an obscure American economist named Mancur Olson Jr. His short 1965 book, "The Logic of Collective Action," explained why big groups, including nation-states, cannot agree on actions that are in their common interest.

You can see this perverse "logic" at work in nearly all the conflicts that vex the planet today. The divisive political dynamic that blocks collective solutions -- what Olson described as the "surprising tendency for the exploitation of the great by the small" -- is apparent even in the United States. But I'm going to stick to foreign examples.

Start with Iraq, the conflict that is grinding up U.S. soldiers and Iraqi civilians in horrifying numbers. Iraqis know they would all be better off if they could agree on a national compact that would subordinate sectarian differences to the larger national interests of stability and prosperity. Their leaders keep pledging support for this goal, but it doesn't happen.

Why? Olson, who taught at the University of Maryland until he died in 1998, explained the underlying problem this way: "Unless the number of individuals in a group is quite small, or unless there is coercion or some other special device to make individuals act in their common interest, rational, self-interested individuals will not act to achieve their common or group interests."

The problem, he said, is that although everyone would benefit from the collective good of, say, greater security, it's irrational for any individual to make voluntary sacrifices to achieve it.

I put a version of this dilemma to L. Paul Bremer in Baghdad in January 2004, when he was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority. In an interview in the Green Zone, I said that although people were describing him as an imperial proconsul, his situation seemed closer to that of a bankruptcy trustee: If one of his three big creditors -- the Shiites, the Sunnis and the Kurds -- decided to push for unilateral advantage and "call their loans," they would drive the enterprise into ruin. But if Bremer could coax the parties toward an agreement, everyone would emerge better off.

Bremer's initial response to the bankruptcy analogy was unforgettable: "Is that Chapter 7, or Chapter 11?" he asked. He went on to say that, like a bankruptcy trustee, he had to believe that the parties around the table were rational.

But individual rationality often pushes us toward solutions that are collectively ruinous. That was Olson's point. He was writing at a time when most social scientists embraced upbeat theories about the inherent cohesiveness of politics. He showed why this optimism was misplaced. It was, in fact, irrational for any individual to pay taxes voluntarily to support an army; better to let your neighbor pay, and get the benefit for free. Groups that acted voluntarily for the common interest were "composed of either altruistic individuals or irrational individuals," he wrote.

Iran illustrates the Olson problem. Every Iranian I encountered on a recent trip there expressed a belief that this is Iran's moment to emerge as a leading political and economic force in the Middle East. But to get this collective benefit every Iranian wants, the country's leaders will have to limit a nuclear program that some Iranians want. Olson would tell us that, absent compulsion, it isn't going to happen: Powerful pressure groups will prevent the collective good.

An Olson problem also afflicts North Korea's neighbors as they deal with its nuclear weapons program. China, Russia, Japan, South Korea and the United States would all be better off if they had stopped Kim Jong Il before he detonated a bomb. But it's like fixing potholes. It was easier to wait for someone else to do it -- for Washington to wait for Beijing and vice versa. And, of course, the job never got done.

Olson's escape from this conundrum was his recognition that it's necessary to compel the collective behavior that is in everyone's interest. Workers must be compelled to join a union; otherwise, they'll freeload. Citizens must be required by law to pay taxes; otherwise, they won't do it. Sectarian groups must be forced to obey the national government; otherwise they will create anarchy. And individual nations must be compelled to obey rules limiting the spread of nuclear technology and other threats to common security. Otherwise, we will have unending wars.

In the international arena, the appropriate instrument of compulsion is not, as the Bush administration has believed, the United States. It is the United Nations. Making the United Nations effective enough that it can compel the common good is the right answer to Olson's paradox.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Chief Says Politics Ignored In Rise Of Corruption Probes (AP)

By Ron Jenkins, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY - The FBI has stepped up public corruption investigations since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorists attacks and is pursuing current probes with no thought of the upcoming elections, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0087145

Story continues below advertisement

Mueller, in Oklahoma City for a rare visit, his second since becoming director five years ago, said when the FBI prioritized its national security mission after 9-11, it also made public corruption its No. 1 priority in criminal investigations.

The result has been a surge in public corruption convictions. "In the last two years, we have had upward of 1,070 convictions of public officials who have abused the (public) trust."

"Having made that a priority, each of the divisions has looked for areas in which there has been or appear to be public corruption and addressed it with investigations followed up with successful prosecutions."

The FBI also has established a separate Web site for the public to report suspected corruption.

Mueller declined to address questions on specific investigations, such as the congressional page scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., entering alcohol treatment after disclosure he had made sexually implicit text messages to teenage male pages.

He would not speculate on how long the page scandal probe would last.

But he said politics "does not influence" the course of FBI corruption investigations.

"We continue our investigations, regardless of the politics of the time. Investigations have gone on as if there were no elections coming up."

Oklahoma interest in the page scandal has been peaked by the disclosure that Jordan Edmund, former deputy campaign manager for GOP gubernatorial candidate Ernest Istook, may have received suggestive text messages from Foley.

Edmund was interviewed for 2 1/2 hours by FBI agents in Oklahoma City earlier this month.

Mueller said the FBI is increasing its presence abroad in order to fulfill its primary mission of protecting American citizens at home.

"Increasingly, we find that which adversely impacts us in the United States is being initiated overseas and for us to be successful, we have to be a worldwide organization," he said.

He referred specifically to two "computer worms" that caused havoc in the United States _ one caused by a teenager in Morocco and one by an individual in Turkey.

"I see us as a bridge between that which is happening within the United States and that which is occurring overseas that may adversely affect us here," he said.

Asked about the agencies interrogation methods, he said: "What I will tell you is the FBI adheres to its protocol for interrogations, which over a period of time has been in place and does not allow coercion. That has been our protocol and we adhere to that protocol."

Oklahoma City was the site of the country's worse domestic terrorist act in 1995 when a federal building was blown up. The explosion killed 168 people and injured hundreds. Timothy McVeigh was executed for his role in the bombing plot and Terry Nichols, a former Army buddy of McVeigh's, was given a life sentence.

When asked about former Attorney General John Ashcroft's criticism of prosecutors in the bombing case in his book, Mueller said it was wrong for authors of books on the attack to say federal authorities botched the case.

"While there may have been some glitches in the prosecution, in terms of the documents, nonetheless, all documents that conceivably could have been exculpatory were turned over to the defense counsel and the case has taken its course and McVeigh has been executed.

"And so it's been a successful investigation and successful prosecution and an exceptionally unfortunate and horrible terrorist attack."

He said the various conspiracy theories that keep popping up are "a fact of life."

"You have those conspiracies that will be out there, regardless of the weight of the evidence as it has been shown in public trials."

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., has announced that he will begin hearings about Nov. 15 with a focus on "possible foreign connections" to the Oklahoma City bombing.

No Extra Prison Time For Terror Hoax (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 27, 2006

A federal judge today handed down a 41-month sentence for a man who pleaded guilty to falsely telling the FBI about a terror plot against a company's Chicago headquarters.

Gilbert Romero, 31, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Elaine Bucklo for the hoax.

Bucklo said she wanted to send a message that the incident was serious, even though Romero is expected to serve the sentence concurrently with a 12-year state prison sentence on prior burglary convictions.

Romero, whose last known address was in Northlake, did not make a statement in court.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Edward Siskel said false statements like the ones in the Romero case are disruptive to the FBI, which has limited resources to use in terror investigations.

"(The hoax) was taken extremely seriously by the FBI," Siskel said, adding that agents spent a month running down leads.

Siskel said Romero's apparent motivation was to be transferred from a county jail to federal custody.

Romero's lawyer, Thomas Brandstrader, said Romero had "a bad idea, and the execution was even worse."

The defendant pleaded guilty June 30 to "conveying false information about the use of a weapon of mass destruction against property in the United States" and making false statements to federal agents.

Romero had a string of prior burglary convictions and has been in and out of state custody since the early 1990s, according to state records.

In June 2005, Romero told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement.

He said the attack was to be carried out by an individual who was recruiting other terrorists for a strike on U.S. soil, the indictment against him stated. Prosecutors did not reveal the individual's identity or the name of the company.

According to the indictment, Romero falsely told federal agents he and three others would team with the supposed terrorist.

The phony terrorism team purported it would fund the plot either through the anticipated awards of a medical malpractice suit or by taking hostages—specifically owners of currency exchanges and jewelry stores—and holding them for ransom, the indictment alleges.

The hoax that Romero allegedly sketched out involved enormous violence. In addition to destroying the company with a fertilizer-and-fuel bomb, Romero told agents the terrorists would gun down any police officers who intervened, the indictment alleges.

Romero said the guns, AK-47s and Mac-10 machine pistols, would come from Romero's street gang, according to the charges.

Prison Sentence For Man Who Lied To FBI About Chicago Terror Plot (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge gave a 41-month sentence Thursday to a 31-year-old man who pleaded guilty in July to telling the FBI about a fictitious terror plot to bomb a company's Chicago headquarters.

U.S. District Court Judge Elaine Bucklo said she wanted to send a message that the incident was serious, even though Gilbert Romero is expected to serve the sentence concurrently with a 12-year state prison sentence for prior burglary convictions.

Romero, of suburban Northlake, was charged with making false statements and reporting a hoax terrorism threat.

Authorities said Romero was an inmate at the Cook County Jail in June 2005 when he allegedly told officials he had information about an upcoming attack.

FBI agents interviewed Romero, who had been jailed for a parole violation, authorities said. He had been paroled from state prison in February after being convicted for burglary, according to state records.

Assistant State's Attorney Edward Siskel said Romero's apparent motive was to be transferred from a county jail to federal custody.

Romero's lawyer, Thomas Brandstrader, told the Chicago Tribune that Romero had "a bad idea, and the execution was even worse."

Romero told the agents the attack would be carried out by an individual who was recruiting others for a supposed strike on a U.S. target with a fertilizer and fuel bomb, according to the indictment. He also allegedly told agents the terrorists would kill any police officers who intervened. The indictment did not give further details of the fictional plot.

Siskel said false statements like the ones in the Romero case are disruptive to the FBI, which has limited resources to use in terror investigations.

Liquid Ban Causes Airline Earnings To Spring A Leak (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, October 27, 2006

The government's abrupt ban on liquids in plane cabins last summer slammed third-quarter earnings of U.S. airlines as potential customers changed travel plans rather than deal with the tighter rules.

US Airways and AirTran Airways on Thursday became the latest of several large carriers to blame the terrorism-related ban for major hits to results for the quarter ended Sept. 30.

DOJ_NMG_0087147

Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways said the restriction cost it between $30 million and $40 million in lost ticket sales, and Orlando-based AirTran put its lost revenue as high as $12 million. Last week, No. 1 American Airlines cited a $50 million hit to its revenue, and discount leader Southwest put the number at $40 million.

The ban added to airlines' costs in various ways, including worker overtime. But the airlines have only quantified lost revenue.

"We saw a cessation of bookings over that first weekend," AirTran CEO Joe Leonard said. "We have returned to normal booking levels, but we never made up that loss."

On Aug. 10, hours after British authorities arrested suspected would-be plane bombers in London, officials in the USA and Britain prohibited passengers from carrying almost any liquids or gels onto airplanes. The terrorists had been plotting to bring liquid explosives onto planes to blow up trans-Atlantic flights, authorities said.

Airport security lines mushroomed because of stricter searches and passenger confusion. Many passengers missed flights. The amount of checked baggage soared because passengers could not pack liquids in carry-ons. Airlines were forced to pay workers overtime to try to keep up with the increase.

The TSA has since relaxed the rules so passengers can bring aboard containers of liquids 3 ounces or less that are carried inside a clear plastic bag. But even as recently as Sept. 30, checked luggage at US Airways was still running 20% higher than before the ban, US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said. AirTran's checked luggage is still running 9% higher than normal.

AirTran reported a third-quarter loss of $4.3 million, or 5 cents per share, vs. a profit of $1 million a year earlier. US Airways posted a $78 million net loss, or 88 cents per share, vs. a $99 million loss a year earlier. Excluding special items, US Airways earned $101 million.

Terrorizing Congress (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

The U.S. hasn't been hit by a terror attack in five years, but that hasn't stopped the insurance industry from hitting up Congress again and again for more terror insurance subsidies. Keep this in mind the next time someone claims a new federal program will be "temporary."

Congress passed the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act (TRIA) ostensibly to assist the insurance industry through a "transitional period." In return for insurers offering terrorism coverage to their commercial policyholders, the feds agreed to cover the bulk of any losses from future terror attacks. The problem is that this federal backstop is no longer needed, if it ever was. It's true some insurers exited the market after 9/11, but others were still able to raise capital after the attacks. And by the time Congress passed TRIA in November 2002, premium rates were falling.

If anyone needs further evidence that TRIA deserves a proper burial, we recommend a recent U.S. Treasury report on the terrorism risk insurance market. According to the report, the percentage of companies buying terrorism coverage has climbed to 58% in 2005 from 27% in 2003, even as the cost of coverage has fallen to "roughly 3 to 5 percent of total property insurance coverage."

The report adds that the "financial health and capacity of insurers" has also bounced back, disasters like Katrina notwithstanding. Since 9/11, "policyholder surpluses in the property and casualty industry have risen, as the industry has remained profitable (even with the 2005 hurricane season losses) and has benefited from increased rates of return on investments." In short, this industry is doing just fine without any taxpayer guarantees.

Already renewed once, TRIA expires at the end of 2007, and the program's backers in the insurance, real-estate and financial services industries are out in force arguing that it be made permanent. Hank Greenberg, the former AIG chief, calls TRIA "essential." And Aaron Davis of Aon Corp. claims that "the private market for terrorism risk insurance cannot operate without some form of public-private partnership."

But that gets it exactly backward. As the Treasury report explains, TRIA "appears to negatively affect the emergence of private sector reinsurance capacity because it dilutes demand for private sector reinsurance." We'll never know what the private sector reinsurance market is capable of so long as Uncle Sam is providing the service for free. TRIA also creates a moral hazard. By shifting coverage costs from property owners to taxpayers, the program potentially creates higher overall costs by reducing incentives for property owners to invest in risk mitigation efforts.

So far the White House has been steadfast in insisting that TRIA eventually be allowed to sunset. And in a letter submitted with the new report to Senator Richard Shelby, whose Banking Committee would lead any reauthorization of the law, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson reiterated that "TRIA was not intended to be permanent, but rather was intended to help stabilize the insurance industry. It has been successful in that regard."

It certainly has. But that doesn't mean the Bush Administration isn't in for a fight next year with Washington's formidable insurance lobby. Government programs -- even hastily conceived ones like TRIA -- just keep going, and going, and going . . .

WAR NEWS:

Don't Mistake Iraq Timelines For Deadlines, Rumsfeld Says (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Thursday that critics should "just back off" on demands for deadlines for progress in Iraq and that it is difficult to predict when Iraqis will assume control of their country.

At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld said U.S. and Iraqi officials have been discussing benchmarks for Iraq's security, politics and economy. Such benchmarks are valuable, he said, because "you are in effect establishing priorities."

However, he said the timelines have no specific deadlines, nor do they spell out consequences if the goals are not met.

"You're looking for some sort of a guillotine to come falling down if some date isn't met. That is not what this is about," Rumsfeld said.

"They've been discussing the way forward through the rest of this year and next year," Rumsfeld said of discussions between U.S. and Iraqi officials. "As they do that, they then discuss, 'Well, when might something happen?' And it isn't a date. And it isn't a penalty if it doesn't" happen.

"You ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult," Rumsfeld said regarding talk of deadlines. "Honorable people are working on these things together."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in Baghdad on Tuesday that Iraqi leaders had agreed to have a plan by the end of the year laying out the times by which they want certain things accomplished.

On Wednesday, however, Iraqi Prime Minster Nouri al-Maliki said his government had not agreed to anything.

Later Wednesday, President Bush said al-Maliki was correct in saying mandates could not be imposed on Iraq. He added, "We'll push him, but we're not going to push him to the point where he can't achieve the objective."

Rumsfeld Tells Iraq Critics To 'Back Off' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

With his chorus of critics expanding deeper into Republican ranks, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told detractors yesterday to pull back as U.S. and Iraqi officials grapple with the uncertainties of laying out Iraq's course.

"You ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult," Rumsfeld said, appearing unusually combative as he sparred with reporters at the Pentagon. "Honorable people are working on these things together," he said, adding emphatically that "no daylight" exists between the U.S. and Iraqi sides.

But with just 12 days before the Nov. 7 elections, bipartisan criticism of the war appears to be gaining momentum, despite Rumsfeld's pugnacious defense of the Bush administration's Iraq strategy. The office of Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) mocked Rumsfeld's admonition on a day when October's death toll of U.S. troops in Iraq reached 96, the highest monthly total in a year.

More troubling for President Bush, the cracks in the Republican Party's support for the war are widening. In recent days, Rep. Anne M. Northup (Ky.) and Sen. Mike DeWine (Ohio) have called for Rumsfeld's resignation, and Rep. John E. Sweeney (N.Y.) and Tennessee's Republican Senate candidate, Bob Corker, have declared that "stay the course" is not a viable strategy. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Tex.) has said she would not have authorized the invasion if she knew then what she knows now; and Rep. Curt Weldon (Pa.) has demanded that generals -- not the White House -- draft a plan for withdrawal.

Bush declared Wednesday that the United States is winning the war in Iraq, but acknowledged that he is not satisfied with the situation and vowed to press Iraqi leaders to do more to stabilize their country on their own.

"Everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this, and . . . turn it into a political football," Rumsfeld said yesterday of the ongoing talks over goals by the Iraqi leadership, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior U.S. commander in Iraq. He denied reports that Casey sought to increase U.S. troops in the country, and he said a majority of the 310,000 Iraqi security forces are "in the lead" and "bearing the brunt of the battle" in Iraq.

Rumsfeld said setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to assume greater control over security and the operation of public institutions does not imply strict deadlines. "You're looking for some sort of guillotine to come falling down if some date isn't met. That is not what this is about," he said.

Four months ago, House Republican leaders orchestrated an 11-hour floor debate, hoping to put Democrats on record as opposing Bush's stand to see the war through until "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq" has been reached. Over the summer, a trickle of Republicans voiced concern that the war was not going the way the White House was portraying it. Now, many more Republicans are adding their voices.

"You can have a bad week, you can have two bad weeks, but when you have two bad months, you have to reassess," Northup said this week as she called for Rumsfeld's replacement. "You cannot afford to lose the numbers we are losing now and just keep slugging away."

Sweeney told the Glen Falls, N.Y., Kiwanis Club last week: "I think that the strategy of 'staying the course' is not a strategy at all. It doesn't work."

Rumsfeld "would not be my secretary of defense if I was the president of the United States," the embattled DeWine told CNN. "He has, you know, made huge mistakes. And I think history will judge him very harshly."

"I can't defend how the president laid out the need for [going to war in Iraq]. I don't support Rumsfeld," Rep. Pat Tiberi (R-Ohio) said recently in a local newspaper.

"We can't set a hard timetable, but we can ramp up pressure on the Iraqis to take responsibility," Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) told the Danbury News-Times editorial board.

Such statements about an unpopular war may seem logical from candidates locked in perhaps the most difficult political campaigns of their lives. But in recent days, the sentiments have come from Republicans breezing toward reelection or not even in a race this year.

Hutchison, a White House stalwart who is not up for reelection, broke from Republican talking points, saying: "If I knew then what I had known now, on the weapons of mass destruction, which was a key reason I voted the way I did, I would not have voted to go into Iraq."

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), who is leading her Democratic opponent in the most recent poll, 73 percent to 10 percent, declared: "Staying the course is neither an option nor a plan. Congress must be willing to reassess and re-chart our future military presence in Iraq."

Republicans had once hoped to frame Iraq as a vital front in the fight against terrorism and to pound Democratic critics for being weak on national security. But with just days left to campaign, Democrats are turning the war against Republicans in dozens of closely contested races around the country.

The calls for Rumsfeld's resignation and the criticism of the conduct of the war by Northup, DeWine and others are "a reflection of just how difficult it has been for Republican candidates to separate themselves from the president and the war," said Amy Walter, a House analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

"With 12 days left, they've attacked the Democrats. It didn't work. They've talked about their greatest strengths: taxes, terrorism and immigration. It didn't work. Now they're saying, 'Well, we'll try this.' "

"They have to respond to their constituents," said Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster and campaign strategist.

"In the end, voters need to know they understand the public's frustration and concern," he said. "Does it undermine the support for the war? Yes. But does it help these Republican campaigns? Also yes."

Rumsfeld Says Iraq Goals Not Deadlines (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld waded yesterday into the debate over benchmarks for political progress in Iraq, saying the goals laid out this week in Baghdad by U.S. officials are not firm deadlines as asserted by the Iraqi prime minister.

In a combative press conference at the Pentagon during which he urged reporters to "back off," he noted the intense atmosphere in Washington by saying, "It's a political season, and everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this."

He said his top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George Casey, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, have been in continuing discussions to set markers for accelerating the takeover by Iraqi security forces and reaching peace between ruling Shi'ites and minority Sunnis.

"They then discuss, 'well, when might something happen?'," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "And it isn't a date and it isn't a penalty if it doesn't. I mean, you're trying to add a degree of formality and finality and punishment to something. My goodness."

Last week, Mr. Rumsfeld said Iraq had to assume more security missions "sooner rather than later."

Mr. Rumsfeld admonished the press for what he says is an attempt to create division between the administration and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, even while the Iraqi himself has rebuked Washington.

"This is complicated stuff," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "No one can predict the future with absolute certainty. So you ought to just back off, take a look at it, relax."

President Bush on Wednesday, and Mr. Rumsfeld yesterday, took pains to explain the benchmark process announced in Baghdad in the face of strident criticism from Mr. al-Maliki.

Earlier this week, Gen. Casey announced a timeline for having Iraqi security forces take control of all 18 provinces in 18 months. They have been put in control of two. Mr. Khalilzad said he wanted a political compact in place within a year that divided up Iraqi oil wealth and brought militias under government control. This would include the Mahdi Army controlled by radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Mr. al-Maliki's

Asked how the United States will deal with Sheik al-Sadr, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "It is something that the sovereign Iraqi government is wrestling with."

When a reporter asserted that "Every time a benchmark has been laid down in terms of security forces and the like the Iraqis have been unable to meet them," Mr. Rumsfeld became testy.

"That is just false," he shot back, before listing missions they had accomplished.

Defense sources have told The Washington Times that Sheik al-Sadr lost control of a large number of militiamen, who formed autonomous death squads that hunt down Sunni civilians around Baghdad.

Mr. Rumsfeld said the press was trying to corner the administration into setting firm deadlines. "And then of course you can point with alarm and say, 'Oh my goodness, you didn't make it.' And you can have a front-page article and everyone will have a good time," he said. "And then the ones that we make earlier than we thought, we'll never see it on the front page."

Real Timetables For Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Funny how a few weeks before the election Bush administration officials start hinting at timetables for getting American troops out of Iraq. But spinning out implausible scenarios — like the claim that it might take only 12 to 18 more months for the Iraqis to be able to defend themselves — won't get Iraq any closer to containing the mayhem, nor this country any closer to extricating itself.

What is needed is an explicit, credible and public set of deadlines — for Iraq's leaders but also for President Bush — to confront the most difficult problems, including disarming sectarian militias, stabilizing Baghdad, protecting minority rights, and apportioning the country's oil wealth.

That's the only way Iraqis and Americans can judge whether progress is being made and whether the effort is worth the cost.

The American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, seemed to be moving down that road this week when he announced that Iraq's leaders had agreed to a timeline for "making the hard decisions" necessary to reduce sectarian bloodletting. The Times's review of the unpublished "notional political timetable" suggests that it is a lot less demanding than advertised.

For example, it gives the Iraqi Parliament until December to outline the terms for demobilizing militias. But it sets no deadline by which Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki — whose government is backed by two religious parties with powerful militias — must disarm the militias. The day after Mr. Khalilzad announced the existence of a timetable, Mr. Maliki held his own news conference denying that he had agreed to anything.

The Iraqis weren't the only ones backpedaling. A day after the top American general in Iraq, George Casey, acknowledged that more troops may be needed to help stabilize Baghdad, his office issued a "clarification" saying that wasn't really what he meant.

And while General Casey suggested that the Iraqis should be able to provide their own security in 12 to 18 months, President Bush let slip that he had a far different timeline in mind. When asked at a news conference whether he would renounce any claim to permanent bases in Iraq, Mr. Bush said that was something for the Iraqi government to decide. He added, "And, frankly, it's not in much of a position to be thinking about what the world is going to look like five or 10 years from now."

This week we described what we believe must be done immediately to lessen the chances of chaos in Iraq after American troops withdraw. The Iraqis need to begin national reconciliation talks and disarm the militias. The Americans need to make a credible push to secure Baghdad and elicit the help of Iraq's neighbors.

There's no time left for notional timetables. Mr. Bush said the other day that "we're making it clear to the Iraqis that America's patience is not unlimited." We hope it's clear to Mr. Bush that Americans have already lost patience with his bumbling conduct of this war, and the remaining grace period can be measured in months, not years. That's a real deadline, for concrete progress, not for more rosy notions of victory.

Maliki And The GI (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

One of the toughest jobs confronting Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is disarming the Shiite militias. The kidnapping Monday in Baghdad of an American soldier by vigilantes claiming to be from the so-called "Mahdi Army" underscores the urgency of the problem, and Mr. Maliki's response has been inadequate at best.

DOJ_NMG_0087151

Not only has he criticized American and Iraqi operations in Sadr City aimed at freeing the captive, he also appeared to accept at face value yesterday the Sadrists' denial that they are holding an American. "We asked the Sadr movement to look for him and they swear they know nothing about him," Mr. Maliki told [a news agency] in an interview, adding that Sunni insurgents sometimes pose as Mahdi fighters.

But a well-placed source tells us it's becoming clearer that the American was in fact kidnapped by Shiite vigilantes and may have been moved from Sadr City in Baghdad to an area south of the capital. Mr. Maliki also got the details of the kidnapping wrong -- the soldier (who is of Iraqi descent) was not with his brother, as the Prime Minister told [a news agency] -- suggesting he has not been very engaged on the issue.

Mr. Maliki obviously has concerns about confronting the Sadrists, who hold about 30 seats in parliament and backed his bid for the premiership (as did the Bush Administration). But he also needs to understand that this incident could prove a turning point in his relationship with the American forces who protect his government. Those troops need to see him exerting maximum effort behind the scenes to free their comrade. A public appeal for the American soldier's release is the least Mr. Maliki could do.

On the broader issue of what to do about Mahdi Army violence in general, there's no easy answer. Moqtada al-Sadr could and should have been arrested several years ago when a warrant was issued in connection with the murder of moderate cleric Abdul Majid al-Khoei after the U.S. invasion in spring of 2003. But at this point it may be smarter to go after the worst of the Mahdi troublemakers in smaller operations, as U.S. and Iraqi forces are now doing, and hope that their nominal leader's political influence will wane.

Mr. Maliki also says he is working with Mr. Sadr on a political solution to the problem, and he deserves a chance to try. But if Sadrist forces ask him to choose between them and his obligations to a unified Iraq worthy of U.S. support -- as the Sadrists appear to have done with this kidnapping -- he should know there will be consequences for picking the wrong side.

Mr. Maliki's moves here will affect his relationship with Iraq's Sunni community as well. One key to striking a political compromise across religious communities is convincing Sunnis that Shiite death squads won't be tolerated by the government. If Sunnis see him unwilling to confront the Sadrists on behalf of the Americans to whom he indirectly owes his job, what reason do they have to believe he will act against militia violence on their behalf?

Analysis: Bad Reviews For Iraq Policy (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 27, 2006

'Stay the course' is gone. In its place: 'constant readjustment' of tactics, a timeline to crush Shiite death squads and inducements like unconditional amnesty for Sunni insurgents.

Polls of Iraqis show them eager for American troops to leave. U.S. public opinion surveys find that only about 34 percent of voters support the war effort.

With such broad disaffection and midterm elections coming Nov. 7, the Bush administration has spent the past few weeks in an intense search for a new face to put on the conflict, in which more than 2,800 U.S. troops now have died.

While American voters will make their judgement of the administration effort in less than two weeks, the newly burnished policy already is getting bad reviews in Baghdad. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took issue only a day after it was unveiled, implying portions of it were a challenge the sovereingty of his five-month-old government.

First, he rejected U.S. talk of an ill-defined timeline to curb violence.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it."

Then he said the plan was prompted by American electoral politics:

"I am sure that this is not the official policy of the U.S. government, but it is a results of the election race going on and we are not much concerned with it."

It was not known if al-Maliki raised the objections out of conviction or to mollify his Shiite Muslim political base — or both. Maliki's political position is a delicate balance, one that sometimes frustrates his U.S. backers.

At a Wednesday news conference, President Bush said Iraq's government "must respect the fact that we've got patience, but not unlimited patience."

Even before that veiled warning, al-Maliki felt compelled earlier this month to ask Bush if he were in danger of losing American backing. Bush reported that he reassured the Iraqi leader that he had no plans to pull troops out of Iraq and told him to ignore rumors the United States intended to enforce a deadline for Baghdad to rein in sectarian violence.

But al-Maliki's concern was not unfounded, given remarks by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the start of her Iraq tour at the start of the month.

"The security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it is not one that is being helped by political inaction," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0087152

Officials close to Al-Maliki, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said he had been told by the Americans that he had until the end of the year to make significant progress in ridding the streets of sectarian death squads or face the quiet withdrawal of U.S. backing.

If true, it would be a tough move for the United States given its stated objective of leaving behind a democratic Iraq. If only rumor, it still reflected the precariousness of the U.S.-Iraqi relationship.

The administration appears to be losing patience in the 44th month of the war partly because of the big jump in U.S. deaths. As of Thursday, 96 service members had been killed in combat this month, the highest toll since October 2005, when the same number of U.S. troops died. Only three months have seen higher death figures since the war began.

As the toll mounted, administration officials and the U.S. military increasingly sought to blame at least a portion of the skyrocketing bloodshed on the political savvy of insurgent forces.

Their argument holds that Sunni fighters had stepped up attacks to kill more Americans in a bid to turn U.S. voters more deeply against the conflict, and thus harm Republican chances and weaken Bush. Further, the reasoning claims, insurgents believed a Democratic-controlled Congress would more quickly force an end to U.S. involvement.

"In regards to this spike in violence ... it's no coincidence that the surge in attacks against coalition forces and the subsequent increase in U.S. casualties coincides with our increased presence on the streets of Baghdad and the run-up to the American midterm elections," U.S. military spokesman Gen. William B. Caldwell said a week ago.

"The enemy knows that killing innocent people and Americans will garner headlines and create a sense of frustration."

Last week, Bush agreed that a New York Times columnist might have been right to compare surging Iraqi violence to the 1968 Tet offensive in Vietnam.

The Viet Cong drive against American and South Vietnamese soldiers was seen as a turning point in U.S. public opinion against that war and responsible for President Lyndon Johnson's decision months later not to seek a second term.

"He could be right," the president said of analogy drawn by Thomas Friedman. "There's certainly a stepped-up level of violence, and we're heading into an election."

But some who closely follow the war find that explanation insufficient, if not a distortion of the facts.

"Iraqis are fighting Iraqis for Iraqi reasons, not to influence elections or force the U.S. out of Iraq," Center for Strategic and International Studies scholar Anthony Cordesman said in a recent paper.

"This has built up for more than two years, and any reference to a 'Tet offensive' requires both a massive ignorance of the realities in Iraq and an equal ignorance of the realities in Vietnam," he said.

Democrats Are Divided On A Solution For Iraq (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — If the Nov. 7 election in the United States is a referendum on the Iraq war, what are the choices?

President Bush admitted Wednesday that things were not going as well as he had hoped in Iraq and that he was adjusting tactics on the ground to deal with the continuing military and political problems there. He said his overarching goal — victory — remained unchanged, but he gave no sense of what it would take to achieve it.

Democratic leaders and candidates are virtually unanimous in opposing the president's conduct of the war, and most advocate American disengagement — either quickly or slowly. But most are not calling for an immediate withdrawal of American forces or offering a vision of what postwar Iraq should look like. They say they stand for change, but the variety of formulations is dizzying.

Nineteen House members sponsored a bill to cut off funds for the war. The Democratic Senate candidate in Pennsylvania opposes a deadline for ending American involvement in Iraq. The Democratic candidate for Senate in Ohio wants all the troops out within two years. Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the current minority leader who is likely to be the next speaker of the House if Democrats win back the chamber, is calling for immediate steps to begin to remove American forces, with all of them out of Iraq by the end of 2007.

"We haven't coalesced around a single plan," Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat who is up for re-election this year, acknowledged in an interview on Thursday. "But, we're in general agreement on the basic principles."

The range of proposals in part reflects the military, political and sectarian maze that Iraq has become. With virtually no one contending that an exit would be easy, no one wants to be responsible for a decision that would leave Iraq a smoldering ruin of civil war.

But the range of proposals also illustrates the state of the Democratic Party, which has not held executive power for six years or controlled the Congress for twice that long. There is no dominant figure in the party to formulate a policy position, so a hundred schools of thought contend. And even if the Democrats win one or both houses of Congress, they will not have the authority to change the course of the war significantly.

"The republic is being offered a choice between muck and murk," said David R. Gergen, an adviser to Republican and Democratic presidents and now a professor of public policy at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "Neither party is offering a clear path ahead in Iraq."

A number of Democratic policy analysts and elected officials who are not facing re-election this year have drafted quite detailed proposals for untangling the Iraq knot. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat, has proposed a plan to divide Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions — for the Kurds, the Shiites and the Sunnis — with the United States providing a security umbrella for a time.

Senators Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island are urging a plan, endorsed by a majority of Senate Democrats, to begin withdrawing troops within the next few months to impress upon Iraqi leaders that the American presence is not open-ended.

Richard C. Holbrooke, who was the ambassador to the United Nations under President Bill Clinton, this week offered an amalgam of the two plans. His proposal would give each of the three major population groups more autonomy and would provide for the beginning of a phased withdrawal with no firm timetable for completion.

But most Democrats standing for election are not as detailed or categorical. If the election has become a referendum on Iraq, it is one without a definitive choice. With less than two weeks to Election Day, both Republicans and Democrats appear to be fudging their positions to avoid alienating voters. Polls indicate that the public, hungry for a change, prefers the Democratic approach, unspecific as it is, to a continuation of the Bush policies.

Republicans regularly express frustration at what they see as the Democrats' ability to get away with criticizing the conduct of the war without being pressed to offer their own solution.

"To the degree that they're trying to be none of the above, they find it useful," said Stuart Stevens, a Republican strategist who worked on Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign and represents several candidates this year. "But they're offering more of a weather report than a foreign policy position."

Democratic leaders in Congress say that voters are not demanding that candidates present a coherent plan to end the war. It is beyond the power of Congress to conduct military operations or order troop withdrawals in any case. But, they say, voters are flocking to the party because it offers an alternative to what Democrats call the failed Bush administration policy.

"The public understands also we're not the commander in chief," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who heads the party's senatorial campaign committee. "If we were to get the majority, we could do a lot more to get George Bush to change direction."

Mr. Holbrooke said that it was the administration, not the Democrats, that was in disarray on Iraq. The Democrats, he said, are united in their desire for disengagement. Disputes over when and where the troops would go are merely technical, he said.

"The Democrats stand for disengagement and de-escalation," Mr. Holbrooke said. "It's the Republicans who are all over the lot."

Yet in debates and interviews, Democratic candidates for Congress offer a wide range of formulations within the broad rubric of opposition to the war. Bob Casey Jr., the Democrat who is challenging Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, for his Senate seat, said he would have voted to authorize the war in 2002 if he had been in the Senate, although he said he now believes the intelligence on which senators voted was faulty.

Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat who is trying to unseat Republican Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, said he wants the military to come up with a plan to provide for an "orderly and safe" withdrawal of American troops within the next two years. "It's a practical plan, and I think the public agrees with it overwhelmingly," Mr. Brown said in an interview Thursday.

Representative James P. McGovern, Democrat of Massachusetts, sponsored the bill last year to cut off funding for the Iraq war. Eighteen other House Democrats co-sponsored the measure.

The Democrats have a plethora of proposals to extricate the United States from Iraq but no unified approach, said Marshall Wittman of the Progressive Policy Institute, a centrist Democratic research organization. "The overriding dynamic in this election is the war," he said. "The paradox is that once they take control of Congress, there is little they can do. That's the great irony of this election."

Staying The Course Right Over A Cliff (NYT)

By George Lakoff

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

THE Bush administration has finally been caught in its own language trap.

"That is not a stay-the-course policy," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, declared on Monday.

The first rule of using negatives is that negating a frame activates the frame. If you tell someone not to think of an elephant, he'll think of an elephant. When Richard Nixon said, "I am not a crook" during Watergate, the nation thought of him as a crook.

"Listen, we've never been stay the course, George," President Bush told George Stephanopoulos of ABC News a day earlier. Saying that just reminds us of all the times he said "stay the course."

What the president is discovering is that it's not so easy to rewrite linguistic history. The laws of language are hard to defy.

"The characterization of, you know, 'it's stay the course' is about a quarter right," the president said at an Oct. 11 news conference. " 'Stay the course' means keep doing what you're doing. My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change. 'Stay the course' also means don't leave before the job is done."

A week or so later, he tried another shift: "We have been — we will complete the mission, we will do our job and help achieve the goal, but we're constantly adjusting the tactics. Constantly."

To fully understand why the president's change in linguistic strategy won't work, it's helpful to consider why "stay the course" possesses such power. The answer lies in metaphorical thought.

Metaphors are more than language; they can govern thought and behavior. A recent University of Toronto study, for example, demonstrated the power of metaphors that connect morality and purity: People who washed their hands after contemplating an unethical act were less troubled by their thoughts than those who didn't, the researchers found.

"Stay the course" is a particularly powerful metaphor because it can activate so many of our emotions. Because physical actions require movement, we commonly understand action as motion. Because achieving goals so often requires going to a particular place — to the refrigerator to get a cold beer, say — we think of goals as reaching destinations.

Another widespread — and powerful — metaphor is that moral action involves staying on a prescribed path, and straying from the path is immoral. In modern conservative discourse, "character" is seen through the metaphor of moral strength, being unbending in the face of immoral forces. "Backbone," we call it.

In the context of a metaphorical war against evil, "stay the course" evoked all these emotion-laden metaphors. The phrase enabled the president to act the way he'd been acting — and to demonstrate that it was his strong character that enabled him to stay on the moral path.

To not stay the course evokes the same metaphors, but says you are not steadfast, not morally strong. In addition, it means not getting to your destination — that is, not achieving your original purpose. In other words, you are lacking in character and strength; you are unable to "complete the mission" and "achieve the goal."

"Stay the course" was for years a trap for those who disagreed with the president's policies in Iraq. To disagree was weak and immoral. It meant abandoning the fight against evil. But now the president himself is caught in that trap. To keep staying the course, given obvious reality, is to get deeper into disaster in Iraq, while not staying the course is to abandon one's moral authority as a conservative. Either way, the president loses.

And if the president loses, does that mean the Democrats will win? Perhaps. But if they do, it will be because of Republican missteps and not because they've acted with strategic brilliance. Their "new direction" slogan offers no values and no positive vision. It is taken from a standard poll question, "Do you like the direction the nation is headed in?"

This is a shame. The Democrats are giving up a golden opportunity to accurately frame their values and deepest principles (even on national security), to forge a public identity that fits those values — and perhaps to win more close races by being positive and having a vision worth voting for.

Right now, though, no language articulating a Democratic vision seems in the offing. If the Democrats don't find a more assertive strategy, their gains will be short-lived. They, too, will learn the pitfalls of staying the course.

The Arithmetic Of Failure (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Iraq is a lost cause. It's just a matter of arithmetic: given the violence of the environment, with ethnic groups and rival militias at each other's throats, American forces there are large enough to suffer terrible losses, but far too small to stabilize the country.

We're so undermanned that we're even losing our ability to influence events: earlier this week, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki brusquely rejected American efforts to set a timetable for reining in the militias.

Afghanistan, on the other hand, is a war we haven't yet lost, and it's just possible that a new commitment of forces there might turn things around.

DOJ_NMG_0087155

The moral is clear — we need to get out of Iraq, not because we want to cut and run, but because our continuing presence is doing nothing but wasting American lives. And if we do free up our forces (and those of our British allies), we might still be able to save Afghanistan.

The classic analysis of the arithmetic of insurgencies is a 1995 article by James T. Quinlivan, an analyst at the Rand Corporation. "Force Requirements in Stability Operations," published in Parameters, the journal of the U.S. Army War College, looked at the number of troops that peacekeeping forces have historically needed to maintain order and cope with insurgencies. Mr. Quinlivan's comparisons suggested that even small countries might need large occupying forces.

Specifically, in some cases it was possible to stabilize countries with between 4 and 10 troops per 1,000 inhabitants. But examples like the British campaign against communist guerrillas in Malaya and the fight against the Irish Republican Army in Northern Ireland indicated that establishing order and stability in a difficult environment could require about 20 troops per 1,000 inhabitants.

The implication was clear: "Many countries are simply too big to be plausible candidates for stabilization by external forces," Mr. Quinlivan wrote.

Maybe, just maybe, the invasion and occupation of Iraq could have been managed in such a way that a force the United States was actually capable of sending would have been enough to maintain order and stability. But that didn't happen, and at this point Iraq is a cauldron of violence, far worse than Malaya or Ulster ever was. And that means that stabilizing Iraq would require a force of at least 20 troops per 1,000 Iraqis — that is, 500,000 soldiers and marines.

We don't have that kind of force. The combined strength of the U.S. Army and Marine Corps is less than 700,000 — and the combination of America's other commitments plus the need to rotate units home for retraining means that only a fraction of those forces can be deployed for stability operations at any given time. Even maintaining the forces we now have deployed in Iraq, which are less than a third as large as the Quinlivan analysis suggests is necessary, is slowly breaking the Army.

Meanwhile, what about Afghanistan?

Given the way the Bush administration relegated Afghanistan to sideshow status, it comes as something of a shock to realize that Afghanistan has a larger population than Iraq. If Afghanistan were in as bad shape as Iraq, stabilizing it would require at least 600,000 troops — an obvious impossibility.

However, things in Afghanistan aren't yet as far gone as they are in Iraq, and it's possible that a smaller force — one in that range of 4 to 10 per 1,000 that has been sufficient in some cases — might be enough to stabilize the situation. But right now, the forces trying to stabilize Afghanistan are absurdly small: we're trying to provide security to 30 million people with a force of only 32,000 Western troops and 77,000 Afghan national forces.

If we stopped trying to do the impossible in Iraq, both we and the British would be able to put more troops in a place where they might still do some good. But we have to do something soon: the commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan says that most of the population will switch its allegiance to a resurgent Taliban unless things get better by this time next year.

It's hard to believe that the world's only superpower is on the verge of losing not just one but two wars. But the arithmetic of stability operations suggests that unless we give up our futile efforts in Iraq, we're on track to do just that.

U.S. Deaths In Iraq Near Peak Months (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 26 -- Unrelenting daily attacks in Baghdad and the western province of Anbar have made October the deadliest month of the Iraq war for U.S. troops in combat since the all-out American offensives on Fallujah in April and November of 2004, according to U.S. military figures. The military on Thursday reported five more American troops killed, raising the toll for U.S. deaths in hostile action so far this month to 92.

The latest reported deaths -- those of four Marines and a sailor -- occurred Wednesday in Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold. The increasing death toll in Anbar comes after months in which U.S. and Iraqi commanders had said that sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites was their prime concern and that Baghdad was the focus of their efforts.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, attributed the resurgence in American deaths in the western province to "very conscious and deliberate operations" in Ramadi, Anbar's capital.

"It's an aggressive, offensive approach to taking back the city of Ramadi, to return it back to Iraqi security forces," Caldwell said on Thursday.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni Arab insurgent groups in the heart of Ramadi on a daily basis since early this year, and Caldwell's words -- "taking back" -- reflected the degree to which guerrillas have asserted control over the city.

The insurgent groups include both foreign-led organizations such as al-Qaeda in Iraq and Iraqi resistance groups. U.S. officers said this past summer that they could claim sure control only over a few blocks immediately around Ramadi's town hall, as well as forward operating bases and other American outposts in the lawless city. U.S. troops, especially since summer, have moved more aggressively out into the city, pushing back against insurgents but also putting themselves at greater risk.

It was not clear whether Wednesday's killings were all in Ramadi, and the military gave no details about how they occurred. Local leaders in Ramadi reported that a series of planted bombs and suicide car bombs had targeted American forces around Anbar on Wednesday.

In 2004, thousands of American troops were involved in two concentrated offensives against Sunni Arab insurgents in Fallujah, and the toll in April of that year also included deaths in heavy fighting against forces of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in southern Iraq. The number of Americans killed in action that month was 126; in November 2004, 125.

In contrast, American deaths this month have come singly or in twos, threes or fours, mostly from roadside bombs and small-arms fire targeting patrols, checkpoints and other day-to-day operations.

Sources within the two militaries, as well as Iraqi militiamen and foreign fighters, cite many of the same reasons for the current increase in violence in Anbar.

After American warplanes killed al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, his successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, called on followers to concentrate attacks on U.S. troops and Shiite militiamen, soldiers and police. In September, Masri urged every insurgent in Iraq to kill at least one American within 15 days.

The Egyptian-born Masri wanted redoubled attacks "to have a great effect on the American elections," said Abu Islam al-Arabi, a local al-Qaeda leader reached by telephone Thursday in Anbar province.

Arabi, an Iraqi, suggested other reasons for the surge in attacks: the desire of guerrillas to have their deaths come in the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, when some Muslims believe martyrdom will earn them special grace in paradise, and what he said was a new influx of foreign fighters, who he said had already made possible dozens of suicide attacks during Ramadan alone.

Except for that last reason, American officers have given all the same possible causes.

Of Iraq's 18 provinces, Anbar is by far the deadliest for U.S. troops: About 1,022 service members have been killed there since the war began, compared with 733 in Baghdad and 281 in Salahuddin province north of the capital, according to the Web site iCasualties.org.

So far in October, not including the most recent American deaths, 35 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar, 42 in Baghdad and seven in Salahuddin, accounting for 88 percent of the U.S. fatalities, according to the Web site.

In all, 96 American troops have died of all causes -- including accidents and attacks -- since October began. The count is the highest overall toll in a year.

American deaths in the war are dwarfed by those of Iraqi civilians and troops, however.

During the recently concluded month of Ramadan, attacks killed about 300 Iraqi police officers, soldiers and other security forces, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. commander in Iraq, said this week.

Civilians have died in even larger numbers. Violence killed more than 2,660 last month in Baghdad alone, reflecting a toll that has more than doubled since late spring. Before the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, the number of victims of violent death received by the city morgue averaged 10 a month.

On Thursday, gun battles in the northern town of Baqubah killed at least five policemen and six civilians. Baqubah is home to many Sunni insurgents, but Shiite militiamen also are reported to have flooded into the area lately, and it was not clear who was responsible for Thursday's fighting.

It appeared, however, that the gunmen might have been attempting to win the release of jailed comrades. Maj. Gen. Shakha Hyllil al-Kabi, an Iraqi army commander, said authorities in Baqubah released 53 detainees, keeping only 10 behind. "This is an answer for all the terrorists: We only keep those involved" in crimes, said Kabi, who said authorities also returned some confiscated cars.

Month's Toll Most For U.S. In A Year (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The number of American troops killed in Iraq in October reached the highest monthly total in a year yesterday after four Marines and a sailor died of wounds suffered while fighting in the same Sunni insurgent stronghold.

The U.S. military said 96 American troops have died in October, the most in one month since October 2005, when the same number were killed.

In other violence, 12 police officers were killed in fighting with suspected militia gunmen in Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad, officials said. Eighteen militants also were killed, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0087157

The deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq was November 2004, when military offenses primarily in the then-insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, left 137 troops dead, 126 of them in combat. In January 2005, 107 U.S. troops were killed.

The U.S. military said the five service members killed in the volatile Anbar province included a sailor assigned to the 3rd Naval Construction Regiment. Two of the Marines were attached to Regimental Combat Team 5, and two to Regimental Combat Team 7. All died from wounds suffered in attacks Wednesday.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman, said there had been a marked decrease in violence in Baghdad since the end of Ramadan, the Muslim month of fasting, earlier this week.

Gen. Caldwell said violence has tended to spike during that month, then fall off. He also said increased U.S. patrols and roadblocks in the search for a missing American soldier could be having an effect.

Fighting continued yesterday with clashes between Iraqi security forces and militia groups linked to major Shi'ite political parties, part of an ominous trend adding to the violence wrought by the Sunni-led insurgency against U.S. coalition forces and their Iraqi allies.

At least 12 policemen were killed in fighting near Baqouba with gunmen of the Mahdi Army militia, who are loyal to fiery anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Mahdi militiamen have flooded into the area 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, forcing large numbers of residents belonging to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority to flee their homes. Mahdi fighters killed scores of Sunnis in massacres last week in the nearby city of Balad, forcing U.S. troops to return to the area after Iraqi security forces were unable to stem the bloodshed.

Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said that about 300 Iraqi police and soldiers died during Ramadan, and more than 961 Iraqis altogether have been killed in war-related violence this month, the highest level since the Associated Press began tracking civilian deaths in April 2005.

That amounts to an average of almost 40 every day, compared with a daily average of about 27 since April 2005, as more Iraqis fall prey to sectarian death squads affiliated with the militias.

Army To Spread Burden Of Combat (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The prospect of combat in Iraq for at least another four years is prompting the Army to realign its forces to prevent a small slice of soldiers who are shouldering much of the fighting from wearing out.

Pentagon records show one-fifth of the Army's active-duty troops have served multiple tours of war duty while more than 40% haven't been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan.

That disparity is behind the Army's plans to shift some soldiers to high-demand wartime specialties that could ease the burden on combat forces.

The Army announced this month that it plans to maintain its current force level in Iraq through 2010. There are about 105,000 soldiers in Iraq, 15,000 in Kuwait and 16,000 in Afghanistan.

The Army is moving soldiers from specialties such as artillery and air defense to high-demand roles: infantry, engineering, military police and intelligence, Special Forces, civil affairs and psychological operations, said Lt. Gen. Michael Rochelle, deputy chief of staff for Army personnel.

The Army has more soldiers deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan than the other services combined. It expects to complete the realignment by 2011.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged this week that the Pentagon is sending active-duty troops overseas more frequently than it wants to, which is once in three years.

About 42% of the Army's 500,000 active-duty soldiers have not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. They include about 80,000 fresh recruits, most of whom are being trained. More than 90,000 others are in the so-called institutional Army, those who train, equip and manage soldiers.

By 2011, there will be 50,000 more troops available for deployment than in 2001. Part of that will be accomplished by having civilian Army employees take over certain jobs from soldiers, freeing them up to fight.

Five years of fighting have put the Army on the verge of wearing out vital soldiers, said James Carafano, a retired Army colonel and military analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

The Army is still structured to fight Cold War enemies, which prevents it from deploying more troops, he said. “It's not a usable force in terms of mix and composition.”

The Army has sent more than 144,000 active-duty, National Guard and Reserve soldiers to Iraq or Afghanistan more than once. Army deployments typically last one year. Some soldiers, including special operations forces, have shorter tours.

DOJ_NMG_0087158

Fort Bragg in North Carolina, where many Special Forces soldiers are based, is home to the Army's most-deployed soldier. That soldier, whom the Army declined to identify, has been sent to Iraq or Afghanistan nine times.

That's a "pocket of stress that we need to be concerned about," said retired Army colonel James Martin, an expert on military culture who teaches at Bryn Mawr College in Pennsylvania.

42 Iraqis Die As Insurgents Attack Police Near Baquba (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

BAQUBA, Iraq, Oct. 26 — Police officers acting on a tip about several kidnapped colleagues rode into deadly insurgent ambushes near here on Thursday, resulting in two intense battles that left at least 42 people dead, including 24 police officers, officials said.

Five American service members were killed Wednesday in Anbar Province, the military command reported Thursday, raising the American death toll in October to at least 96, one of the worst monthly tolls of the war.

The insurgent ambushes came as dozens of police officers converged on an area between Baquba and Baghdad, near a town called Khan Bani Saad. Word had come down late on Wednesday from the Interior Ministry that several Iraqi policemen who had been kidnapped days earlier near Baquba, the capital of Diyala Province, were being held south of there, and province officials ordered a raid. But as the police officers rode out, what they found was a large and well-armed Sunni insurgent force. A spokesman for the joint Iraqi-American command center in Baquba described the clashes as "very violent, brutal and heavy."

Among the dead were 24 police officers, including the police chief of Khan Bani Saad, Col. Abbas al-Amari, according to a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, which oversees the nation's police force. At least seven police officers were wounded, officials said.

According to American military officials in Baquba, 18 insurgents were killed, eight were wounded and 27 were captured.

One fight apparently ended when 18 policemen, each armed with only one or two clips of bullets, ran out of ammunition two miles north of Khan Bani Saad, officials said. Many appeared to have been executed near a canal, shot in the back of the head.

The Americans said the ambush might have been coordinated with the help of an insurgent agent working inside the government's security forces. Col. Brian D. Jones, the senior American commander in the province, called the attack a "setup."

"It was a baited ambush," he said.

Colonel Jones said that the loss of the police chief, Colonel Abbas, was a severe blow. After police officers in Khan Bani Saad walked off the job last month amid worsening violence, American officers envisioned a new, mixed force of 100 Shiite and 100 Sunni police officers under the command of Colonel Abbas, confident that he could produce a stable unit.

American commanders moved additional forces into the area three months ago in anticipation that large-scale military sweeps through Baghdad would inflame the area, whose population is about 60 percent Shiite and 40 percent Sunni.

But the situation became more tense last month, when the Fifth Division of the Iraqi Army staged raids in Baquba that led to the arrest of 400 people, nearly all Sunni Arabs. That deeply angered Sunni leaders, who felt it showed the Shiite-dominated army division had singled out Sunnis while ignoring Shiite criminals.

As local Sunni and Shiite groups have put out calls for help, fighters from the Shiite Jaish al-Mahdi militia have moved north to Khan Bani Saad from Baghdad, said Lt. Col. Thomas Fisher, the commander of the 1-68 Combined Arms Battalion in Baquba. At the same time, fighters from Sunni groups and Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have moved in from the west and north.

Colonel Jones said that it appeared the insurgents in the ambushes on Thursday had advance knowledge of the raid and appeared to have moved in skilled fighters. "These guys were good and committed, not your local-yokel resistance," he said.

Though much of the recent political attention in Baghdad and Washington has focused on Shiite militias and their participation in the cycles of retributive sectarian violence, the Sunni Arab-led insurgency remains formidable. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has been under intense American pressure to disarm the militias, said this week that the main engine of sectarian violence was the largely Sunni insurgency.

The insurgents remain particularly fierce in Anbar Province, the desert region covering much of western Iraq where the American military has taken a large share of its casualties in the past few years.

Officials did not disclose the circumstances of the American deaths that were announced Thursday — four marines and one sailor — except to say they occurred Wednesday as a result of wounds sustained during fighting in Ramadi, a city about 55 miles west of the capital, where American forces have been conducting a four-month, block-by-block offensive intended to wrest control of the streets from the resistance.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the senior military spokesman in Baghdad, said at a briefing on Thursday that American troops in Ramadi were making progress. "They are, in fact, moving forward," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0087159

Top American officials in Washington and Baghdad have projected an image of resolve and cooperation with their Iraqi counterparts this week in the face of the relentless violence and eroding public support for the war. President Bush and his two top officials in Iraq, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said in briefings that the Iraqi government had agreed to a timetable for security measures.

But in comments on Wednesday in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki suggested that his handling of Iraq's internal affairs would not be dictated by the American government.

In a news conference in Washington on Thursday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld accused critics of the administration of magnifying the differences between Washington and Baghdad over plans for Iraqis to take a bigger role in security.

"It's a political season, and everyone's trying to make a little mischief out of this, and turn it into a political football," Mr. Rumsfeld said. He added that the idea of setting benchmarks for Iraqi progress was "a process, not an event."

In his news conference in Baghdad, Mr. Maliki also cited an American-backed raid early Wednesday that focused on the suspected leader of a Shiite death squad, saying that the Iraqi government was taken by surprise by the operation.

General Caldwell said Thursday that the raid was led by Iraqi forces and concerned a suspect whom the Iraqi authorities had given prior approval to capture. "Notification was made to the government of Iraq," he said, "but it's apparent that it didn't make it to the prime minister."

The general said the American command was reviewing its notification procedures "to understand why the prime minister, as he states, had not been personally notified."

No Easy Answer To 'Kurdish Question' (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

Driving north through these folded, wheat-colored mountains, it is easy to forget you are in Iraq.

Miles to the south, the Iraqi flags disappeared, replaced by the flags of Kurdistan, a state that does not officially exist. Here in the northern mountains, though, even the symbols of the Iraqi Kurdish authority are nowhere to be seen.

Most of the flags here are those of the Kurdistan Workers Party — the PKK, listed by the U.S. and the European Union as a terrorist organization responsible for the loss of thousands of lives in a separatist campaign across the border in Turkey. Deep in the mountains, all the road checkpoints are operated by PKK guerrillas. A giant portrait of imprisoned guerrilla leader Abdullah Ocalan stretches across a rocky slope.

The fact that much of Iraq's rugged northern borderlands with Turkey and Iran are under the day-to-day control of a militant organization might come as a surprise to those who thought U.S. forces had handed over authority nationwide to a new Iraqi government.

The PKK's guerrilla camps, ordered closed by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki last month, still dot some of the steep valleys and ravines near the group's makeshift headquarters here; at least half the offices of its political affiliate, the Kurdistan Democratic Solution Party, also remain open.

The efforts to rein in the PKK are a new and strategically important front in the Bush administration's campaign to create a new Middle East, and one of the most complicated political problems U.S. forces face in Iraq. Kurdish leaders, for instance, have battled the PKK over the years in various intramural squabbles, but have been reluctant to clamp down on the group because of its deep popularity among the Kurdish public and out of sympathy for Kurds in Turkey.

Founded three decades ago as a violent Marxist resistance movement battling for independence of Kurds in Turkey, the PKK embarked on a concerted paramilitary campaign in 1984. It since has mellowed its politics but continues to field a force of as many as 6,000 guerrillas along the Iraqi-Turkish border, with about 1,000 of them well within Iraq, government officials estimate.

Within Turkey, violence connected with Kurdish separatists has escalated this year. In August, a group calling itself the Kurdistan Freedom Falcons claimed responsibility for several bomb attacks aimed at tourists that killed three people and injured dozens in Turkish coastal resorts. The group is widely believed to be an urban guerrilla offshoot of the PKK. The PKK has concentrated on attacking Turkish soldiers, using bases in northern Iraq as sanctuaries, according to the Turkish government.

In northern Iraq, the PKK militants get training in Shakespeare and Goethe, in the military tactics of the Thirty Years' War and how to operate a Russian-made BKC machine gun and a rocket-propelled-grenade launcher.

"We are here for one reason, and that is to obtain the objective of the freedom of our people of Kurdistan," said a doe-eyed young guerrilla who gave her name only as Ozgur and said she joined the movement when she was 13.

America's Kurdish dilemma stems from the fact that more than 20 million Kurds live straddled across the strategic borders of Iraq, Iran, Turkey and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0087160

Iraq's roughly 4 million Kurds are arguably the United States' strongest allies in the war-torn nation, and U.S. forces would almost surely face a political backlash in Baghdad if they took military action against guerrilla fighters many Kurds see as heroes.

Yet the Kurdish guerrilla force here is battling one of America's bedrock allies in the region — Turkey, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and a stable, secular Muslim state in a region trending in other directions. The continuing failure to end PKK violence coming out of Iraq has driven Turkey toward a stronger security arrangement with Iran, which also faces militant Kurds along the Iraqi border, a relationship that can't help but be worrying for Washington.

"How important is the PKK as an issue? Let me tell you that it's important enough that the president of the United States decided that we needed a special envoy to counter the PKK and to try to get all of our efforts in the United States focused in the right direction, along with those of Turkey and Iraq," retired Gen. Joseph W. Ralston, recently appointed the U.S. special envoy to counter the PKK, said after a visit to the region late last month.

"We all believe that the use of force is the last resort, not the first resort," he said. "But having said that, that does not mean that we will not take military action. Quite the contrary: All options are on the table."

The continuing polarization of Iraq and the mounting sectarian violence there have only exacerbated worries among its neighbors about reverberations within the substantial Kurdish minorities in Turkey, Iran and Syria.

Iraqi Kurdistan has moved steadily to distance itself from the violent skirmishing between Sunni and Shiite Arabs to the south; regional President Massoud Barzani's recent order to pull down the Iraqi flag on public buildings and replace it with the Kurdish flag is only one in a long line of moves to establish a truly autonomous Kurdish republic. Here in the north, there are Kurdish schools, Kurdish broadcast channels, Kurdish cellphone companies and a full-fledged Kurdish regional government.

Militant groups such as the PKK are demanding an end to repression of Kurds elsewhere, recognition of their national status and language and eventually some degree of political autonomy — measures that government leaders fear will open the door to demands for a Kurdish state, discarding the borders of four nations, a recipe for regional war.

That is why solving "the Kurdish question" has become a top priority for the U.S., and why tackling the PKK, its most militant face, has become step No. 1.

After Ralston's visit to the region, Iraqi leaders persuaded the PKK to declare a unilateral cease-fire, an end to the regular cross-border attacks that are claiming the lives of Turkish soldiers on a regular basis.

The PKK agreed, its leaders hoping the expression of goodwill could open the door to significant movement on Turkey's part, starting with an end to what it sees as human rights abuses, recognition of the Kurdish language and possibly amnesty for some PKK fighters who have not been involved in violence.

"I would like to say that the cease-fire has not been announced because of pressure at all," Cemil Bayak, a longtime leader of the group's most militant wing and a member of its ruling council, said in an interview over a lunch of grilled chicken and steaming vegetable stew at his mountain redoubt.

"The most important reason is that we want the Kurdish question to be solved peacefully, politically and by means of dialogue. This is what we want," said Bayak, who believed Turkey's bid to join the European Union would provide the impetus for human rights improvements needed to alleviate repression of the nation's Kurds. "We want violence to be put aside, and a new era to be opened on the issue."

But although the PKK has pledged to end its attacks on Turkish military targets, it is unclear whether the cease-fire will be embraced by other Kurdish militants, including the Falcons.

Turkish officials say the PKK is a terrorist organization that finances its activities through an international network of drug smuggling and human trafficking that reaches to Europe. Turkey is demanding the use of military force to disarm the PKK, but Iraq so far has refused, said Kosrat Rasoul Ali, vice president of the Kurdish regional government and a well-known former Kurdish peshmerga fighter.

"They want us to attack the PKK, they want us to crack down on the PKK," Ali said. "But it cannot be done. In the past we tried, but it was without result.

"We think that this problem cannot be solved with force," he said. "Because they are Kurds. It's very difficult for us Kurds to kill Kurds. In fact, it is impossible."

Ralston has refused to meet with PKK leaders, declaring, "We do not meet with terrorist groups." But Ali said Kurdish leaders hoped to broker a solution in which the PKK would disarm in exchange for guarantees on behalf of Kurds in Turkey.

"PKK is ready to hand over their weapons to the Americans, in return for several political steps by Turkey," Ali said. "Like a general amnesty to be published, to recognize Kurdish existence as a people in Turkey."

At the same time, some Iraqi officials believe Turkey and possibly Iran are behind some of the escalating violence in northern Iraq, especially in the city of Kirkuk, an oil center that Kurds hope to include within their federated republic, whose inclusion could form the basis for a powerful future Kurdistan economy.

DOJ_NMG_0087161

In a pointed warning, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said last month that Iraq was prepared to support opposition groups within neighboring nations whose governments it saw as instigating violence in Iraq.

Recognizing that America's prime aim is to discourage the growing closeness of Turkey and Iran at a time when the U.S. is seeking to isolate Tehran, PKK leaders are arguing that solving the Kurdish question — the main issue that Turkey and Iran have in common — is the best way to accomplish that goal.

"If you cannot solve the Kurdish problem in Turkey, you cannot separate Turkey from Syria and Iran," Bayak said. "And so without putting Turkey and the Kurds together, you cannot have the fundamental basis for this project of a new Middle East."

Marine On Trial Tells Of Killing Unarmed Iraqi (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct 26 — A 20-year-old marine testified on Thursday at his court-martial here that he participated in killing an unarmed Iraqi and knew that the plan for the killing was an illegal act of war.

The marine, Pfc. John Jodka III, who has agreed to cooperate with government prosecutors, pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in exchange for his testimony against members of his squad.

Private Jodka is the youngest and lowest ranked of the eight men charged in the killing of the Iraqi, Hashim Ibrahim Awad, who died of multiple gunshot wounds on April 26 near Hamdaniya, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

In a half-day of testimony, Private Jodka explained how his squad of seven marines and a Navy medic had come up with a plan that the men fully knew sidestepped the rules of engagement.

“I agreed to the plan,” he told the military judge, “and I agreed to go forward without objection.”

The plan, the marine said, involved kidnapping and killing an insurgent named Saleh Gowad, whom military intelligence officers had identified as a “high-value individual.” The plan was to shoot him in a setting that made it look as if Mr. Gowad had been surprised while digging a hole to plant a bomb.

“If anyone asked,” Private Jodka said, “we would say that we had seen this man approach with a shovel and begin digging and that he engaged us and that we had lawfully engaged him.”

But the squad members ended up kidnapping and killing the wrong man.

Private Jodka, who is to be sentenced on Nov. 15, told the judge that he understood that the killing would bring shame to the Marine Corps.

“Anything reported becomes ammunition,” he said. “Anything like this would present an argument against the war.”

Private Jodka is the second person to accept a deal in the case. The medic, Hospital Corpsman Third Class Melson J. Bacos, who was court-martialed on Oct. 6, will spend less than a year in prison in exchange for his testimony.

Karzai Orders Investigation Into Bombing By NATO (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 26 — President Hamid Karzai issued a presidential decree on Thursday directing a team of tribal elders and Afghan officials to investigate a NATO bombing Tuesday night in southern Afghanistan that local officials said killed dozens of civilians.

Khalid Pashtoon, an Afghan member of Parliament from the area of the attack, said villagers told him that more than 50 civilians died during the NATO airstrike in the Panjwai district of Kandahar Province. A spokesman for the country’s Interior Ministry said that 40 civilians were killed.

If even the lower number proves correct, Tuesday’s attack would be the largest civilian death toll in an airstrike since the American-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001.

Mr. Karzai also said in a statement about the attack that it would be discussed on Monday at a meeting of the Policy Action Group, where he and his ministers meet with NATO military commanders and foreign diplomats.

“The meeting will discuss ways to prevent civilian casualties during antiterrorist operations and to ensure better coordination between government and NATO forces,” the statement said.

For the last month, NATO has spoken optimistically about the removal of suspected Taliban fighters from the area, hailing it as a decisive victory against resurgent Taliban forces, who have carried out their highest number of attacks in Afghanistan since 2001.

Mr. Pashtoon, the member of Parliament, said villagers told him that hundreds of Taliban militants had recently re-infiltrated the area after being ousted from Panjwai by NATO troops in September.

DOJ_NMG_0087162

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, said the military alliance had aimed its attacks at Taliban fighters trying to re-enter the heavily populated area and blamed the insurgents for endangering civilians. He said NATO forces did not know the number of civilian casualties and would cooperate fully with the investigation.

"Re-infiltration is not a surprise because Panjwai is very important for the Taliban," he said, referring to the area's strategic value as a staging area for attacks on nearby Kandahar, southern Afghanistan's largest city. "We are having a lot of success, but it's a very big, very tough and continuing challenge."

Mr. Pashtoon said that NATO should not have carried out an airstrike during the Id al-Fitr holiday at the end of the holy month of Ramadan. He also said NATO did not have enough troops deployed in the area.

"They should have done a proper operation with troops on the ground," he said.

Afghan Officials Say Dozens Of Civilians Died In NATO Military Strike (WP/AP)

By Allauddin Khan

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

LAY KUNDI, Afghanistan, Oct. 26 -- Dozens of civilians were killed in a NATO military strike against suspected Taliban insurgents, Afghan officials said Thursday. Villagers fled the southern region by car and donkey, and hundreds attended a funeral for about 20 people buried in a mass grave.

The civilian death toll, estimated by Afghan officials at between 30 and 85, including many women and children, is among the highest in foreign military action here since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

NATO said a preliminary review found that 12 civilians were killed in the clashes Tuesday in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province. But the alliance could not say if they had died because of Taliban or NATO action.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said as many as 70 insurgents may have been killed in three clashes. The fighting took place in or around the villages of Lay Kundi and Mirwisa Mina. According to Knittig, Taliban fighters attacked NATO forces, drawing return artillery fire and airstrikes aimed at them.

Bismallah Afghanmal, a provincial council member, said fighters fled into civilian houses, which were then targeted by NATO forces.

Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman, said: "With insurgents who regard the population as a form of human shield for themselves, it obviously makes life very difficult for us, but it does not stop us from making every effort to ensure that we minimize any problems."

But villagers and local government officials denounced NATO and blamed the government for a lack of security. "The people are not forgetting the deaths of their children after a simple 'sorry,' " Afghanmal said.

"Everyone is very angry at the government and the coalition. There was no Taliban," Abdul Aye, who lives in Mirwisa Mina, said through tears at the mass funeral in Kandahar city. He said 22 members of his family were killed. "These tragedies just keep continuing."

Death tolls in remote military action in Afghanistan are difficult to determine, and estimates often vary widely. Also in question is who can be considered a civilian and who is a fighter.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly condemned civilian deaths caused by Western forces. A week ago, after nine villagers were killed during another NATO operation in Kandahar province, he urged the alliance to use "maximum caution" to avoid civilian casualties.

Tuesday's violence in Panjwayi came a month after NATO launched a major offensive in the district. The alliance said more than 500 insurgents were killed in the earlier operation, which the top NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, called a "significant success."

Richards last month said reconstruction and development efforts, which many officers see as critical for winning over Afghans after the military action, would soon begin in the region. But since then, heavy fighting has broken out.

Nato Denies Afghanistan Push In Disarray (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 27, 2006

Nato on Thursday sought to dismiss fears that its operation in Afghanistan was in disarray after a series of bloody and controversial incidents that have seen the alliance come under new pressure in the country's south.

Nato forces have been accused this week of killing dozens of civilians in an airstrike and have clashed with the Taliban in an area the alliance declared free of insurgents last month.

In a separate development, Ronald Neumann, US ambassador to Afghanistan, criticised a ceasefire deal reached by UK Nato troops and local groups in a town in Afghanistan's turbulent Helmand province.

DOJ_NMG_0087163

Nato said its show of force in recent months had put the Taliban on the defensive. Many western officials – such as Sir Richard Dannatt, head of the British army – argue that Nato troops are much better placed to contain the fighting in Afghanistan than equivalent forces in Iraq.

"We have demonstrated that we are strong enough on the combat side to be the winners," Mark Laity, Nato spokesman in Afghanistan, said on Thursday. "After 30 years of fighting, people in the south are nervous of being on the wrong side."

But on Thursday Afghan officials said a Nato airstrike on Tuesday had killed more than 60 civilians after Taliban guerrillas attacked western military bases.

Niaz Mohammad Saradi, district governor of Panjwai district, said 60 people were killed when Taliban fighters took cover inside houses in the village of Zangwat.

However, Bismillah Afghanmal, Kandahar Provincial Council member, said 85 people had been killed in the airstrike, and witnesses said 25 houses had been razed.

Nato said its troops had killed 48 militants in three battles in Panjwai on Tuesday and could confirm only 12 civilian deaths.

In September, Nato concluded operation Medusa, in which hundreds of insurgents were killed in Panjwai district. Nato officials said this had cleared the Taliban from the area.

The attack this week in Panj-wai came as British troops in neighbouring Helmand province withdrew from Musa Qala district, previously the scene of heavy firefights, after negotiating a truce with tribal elders.

This week Mr Neumann told the UK's Daily Telegraph that the "jury is out" on the Musa Qala deal.

"There is a lot of nervousness about who the truce was made with, who the arrangement was made with, and whether it will hold," he said.

Sam Zarifi at Human Rights Watch in New York said Nato's offensive had caused serious resentment among Afghans and been counter-productive.

"The Soviets tried and failed to defeat Afghan guerrillas by using massive firepower so we know clearly that that is not the way to win in Afghanistan. You have to win the populace over, not kill it," he said.

Scandal Hits Germany's Afghan Mission (FT)

By Hugh Williamson In Berlin And Daniel Dombey In London

Financial Times, October 26, 2006

The German army was on Wednesday plunged into a scandal over abuse by Bundeswehr soldiers in Afghanistan that overshadowed the adoption of the most far-reaching review of Germany's military priorities in 60 years.

Bild, the German newspaper, on Wednesday published five photographs that the paper said showed German soldiers desecrating a human skull while on patrol outside the Afghan capital Kabul, The photos show soldiers posing with a skull, in one case with an unidentified soldier holding the skull next to his exposed penis.

The photos date from early 2003, according to a military source quoted by Bild. The newspaper said that, after thorough checks, it was convinced the pictures were authentic. They also show vehicles with German markings and those of Isaf, the Nato-led peacekeeping force.

The photos, which immediately revived memories of the scandal over US military abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, could damage the German military's broadly positive reputation in Afghanistan, military and regional experts said. There are around 2,800 German soldiers in Afghanistan, based in Kabul and the north of the country.

Chancellor Angela Merkel said the photos were "disgusting". Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, said the soldiers' "inexcusable behaviour damages the image of the army and our country". Franz Josef Jung, defence minister, ordered an investigation, and Bundeswehr officials confirmed that two men, a soldier and former soldier, were being investigated. A state prosecutor launched an inquiry into a possible case of desecration.

Despite the scandal, Mr Jung said the cabinet strategy paper adopted on Wednesday was "vital in redefining Germany's security priorities", with the Bundeswehr now primarily acting as an "international intervention force".

The paper, which builds on a restructuring of the Bundeswehr in 2004, identifies terrorism and weapons of mass destruction as chief threats, and says in future up to 14,000 German troops will take part in peacekeeping and other missions, compared with 9,000 today.

The German armed forces association, representing ordinary soldiers, said the strategy paper should have gone further in defining the limits of Germany's responsibilities in joining international missions.

The ruling parties and most opposition politicians said the scandal over the abuse photos would not influence Germany's commitment to its role in Afghanistan, with only the opposition Left party calling for an immediate withdrawal from Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0087164

The photos scandal follows an announcement by the German parliament last week of an inquiry into allegations that a Turkish man with German residency had been abused in 2002 by German soldiers while being held in a US prison in Afghanistan.

Nato now has 31,000 soldiers in Afghanistan but is trying to find extra troops for a 1,000-strong reserve battalion to operate in the south of the country, as well as more air support.

Some US officials have called for German soldiers to be dispatched to the south. But Nato commanders have steered away from such a call, arguing that other countries could provide more effective help.

. . . With Forecasts (WT)

By Austin Bay

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

A Pentagon press lunch with the secretary of defense is a rare privilege, especially for a columnist from fly-over country.

I've watched Don Rumsfeld perform on television. He treats stand-up press conferences as sparring rings, where he's the heavyweight champ and reporters are lightweight chumps with glass jaws.

Maybe lettuce and tomatoes mellow Big Don. Mr. Rumsfeld seems much less combative with a salad in front of him. As the lunch and conversation progressed, I noticed he never picked up a knife, but I've no doubt the man can wield sharp cutlery. The glint in the eye is the clue. Sgt. 1st Class Bowen -- the Korean War vet who taught Cadet Austin Bay how to use a garrote -- had the same steely gleam.

I left it to the Beltway journalists to ask those personality-juiced queries that generate sensational gossip. Here's an example: "Mr. Rumsfeld, are you going to resign after the election?"

Since my scribbled notes include a splotch of asparagus soup, I'll have to paraphrase the defense secretary's snarl: "I certainly wouldn't tell you if I were."

Undeterred, I decided to ask a question that goes to the heart of America's ability (or inability) to win long-term, multidimensional 21st century wars.

My question: "Mr. Secretary, based on our experience in Operation Iraqi Freedom, and the limited interagency and nongovernmental organization [NGO] participation in that operation, how do you see 'Unified Action' evolving for future conflicts?"

Forgive the military jargon -- at one time I was Col. Austin Bay -- but the question is essential. It also altered the luncheon ambiance. As I asked it, I saw our very steady chairman of the joint chiefs, Gen. Peter Pace, pass Mr. Rumsfeld a careful stare.

"I'll tell you we're better at it now than we were five years ago," Mr. Rumsfeld replied. He acknowledged that "challenges remain" in achieving Unified Action and that effective Unified Action is critical to winning 21st century wars.

He's right -- we are better at it than we were. However, I know we aren't as good at it as we need to be.

The politically deft defense secretary finessed the question -- and it was finesse, not dodge. The military jargon masked a heavy political hand grenade I was rolling toward the Beltway. You think Harry Reid's land deal or Mark Foley's messages are big stories? How about a stinging pre-election turf battle between Defense and the departments of State, Treasury, Justice, Commerce and Agriculture, complete with zinger accusations of who is or isn't contributing to the war effort?

I know, that's quite a claim, which is why I need to translate the military-speak: Unified Action means coordinating and synchronizing every "tool of power" America has to achieve a political end -- like winning a global war for national survival against terrorists who hijack economically and politically fragile nations and provinces.

People understand the role of soldiers and cops in a war, but in 21st century wars where economic and political development are determinative, an Agriculture Department arborist and a Commerce Department trade consultant can be a powerful contributors to "Unified Action."

Restoring Iraqi agriculture provides an example. Saddam Hussein's economic and political policies damaged agriculture in the land that eight millennia ago spawned the Agricultural Revolution. (Heck of an achievement, huh?) Agriculture, Commerce and several NGOs have expertise and programs that help revive Iraqi farms. Still, problems occur when trying to tailor programs to meet specific local needs -- like, who pays for the program and is ultimately in charge of oversight and coordination.

While serving in Iraq in 2004, I met a young U.S. Army captain who was running a successful small-scale date palm restoration project. What we really need are joint development and security teams, where agricultural and economic specialists work with that captain "in the field" on a sustained, day-to-day basis. We need to decide who is in charge of that team (the captain or the arborist?) and how we fund it.

Our system for "Unified Action" is still largely a Cold War, 20th-century relic designed to prop up governments (so often corrupt and ill-led), instead of helping individuals and neighborhoods become economically self-sustaining and self-securing.

DOJ_NMG_0087165

Winning war in the Age of the Internet means improving neighborhoods and individual lives. The 2006 Nobel Peace Prize winner and micro-finance whiz Muhammad Yunus understands this.

We are in a long, global war, where economic and political development programs must reinforce security and intelligence operations -- and vice versa.

We've been improvising "joint development and security operations," and we've learned from our improvisation (Mr. Rumsfeld's "we're better than we were").

But it's time to quit improvising. Effective "Unified Action" requires re-engineering 20th-century Beltway bureaucracies -- which means thoughtful, sophisticated cooperation between the executive branch and Congress.

That means getting past the sensational gossip and confronting an essential issue.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monitor Widens His Probe; Earnings Tumble By 65% As Generic Saps Plavix Sales (WSJ)

By AVERY JOHNSON And JOHN CARREYROU

Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s third-quarter earnings were battered by generic competition to its bestselling drug, the blood thinner Plavix, and it disclosed that a federal monitor's investigation into its handling of a dispute over Plavix's patent has broadened to include possible securities violations.

It was unclear whether the widening scope of the probe being conducted by former federal judge Frederick B. Lacey means he has uncovered new wrongdoing in the three-month-old Plavix saga. Bristol-Myers said the development was "not unexpected" and suggested that it was a logical step given Mr. Lacey's duties.

Mr. Lacey has been overseeing the New York drug maker for more than a year on behalf of Christopher Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey. The unusual arrangement is part of a deferred-prosecution agreement that allowed Bristol-Myers to avoid criminal charges last year stemming from a previous accounting scandal.

Mr. Lacey last month made Bristol-Myers's board fire Chief Executive Peter R. Dolan after learning that he didn't keep directors well enough apprised of his attempts last spring to negotiate a deal to keep generic Plavix off the market.

The deal Mr. Dolan brokered with Canadian generic-drug maker Apotex Inc. -- which was intended to resolve Apotex's legal challenge of the Plavix patent -- unraveled this summer when agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Mr. Dolan's office and Apotex used certain binding clauses in the agreement to launch its generic product.

The Justice Department's antitrust division is investigating whether Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis, Plavix's original developer, struck a side deal with Apotex that they hid from regulators. Bristol-Myers has denied the existence of such a side deal.

Bristol-Myers yesterday disclosed that Mr. Lacey's own probe has now moved beyond issues of corporate governance to determining whether the company violated the terms of a consent order it entered into with the Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004. Under that consent order, Bristol-Myers settled SEC charges related to the previous accounting scandal by paying $150 million and agreeing to a permanent injunction against future violations of certain accounting provisions of federal securities laws. Mr. Lacey wasn't available for comment.

"Whenever we see a government investigation expanded, it's not a good thing, and because this company is already on probation, it's even more troubling," said Barbara Ryan, a pharmaceutical analyst at Deutsche Bank.

Bristol-Myers said the generic version of Plavix launched by Apotex on Aug. 8 is likely to have reduced Bristol-Myers's sales of the branded blood thinner by an estimated $525 million to $600 million in the quarter. In a conference call with analysts, the company cautioned that its revenues would continue to be hurt by the generic into the first quarter of next year, as wholesalers dispense to pharmacies remaining supplies of Apotex's product.

After that, branded Plavix sales are expected to bounce back. A federal judge in New York granted Bristol-Myers a preliminary injunction on Aug. 31 barring Apotex from selling any more of its product beyond what was already in the distribution channel. A hearing on an appeal by Apotex of that ruling is scheduled for Tuesday at the Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington.

Bristol-Myers raised back up its earnings outlook for the year from the reduced 95 cents a share it forecast in September to between 97 cents and $1.02 a share. It cited cost cuts, a favorable tax rate and slightly better-than-expected sales of branded Plavix.

DOJ_NMG_0087166

In the latest quarter, Bristol-Myers net profit fell 65% to $338 million, or 17 cents a share, from $964 million, or 49 cents a share a year earlier. Sales dropped 13% to $4.15 billion from $4.77 billion.

Sales of Plavix fell 36% to $630 million as the generic captured between 70% and 75% of U.S. prescriptions. However, the sales drop wasn't as sharp as analysts had expected. U.S. prescriptions of branded and generic Plavix grew by 14% in the quarter.

Plavix wasn't Bristol-Myers's only generic headache during the latest quarter. Pravachol, its cholesterol drug, went off patent in the U.S. in April and lost patent protection in France and other European markets in July. The drug's world-wide sales dropped 64% to $192 million. And Taxol, a chemotherapy product, lost market exclusivity in Japan during the quarter, contributing to a sales decline of 22%. Taxol had been off patent in the U.S. since 2000.

Global sales of Bristol-Myers's Reyataz HIV treatment grew 32%, while its Abilify schizophrenia drug grew 20%. Abilify has been slower to pick up in Europe, though.

On a conference call with investors, interim Chief Executive James M. Cornelius tried to dispel speculation that Bristol-Myers will fall prey to a takeover. "On the M&A front, my words to employees have been 'We're not for sale,' " he said.

Bristol-Myers has hired an executive-search firm to find a permanent CEO.

Bristol-Myers shares declined 13 cents to $24.53 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading.

Generic Rival's Inroads Hurt Bristol-Myers Squibb (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Still reeling from a generic assault on its top-selling product, Plavix, Bristol-Myers Squibb said yesterday that it lost up to $600 million in sales of the drug to a Canadian rival during the third quarter, accounting for part of a 65 percent decline in earnings.

The missteps by Bristol-Myers this year in negotiating a proposed patent settlement enabled the Canadian company, Apotex, to flood the market in August with a cheaper generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner.

Bristol-Myers also disclosed yesterday that one of the federal investigations into its handling of the Plavix matter, a review by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in Newark, had expanded to an examination of whether Bristol-Myers violated securities laws.

The Plavix debacle largely accounted for the company's decline in overall sales to $4.15 billion, compared with $4.76 billion in the quarter a year earlier. It was also partly responsible for sharply lower earnings of $338 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with $964 million, or 49 cents a share, in the third quarter last year.

The 2005 earnings included a significant one-time gain from the sale of the consumer medicines business.

The lower sales and revenues at Bristol came as drug companies have generally been posting improved results for the quarter. GlaxoSmithKline said yesterday that its quarterly earnings were up 15 percent.

Despite the bad news for Bristol, the company gave a slightly brighter outlook for the year than it issued in late summer, just after the generic Plavix flooded pharmacy shelves.

Yesterday, the company raised its earning projections to at least 97 cents a share this year, rather than the 95 cents it previously predicted. That is partly because some orders for Plavix are still coming in.

And yet, during a telephone conference with investment analysts yesterday, Andrew Bonfield, Bristol's chief financial officer, said that there was enough generic Plavix in supply chains to last into early next year and possibly into the second quarter of 2007. That means Bristol-Myers could still be dealing with the inexpensive competition when a trial starts in Manhattan on Jan. 22 to decide whether its Plavix patent is valid.

The outcome of that trial would determine whether Apotex has the right to ship additional supplies of the generic product. Currently, 70 percent to 75 percent of the prescriptions for Plavix are being filled by the generic supplies that Apotex shipped to the United States before Bristol-Myers obtained an injunction to block further shipments.

The company's fumbled plan to settle its dispute led to the generic company's shipments and the dismissal of the Bristol-Myers chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, in September. The company is now led by an interim chief, the former Guidant chairman James M. Cornelius.

Mr. Cornelius, speaking about the company's future during a conference call with analysts, played down continuing speculation that Bristol-Myers was a takeover candidate.

"My words to employees have been we're not for sale," Mr. Cornelius said. "The longer I'm here the more confident I become that Bristol-Myers Squibb has a wonderful future as an independent company."

Bristol-Myers said yesterday that Mr. Christie's office was investigating whether the company violated a consent decree the company signed in 2004 with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The agreement with the S.E.C. was a settlement of claims that Bristol-Myers misled investors about its financial outlook by lying about its wholesale inventories.

The expanded Plavix investigation by Mr. Christie's office is in addition to an investigation already under way by the Justice Department's antitrust division into whether Bristol-Myers tried to hide details of its Apotex negotiations from government antitrust reviewers.

The Plavix problems are coming at a time when demand for the drug is increasing. Prescriptions for the medicine and its generic equivalent were up 14 percent in the third quarter, an increase that is partly related to new advice from doctors that patients who have received drug-coated stents to keep their arteries open should continue Plavix therapy to avoid clotting around the stents.

Plavix sales in 2005 were $3.5 billion in the United States, but probably would have surpassed $4 billion this year if not for the flood of generics. The company also said it had been harmed by generic competition to its cholesterol-lowering drug Pravachol.

Bristol-Myers Profit Falls As Plavix Copy Hurts Sales (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, October 27, 2006

Oct. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s third- quarter net income fell 65 percent after cheap generic copies of its best-selling drug, Plavix, flooded the U.S. market.

Earnings declined to $338 million, or 17 cents a share, from $964 million, or 49 cents, a year earlier, the New York-based company said today in a statement. Sales of Plavix, used to prevent heart attacks and strokes, plunged 43 percent in the U.S. Profit beat analysts' estimates.

``Plavix was down dramatically, but it was not as bad as we thought," said Barbara Ryan, a Deutsche Bank analyst in Greenwich, Connecticut, in a telephone interview today. ``The issue now is we still don't know how much generic Plavix is out there and how much it will impact earnings next year."

The U.S. widened a probe of a deal delaying generic Plavix competition to review possible securities-law violations, Bristol-Myers said today. The company's board fired Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan last month after an accord he brokered collapsed and triggered a criminal antitrust investigation. The drugmaker needed revenue from Plavix to sustain earnings as it introduces new products.

Excluding certain costs, Bristol-Myers said profit was 22 cents a share, beating the 21 cents estimated by Credit Suisse analyst Catherine Arnold in New York, rated with five out of five stars on accuracy by StarMine Corp., and the 20-cent average estimate of 18 analysts in a Thomson Financial survey.

The company raised its 2006 net income forecast to between 97 cents and $1.02 a share from its previous estimate of no less than 95 cents. Bristol-Myers said it now projects full-year profit per share excluding certain costs of $1.02 to $1.07.

Revenue Drops

Shares of Bristol-Myers fell 50 cents, or 2 percent, to $24.16 at 11:26 a.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock was up 6.1 percent this year through yesterday, rebounding from a 22 percent plunge in August as generic Plavix went on sale.

Interim CEO Jim Cornelius said on a conference call that ``we are not for sale" and a search for a permanent chief among internal and outside candidates is under way.

Third-quarter revenue decreased 13 percent to $4.15 billion. Sales of Plavix fell to $474 million in the U.S. Worldwide revenue from the pill dropped 36 percent to $630 million.

Plavix, with $6.3 billion in revenue last year, was the second-biggest-selling drug in the world behind Pfizer Inc.'s cholesterol pill Lipitor.

Apotex Inc., a closely held Canadian generic-drug maker, started selling its cheaper copies of Plavix Aug. 8 after U.S. regulators rejected an accord with Bristol-Myers and marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis SA to postpone generic sales until 2011. A U.S. judge ordered Apotex to halt shipments Aug. 31, pending a court dispute over Plavix patents.

Plavix Probe, Suit

A U.S. Justice Department investigation of whether the Apotex agreement violated antitrust laws ``has been expanded to include a review of whether there was any violation of federal securities laws," Bristol-Myers said in today's statement.

At the end of September, three of every four Plavix prescriptions were being filled with the generic, said Chris Shibutani, an analyst with J.P. Morgan, in an Oct. 20 note.

Sales of generic Plavix will continue to affect revenue for the rest of this year and into 2007, Bristol-Myers said. Cheaper generic copies reduced third-quarter revenue by $525 million to $600 million, the company said.

Generic copies of Plavix will ``likely'' run out in the 2007 first quarter, Andrew Bonfield, Bristol-Myers chief financial officer, said on the conference call.

Alabama Suit

An Alabama company sued Bristol-Myers and Sanofi yesterday in New Jersey, saying the two overcharged for the drug and downplayed its health risks. Alexander City, Alabama-based Skilstaf Inc. contends in the federal lawsuit that recent studies show Plavix is no better at helping heart-attack victims ward off future events than aspirin.

Marc Greene, Sanofi's spokesman, wasn't immediately available for comment. Laura Hortas, a Bristol-Myers spokeswoman, said the company was aware of the case and declined to comment.

Worldwide pharmaceutical sales fell 17 percent to $3.2 billion. U.S. drug revenue dropped 22 percent to $1.6 billion, reflecting generic competition for Plavix and Pravachol, a cholesterol-lowering medication that lost patent protection.

New Products

Bristol-Myers has introduced eight new drugs in the last four years and has eight more in the late stages of development.

In June, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration granted accelerated approval for Sprycel, a pill for two rare cancers of the blood and bone marrow. Sprycel had sales in the quarter of $11 million. Bristol-Myers said there are 30,000 patients who might benefit from the drug.

In July, the agency cleared Atripla, a once-a-day pill for HIV combining Bristol-Myers's Sustiva with Gilead Sciences Inc.'s Viread and Emtriva medicines. Atripla and Sustiva had combined sales of $201 million, up 18 percent over the previous year.

Sales of the HIV drug Reyataz, first approved by U.S. regulators in 2003, grew 32 percent to $233 million, the company said. A 300-milligram dose of Reyataz got U.S. approval Oct. 20.

Pravachol, the cholesterol drug that was Bristol-Myers's biggest seller before losing U.S. patent protection this year, had revenue of $192 million, a 64 percent decline.

The cancer treatment Erbitux, which Bristol-Myers markets with New York-based ImClone Systems Inc., recorded a sales increase of 64 percent to $175 million. In March, the drug, already approved in the U.S. for colon cancer, won additional regulatory clearance for treating head and neck malignancies.

Sales of Baraclude, a hepatitis B treatment, tripled to $22 million. Schizophrenia treatment Abilify sales were up 20 percent, to $313 million.

Feds Broaden Probe Of Bristol-Myers (DOW)

By Peter Loftus, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, October 27, 2006

A federal investigation into Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s (BMY) proposed settlement of a patent dispute has been expanded to determine whether the deal violated securities laws, the drug maker disclosed Thursday.

Earlier this year, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis (SNY), which co-market the heart drug Plavix, reached a proposed settlement with Apotex Inc. of Canada to stave off the introduction of a generic version of Plavix until 2011. The deal fell apart after state regulators objected, and Apotex sold generic Plavix for about three weeks in August before a judge's order halted sales.

Bristol-Myers previously disclosed that the U.S. Attorney's office in New Jersey began an investigation into corporate governance issues related to the company's negotiations of the proposed settlement. Also, the Department of Justice's antitrust unit launched a criminal investigation into the proposed settlement, Bristol disclosed in July.

On Thursday, Bristol-Myers said the U.S. Attorney's office investigation has been expanded to include a review of whether there was any violation of federal securities laws in connection with the proposed settlement. Bristol-Myers said this was in connection with the terms of a consent order entered into with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2004.

Bristol disclosed the development in a press release for its third-quarter financial results.

The 2004 SEC agreement settled charges that Bristol-Myers engaged in a fraudulent earnings management scheme that was unrelated to the current Plavix matter. The settlement required Bristol-Myers to pay $150 million and included a permanent injunction against future violations of certain accounting provisions of federal securities laws.

In a related development in June 2005, Bristol-Myers agreed to pay an additional $300 million as part of a deferred-prosecution agreement with the U.S. Attorney's office in Newark, N.J. Under that pact, federal prosecutors agreed to defer prosecution on a charge of conspiring to commit securities fraud for two years. If at the end of two years, Bristol-Myers has fully complied with the terms, the criminal complaint will be dismissed.

DOJ_NMG_0087169

The terms included Bristol-Myers' agreement to submit to an independent monitor, former federal judge Frederick Lacey. It was Lacey's oversight, in connection with the U.S. Attorney's office probe into corporate governance issues surrounding the proposed Plavix settlement, that led to the firing of Peter Dolan as CEO last month.

In recent premarket activity, shares of Bristol-Myers were quoted at $24.75, up 9 cents from Wednesday's close.

SEC Brings Fewer Enforcement Cases (WSJ)

By Judith Burns And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission brought about 10% fewer enforcement actions in fiscal 2006 than the prior year, marking a three-year decline from a record high in fiscal 2003, according to individuals familiar with the results.

The decline in cases comes as the SEC enforcement division is under scrutiny from congressional investigators, led by Sen. Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican. The Government Accountability Office said last week in a letter to Sen. Grassley, who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, that it would grant his request and review the SEC's enforcement and examinations divisions.

The GAO also said it would review the agency's oversight of the self-regulatory bodies at the New York Stock Exchange and National Association of Securities Dealers. SEC spokesman John Heine said the agency welcomes the review.

Sen. Grassley's interest stems from allegations by a former SEC enforcement attorney who says he was fired once he sought to take the testimony of John Mack, a Wall Street chief executive, in connection with an insider-trading investigation involving Pequot Capital Management Inc., a hedge fund. The former SEC attorney, Gary Aguirre, says his supervisors refused to allow him to take Mr. Mack's testimony because of his political connections and clout. Mr. Mack was a major fund-raiser for President Bush during the 2004 election.

The SEC has denied political favoritism. Earlier this month, the SEC notified Pequot and Mr. Mack, now chief executive of Morgan Stanley, that it wouldn't file charges against them.

Securities regulators brought fewer than 600 cases in the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, according to the individuals familiar with the results, down from 630 in fiscal 2005 and 639 in fiscal 2004. The SEC hit its high in fiscal 2003 with 679 cases.

The SEC did set a record for deregistering shares in companies that are late in filing financial results, bringing about 90 such actions in fiscal 2006, nearly three times the level in the prior fiscal year.

Critics say deregistration cases are relatively easy to bring, and some believe they conceal a steep decline in enforcement cases even as the SEC's enforcement budget has grown to support about 1,200 staffers.

The SEC plans to release its enforcement results next week and is expected to point to a hiring freeze and staff turnover as factors in the declining case output.

Mr. Heine said preliminary estimates show the SEC lost 31 "full-time equivalent" positions in enforcement in fiscal 2006, a 2.4% decline from fiscal 2005.

"There's no question that if the staff numbers had not declined in the last few years, we would have been able to bring more cases," Mr. Heine said.

He said the SEC expects an 8% to 10% decline in enforcement cases from fiscal 2005 to fiscal 2006 but noted that year-to-year comparisons "are difficult to make because cases are so different."

Some attorneys say they see no evidence that the SEC's enforcement staff is pulling its punches amid a backlash from business groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which issued a report in March questioning whether the SEC's enforcement program is becoming too punitive and pursuing cases it shouldn't.

"I don't think anybody has pulled back because of the chamber report," said one of its authors, Bruce Hiler, a partner with the law firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft, in Washington, D.C.

Some critics blame SEC management for the drop-off, suggesting top enforcement officials are playing it safe. Others point to the five-member commission, which votes on each action and has been split in the past when a proposed settlement would penalize companies, something opponents say may only inflict additional harm on shareholders.

Faced with potential stalemate on some cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox worked with commissioners to hammer out a policy, announced with great fanfare in January, to help resolve such matters. SEC critics say they see no evidence the agreement has helped the commission sign off on a number of older cases. Others say it has created additional paperwork at the staff level, which has bogged down new cases.

S.E.C. Facing Wide Review Of Practices (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0087170

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission, under scrutiny for its handling of an insider-trading case involving a prominent hedge fund, will be the subject of a broad review by the investigative arm of Congress, the Government Accountability Office.

Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, last month asked the office in a letter to conduct a review of the commission because he was growing concerned, he said, about whether it is "faithfully adhering to its mission."

The S.E.C. is charged with protecting investors by policing the nation's financial markets and prosecuting violations of securities law by individuals and companies.

Last week, the G.A.O. accepted Mr. Grassley's request that it review two S.E.C. divisions: its enforcement unit, which brings civil securities suits, and the office of compliance, inspection and examination, which oversees money managers, brokerage firms, stock exchanges and other regulated entities.

The G.A.O. will also examine whether the commission adequately monitors self-regulatory organizations — like the New York Stock Exchange and NASD — that refer cases to the commission for possible enforcement actions.

"Congress needs an independent analysis of whether the institutions that are responsible for protecting investors are keeping up in a fast-changing marketplace," Mr. Grassley said yesterday in a statement. "It's been a long time since there's been this kind of thorough review. The integrity of our financial markets and, in turn, the well-being of individual investors depends on checkpoints that stop insider trading and manipulation."

John Heine, a spokesman for the S.E.C., said, "We welcome the review and look forward to any recommendations that might follow."

Mr. Grassley's request comes amid an inquiry by his staff and by the Senate Judiciary Committee into the S.E.C.'s handling of an insider trading investigation involving Pequot Capital Management, a $7 billion hedge fund run by Arthur J. Samberg. That investigation, which focused on a number of profitable trades by Pequot in advance of mergers or other market-moving news, commenced in 2004 and was being overseen in 2005 by Gary J. Aguirre, a staff lawyer at the S.E.C.

Mr. Aguirre has told the Senate that in the midst of his investigation, his superiors blocked him from taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and a friend of Mr. Samberg. Mr. Mack now heads Morgan Stanley.

S.E.C. officials argued that Mr. Aguirre was not justified in taking Mr. Mack's testimony because he could not show that Mr. Mack had inside information or a clear motive for giving it to Mr. Samberg. The investigator said he was simply asking to interview Mr. Mack, not bring charges. Mr. Aguirre protested the decision and was fired in September 2005, a year after he was hired.

Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

During the summer, the S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony. Earlier this month, the agency closed the Pequot investigation, advising Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack that it would not recommend any enforcement actions against them or the hedge fund.

Mr. Grassley wants the G.A.O. to analyze referrals sent to the S.E.C. by exchanges to see how many actually translate into regulatory actions, to examine what types of cases the S.E.C. brings, and how it begins and tracks its investigations.

Mr. Grassley also asked the office to review how the commission ensures that stock exchanges police their members adequately and whether the systems at these exchanges ensure that "influential individuals" cannot gain access to data that are not public.

Mr. Grassley has shown particular interest in the S.E.C.'s policing of possible insider trading by institutions like hedge funds and brokerage firms. Securities regulators in Britain have made insider trading, especially involving hedge funds, an enforcement priority recently.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated, large pools of capital that play an increasingly powerful role in world markets; they control more than $1.2 trillion in assets.

Richard J. Hillman, managing director of financial markets and community investment at G.A.O., said that his organization gets frequent requests to study the commission's operations. In 2004 and 2005, for example, the G.A.O. examined the commission's mutual fund oversight; last year, it reviewed how it assesses and collects fines, penalties and disgorgement in its cases.

S.E.C. officials have not finished compiling data on enforcement cases brought or opened during its most recent fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30. For the 11 months that ended in August, the S.E.C. opened 838 investigations. Full-year figures for investigations opened in 2005 totaled 947, down from 975 commenced in 2004.

SEC Steps Up Scrutiny Of Fund Administrative Fees (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith And John Waggoner

USA Today, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is accelerating a probe of 27 investment company advisers that paid $230 million in mutual funds assets for administrative fees from 1999 to 2004 to a third-party service provider that funneled most of the payments right back to the investment advisers.

The SEC probe gained traction when the contractor, Bisys Fund Services, which performs recordkeeping and other back-office services for the advisers, agreed last month to pay $21.4 million to settle a case against it and to cooperate in the larger investigation.

"Our investigation is ongoing," SEC Pacific regional director Randall Lee said Thursday. The agency has begun to issue letters requesting details of the fee-splitting arrangements. Mutual funds employ investment advisers to manage the funds. These advisers farm out much of the work to third parties.

Although the suspect fund managers have not been identified in agency documents, AmSouth Bank disclosed in August 2005 that the SEC was threatening to bring an enforcement action related to its fee-splitting relationship with Bisys. AmSouth said it voluntarily refunded payments to its AmSouth Funds unit, which it subsequently sold.

Another bank, BB&T, said Thursday that it employed Bisys in a similar arrangement but that it restructured the relationship in late 2004 or early 2005 to reduce the fees borne by fund investors.

"We have worked diligently over time to reduce the expense structure," said Keith Karlawish, president of BB&T Asset Management.

Karlawish said that BB&T had been in contact with the SEC about the relationship and said the bank is reviewing its relationship with Bisys, which still works for its funds, in a lesser role than before. "The whole situation is under review," Karlawish said.

Several other banks, including JPMorgan Chase, which inherited a large contract with Bisys when it acquired the former Bank One in 2004, declined to comment.

The SEC laid out Bisys' secret fee-splitting agreements in an administrative proceeding that Bisys settled without admitting wrongdoing. The SEC said investment advisers contracted Bisys to administer their funds with side agreements that entitled them to a portion of its fees without disclosing the arrangement to fund investors or even the funds' boards of directors.

Bisys kept only about $10 million of the fund assets it was paid over five years, the SEC said. The rest went back to the investment advisers as marketing fees.

Russel Kinnel, head of fund research at Morningstar, said, "In every case where there was a kickback, you know that some senior (officials) gave up their fiduciary responsibility and sold out fund shareholders."

Former Executives Of Delphi To Face SEC Civil Claims (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell In Washington And Jeffrey Mccracken In Detroit

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission approved the filing of civil fraud claims against the former chairman and chief executive of auto-parts maker Delphi Corp. and against its former chief financial officer in connection with accounting improprieties, according to people familiar with the matter.

The five-member commission voted unanimously yesterday to approve a settlement with Delphi, in which the auto-parts maker would settle allegations of accounting improprieties that resulted in a multiyear restatement of earnings, these people said. The company, which is in bankruptcy court protection, won't be subject to a penalty, these people said.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin declined to comment, except to say "Delphi has been cooperating with the SEC investigation."

Meanwhile, the SEC is investigating the role of Delphi's outside auditors during this time period, Deloitte & Touche LLP, these people said. A Deloitte spokeswoman declined to comment.

Former chairman and chief executive J.T. Battenberg III will be named in a civil complaint and is expected to fight the allegations, said the people familiar with the matter. Mr. Battenberg's attorney, William Jeffress, didn't respond to a phone call or email.

Meanwhile, former chief financial officer Alan Dawes also is expected to face claims, these people said. Mr. Dawes has agreed to a settlement, which the commission has approved, these people said. Mr. Dawes's attorney, Elizabeth Baird, declined to comment, saying she "has nothing to say until the SEC has something to say."

The SEC also is expected to file civil claims against several former executives, some of whom are expected to simultaneously agree to settle the allegations. It is unclear which other former executives will face the claims.

Resolving the case could help Delphi firm up its funding prospects to help it emerge from bankruptcy. Delphi, which makes auto parts such as steering systems and satellite radios, is hoping to exit bankruptcy before the middle of 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0087172

Mr. Battenberg retired from the company a week before the SEC probe was made public. Mr. Dawes resigned last year after an internal investigation uncovered accounting improprieties.

Also expected to face claims is a non-Delphi executive that was involved in some of the questionable accounting and helped Delphi misrepresent a contract when the supplier was questioned by auditors, said the people familiar with the matter. It is unclear who this executive will be.

At least four other Delphi executives have resigned or lost their jobs in connection with the investigation. Among them were former Delphi controller and chief accounting officer Paul Free and former vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions John Blahnik. An attorney for Mr. Blahnik didn't return a call seeking comment. Mr. Free couldn't be reached.

Attorneys for various former Delphi executives and officials earlier this month asked a bankruptcy judge to force the parts maker to cover legal costs from responding to federal subpoenas and civil lawsuits over the company's accounting woes. Delphi halted such payments when it filed for bankruptcy in October 2005.

Laura Marion, former director of financial accounting, was among other ex-Delphi officials who sought money to cover their legal costs. Her attorney couldn't be reached.

In February, the company's compensation committee denied a request from some of the former executives and employees for legal reimbursement, and "ceased advancement of expenses," the executives and employees said.

The committee provided no explanation for its decision but made it clear that future requests would also be denied, they said. Reimbursements have since ceased to all nine of the executives and employees.

The former employees asked U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain to force Delphi to advance legal fees and costs, or to allow a corporate insurer to advance defense costs. The judge is expected to hear arguments on this issue in late November.

Ultimately, Delphi in its own review found improper accounting for rebates and other lump-sum payments from suppliers, off-balance sheet financings of indirect materials and inventory, and payments and credits for warranty and health-care issues.

SEC To Charge Delphi Ex-execs (DEN)

Detroit News, October 27, 2006

Former leaders of bankrupt parts maker face fraud accusations after 27-month probe.

The Securities and Exchange Commission met Thursday and plans to file civil fraud claims against several former executives of bankrupt Delphi Corp. following a 27-month investigation, according to people familiar with the situation.

The Wall Street Journal reported that two of the executives charged will be former chairman and CEO J.T. Battenberg III and former chief financial officer Alan Dawes. The Detroit News has learned that two others will be John Blahnik, the former Delphi vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions and Paul R. Free, former chief accounting officer.

Reached by The Detroit News late Thursday, Battenberg's lawyer William Jeffress declined to comment. A person reached at Battenberg's home in Naples, Fla., late Thursday declined to comment. She said Battenberg was traveling and unavailable for comment.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin also declined comment other than to say the company has cooperated with the SEC's investigation.

The charges are likely to be filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit, possibly as early as Monday, one person familiar with the investigation told The News.

The Journal reported the SEC's five-member commission also voted unanimously to approve a settlement with Delphi. The company agreed to settle allegations of improper accounting that led to the restatement of some earnings, it said, adding Delphi won't be subject to a penalty.

Laura Marion, who had served as director of financial accounting and reporting is expected to face civil charges, the sources said.

The News confirmed that SEC officials made several courtesy calls Thursday to lawyers representing former Delphi officials to alert them of the pending charges.

The SEC's investigation has found that Delphi used various improper methods to inflate earnings, cash flow and revenue, which hid the declining health of the company, according to people familiar with the matter.

Several large transactions weren't accounted for properly, including a $237 million payment Delphi made to its former parent, General Motors Corp.

Lawyers for many of the former Delphi executives under scrutiny have argued to the SEC that there is no evidence they personally profited from the improper accounting. They also contend that before the Enron debacle and the 2002 corporate reforms, some of the accounting practices in question were commonplace.

Many of the targets have been in settlement talks with the SEC. The SEC has sought to impose stiff fines against former executives -- in some cases nearly $1 million -- in the Delphi investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0087173

It isn't clear if any settlements have been reached or if Delphi will have to pay a corporate penalty.

Prior to Delphi's financial turmoil and the accounting scandal, Battenberg was among the most-respected auto executives in Detroit.

Throughout his career, he held a variety of assignments covering aspects of automotive design, engineering, manufacturing, finance and sales and has worked in both the United States and Europe.

Battenberg's automotive career began as a General Motors Institute (now Kettering University) engineering student in 1961, sponsored by a GM plant in Kansas City, Mo.

He was named to lead the initial public offering and eventual spin-off of Troy-based Delphi in 1999.

Battenberg retired from Delphi in July 2005, a week before the SEC charges became public.

He retired last year when Robert S. "Steve" Miller took over as Chairman and CEO of Delphi and eventually took the company into Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

A criminal investigation by the justice department is ongoing.

Ex-Trader Found Guilty, But Judge Questions Case (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

David Finnerty, a former star trader on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, was convicted of charges that he made thousands of improper trades that cheated investors out of millions of dollars. However, in a move that may bolster any appeal, the federal judge in the case raised questions about the verdict.

After just one day of deliberations, the jury of six men and six women found Mr. Finnerty, 40 years old, guilty of three counts of securities fraud. Mr. Finnerty, a former specialist at Fleet Specialist Inc., now a unit of Bank of America Corp., oversaw trading of General Electric Co., one of the most heavily traded stocks at the NYSE, and prosecutors allege that Mr. Finnerty had more troubling trades than any of the other specialists who have been charged. Mr. Finnerty faces as long as 20 years in prison for each count.

The verdict provided a boost for federal prosecutors in Manhattan, who have lost two similar cases and dropped two others. There are six cases left to be tried. But immediately after the verdict was handed down, U.S. District Judge Denny Chin raised questions about the government's case, saying there "is some fuzziness in the law."

Judge Chin said the trading practice in question appeared to be widespread at the NYSE and that many trading firms had made a lot of money by trading in between public buy and sell orders, which the government alleges harmed investors. The seven NYSE specialist firms paid about $248 million in 2004 to settle civil cases related to the trading. The judge said he wasn't inclined to reverse the verdict but his comments are likely to strengthen any appeal or result in a reduced sentence.

The government had accused Mr. Finnerty of improperly positioning himself between public buy and sell orders more than 26,000 times between 1999 and 2003, generating $4.5 million in illegal profits for his firm and hundreds of thousands of dollars in inflated bonuses for himself.

"Just because everyone cheats on their taxes doesn't make it right," Judge Chin said.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in the Southern District of New York declined to comment.

Fred Hafetz, Mr. Finnerty's attorney, called the verdict "troubling." He said the judge's comments address issues he plans to raise in a motion to have the verdict set aside. Mr. Hafetz argued the trading wasn't criminal and many of the stock trades were mistakes. The entire trading in question amounted to less than 1% of each specialist's volume, he added.

"So what if it's only a small percentage of the time," assistant U.S. Attorney Anirudh Bansal said during his closing argument in Mr. Finnerty's trial. "Does that make it right to steal?"

Prosecutors indicted the 15 elite traders, known as specialists, last year as part of a broader crackdown on white-collar crime, one of the most serious criminal actions ever brought against NYSE traders. Two other specialists have been convicted and two others have pleaded guilty. Convincing a jury that the highly paid traders were engaged in improper trading has been difficult. Much of the evidence was technical and hard to understand.

Stocks Populi (WSJ)

By Arthur Levitt Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

Ever since the recount of 2000, partisans of both parties have paid particular attention to everything from who votes to how they vote and how their preferences are recorded. Counting every vote is not only integral to our political life; it is central to our economic life as well. Shareholder capitalism enables our markets to thrive, our companies to grow and our economy to remain strong. And central to this system is the principle that shareholders can have a voice in the running of the companies that they own, that their votes will count.

This fall, the issue has been the focus of a series of court cases, decisions and now potential Securities and Exchange Commission action. How the SEC handles this can have a profound effect on the future of shareholder democracy, corporate governance and the future of our markets. It's a matter of interest to all investors.

For years, shareholder advocates have been working to gain better access to companies' proxies so that they can put forward resolutions and, most importantly, their own candidates for director slots. Even though boards of directors have improved considerably since the passage of new independence standards and disclosure requirements in Sarbanes-Oxley, the ability of shareholders to remove directors is critical when seeking to revive a moribund corporation. Yet currently, board elections are one-party affairs, with the incumbent board's choices winning in virtually every case. Shareholders can only put forward candidates after costly proxy campaigns. A director has a better chance of being struck by lightning than losing an election.

After failing to convince the SEC to pass a proxy access proposal in 2003, shareholder advocates tried to make changes in the bylaws of companies that govern the elections of directors in order to make them fairer. They argued that this was a matter of process under applicable law (that is, did not directly relate to the election of directors, a basis of exclusion), and thus management had to put such a proposal on its proxy card to shareholders. In September, in a case concerning AFSCME, the large public employee union that wanted to put forward these changes at AIG, an appeals court ruled that such a bylaw change was proper and that management would have to open its proxy to proposals regarding how directors were elected. (Full disclosure: I was retained by AIG's board to help restructure its corporate governance; I had no involvement in this matter.)

In response, the SEC rightly decided to re-examine this issue and clarify the law. An open hearing on the topic was scheduled in October but was delayed until Dec. 13. The outcome of this session is critical to the future of shareholder capitalism. The signal the commission sends is an important one. Support of the AIG decision will make it clear that the reforms of the past few years were not ephemeral, and that even though the markets are once again delivering high returns, the commitment to good governance will not falter.

The upcoming meeting is the right time and place for the commission to set expectations for our public corporations. Indeed, an understandable desire for consensus on such a difficult matter is less important than the clarity of the SEC's message. While passing an entirely developed proxy access plan may be too much to ask, the SEC can set a direction by making it clear that it will not ignore the issue of fairness that precipitated this latest litigation and put forward a series of steps that will strengthen shareholder democracy.

Part of this should include safeguards such as a minimum requirement of shares held in order to put forward director nominees. Other changes that can be made are: an increase in the number of exempt solicitations from 10 persons to 20 as long as those solicited are institutions or "accredited investors" so that investors can easily communicate with each other; the electronic transmission of proxy materials to those who desire them in that form, a move that can boost shareholder participation and reduce cost; and an endorsement of the principle of majority rule and schemes that bring this to publicly traded companies. A growing number of corporations have taken this last step, and it's important for the SEC not only to allow but also to affirmatively promote it as a best practice -- even urging the exchanges to include majority-voting among their listing standards.

By setting this tone, the SEC will make a strong statement about corporate governance. It will demonstrate that accountability is a principle that will not be compromised. It will bolster its admirable efforts on executive compensation; after all, disclosure provisions are toothless if shareholders are unable to act upon them. And an endorsement of shareholder democracy will show investors world-wide that in our markets, their voices matter and their votes count.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Special Prosecutor Picks Apart Witness In CIA Leak Case (SDUT/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald took on the first witness in the CIA leak case Thursday, dissecting an expert witness until she acknowledged errors and misstatements in her research.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, hoped the hearing would persuade a judge to let him call a memory expert at his obstruction and perjury trial in January.

At the outset of the procedural hearing, U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton indicated that he was not inclined to allow a memory expert to testify at the trial. Still, he allowed Libby's lawyers to present a witness to bolster their claim that memory experts would help in his defense.

DOJ_NMG_0087175

When it came Fitzgerald's turn, the veteran prosecutor launched into a nearly three-hour cross-examination of the witness – psychologist Elizabeth Loftus – that had some members of the audience shaking their heads.

It was the first public courtroom confrontation between Fitzgerald and Libby's defense team and foreshadowed a contentious trial.

Libby wants to use a memory expert to help argue that, when he made false statements to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame, it was because of faulty memory. Prosecutors say he lied.

Loftus testified that many jurors don't understand how memory works and how unreliable it can be.

Fitzgerald challenged the validity of memory research. Citing footnotes in her publications, presenting conflicting statements and questioning her methodology, Fitzgerald got Loftus to acknowledge that a statement in one of her research papers was taken out of context and that a figure in one of her books was incorrect.

Libby's defense team had no comment after court.

Walton did not immediately rule on whether to allow the memory testimony at trial. He closed the courtroom to continue the debate over how much classified information Libby should be allowed to present at trial.

Libby is the only person charged in the leak case. Plame believes the Bush administration leaked her name to reporters as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

In The Libby Case, A Grilling To Remember (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

With withering and methodical dispatch, White House nemesis and prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald yesterday sliced up the first person called to the stand on behalf of the vice president's former chief of staff.

If I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was not afraid of the special counsel before, the former Cheney aide, who will face Fitzgerald in a trial beginning Jan. 11, had ample reason to start quaking after yesterday's Ginsu-like legal performance.

Fitzgerald's target in the witness box was Elizabeth F. Loftus, a professor of criminology and psychology at the University of California at Irvine. For more than an hour of the pretrial hearing, Loftus calmly explained to Judge Reggie B. Walton her three decades of expertise in human memory and witness testimony. Loftus asserted that, after copious scientific research, she has found that many potential jurors do not understand the limits of memory and that Libby should be allowed to call an expert to make that clear to them.

But when Fitzgerald got his chance to cross-examine Loftus about her findings, he had her stuttering to explain her own writings and backpedaling from her earlier assertions. Citing several of her publications, footnotes and the work of her peers, Fitzgerald got Loftus to acknowledge that the methodology she had used at times in her long academic career was not that scientific, that her conclusions about memory were conflicting, and that she had exaggerated a figure and a statement from her survey of D.C. jurors that favored the defense.

Her defense-paid visit to the federal court was crucial because Libby is relying on the "memory defense" against Fitzgerald's charges that he obstructed justice and lied to investigators about his role in the leaking of a CIA operative's identity to the media. Libby's attorneys argue that he did not lie -- that he was just really busy with national security matters and forgot some of his conversations.

When Fitzgerald found a line in one of her books that raised doubts about research she had cited on the stand as proof that Libby needs an expert to educate jurors, Loftus said, "I don't know how I let that line slip by."

"I'd need to see that again," Loftus said when Fitzgerald cited a line in her book that overstated her research by saying that "most jurors" consider memory to be equivalent to playing a videotape. Her research, however, found that to be true for traumatic events, and even then, only 46 percent of potential jurors thought memory could be similar to a videotape.

There were several moments when Loftus was completely caught off guard by Fitzgerald, creating some very awkward silences in the courtroom.

One of those moments came when Loftus insisted that she had never met Fitzgerald. He then reminded her that he had cross-examined her before, when she was an expert defense witness and he was a prosecutor in the U.S. attorney's office in New York.

Libby's defense team declined to comment.

Access To Files Delays Jefferson Probe (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 27, 2006

Action unlikely before primary

WASHINGTON -- With unexpected delays in copying records and computer files taken from Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, it is unlikely the Justice Department will seek an indictment against the eight-term New Orleans Democrat before the Nov. 7 primary, legal observers say.

The delay may even force the decision past the Dec. 9 runoff that will be held if none of the 12 candidates in the 2nd Congressional District race wins more than 50 percent of the primary vote.

Neither, the Justice Department nor attorneys for Jefferson would comment. Jefferson has denied wrongdoing and has pointed to the lack of indictment after 18 months of investigation as evidence that he has been wrongly targeted.

Since the probe began in March 2005, two former Jefferson associates have pleaded guilty, including Vernon Jackson, CEO of the Louisville, Ky., technology firm iGate Inc.

Jackson said in court documents that he paid more than $400,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help getting telecommunications contracts in Nigeria and Ghana. An FBI raid of Jefferson's Washington home in August 2005, uncovered $90,000 in marked $100 bills in his freezer, money that Jefferson had said in secretly recorded conversations with a government informant was intended as a bribe for the vice president of Nigeria, according to an FBI affidavit.

The issue holding up the case is whether prosecutors should have access to materials seized from Jefferson's Capitol Hill office on May 20 and 21, the first FBI raid of a sitting member of Congress. Experts said that with the final disposition of the documents before the courts, the Justice Department isn't likely to move forward until it either gets access to the material or it is ruled off limits.

And while the Justice Department says it doesn't put much consideration into timing of elections, the agency has never brought an indictment closer than two weeks before an election. The primary is now 11 days away.

Under a process established by a three-judge federal appeals court panel, Jefferson's attorneys are to be given access to the materials taken from his office on a "rolling basis" of between 1,500 and 1,700 pages at a time. They'll have a chance to specify what material should be kept from prosecutors and then Chief District Court Judge Thomas Hogan will make recommendations to the appeals court on whether he concurs or disagrees.

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said that a Justice Department that argued it needed access to evidence in Jefferson's office would not want to proceed with a case against the congressman until it exhausted all efforts to get the material.

Politics also argue against bringing an indictment before the legal status of the search of Jefferson's office is determined.

If the Justice Department were to seek an indictment now, Tobias said, it would signal that the raid, which touched off angry reaction from the Republican and Democratic leaders of the House over what they called violations of the Constitution's separation of powers clause, wasn't necessary.

Political analysts said the likelihood that Jefferson won't be indicted before the primary and perhaps before the runoff is generally good news for his campaign.

"Certainly it helps him if nothing happens before the election," New Orleans pollster Silas Lee said. "It still leaves a question looming over his head. It's a two-part question: Will they indict him before the election and will they ever indict him? Part one has been answered."

There's been no public explanation for the delay in getting copies of the documents taken from Jefferson's office more than five months ago to the congressman's attorneys. Two people familiar with the investigation said that there was a "computer glitch," but could provide no details.

Trandahl Names Kolbe As A 'Problem' With Page Program, Source Says (ABC)

By Rhonda Schwartz And John Yang Report:

ABC News, October 27, 2006

A source close to former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl told ABC News that Arizona Congressman Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) was one of a small number of "problem members" of Congress who page program supervisors complained spent too much time socializing with pages, taking them to dinner or sporting events outside of official duties.

Mark Foley was also on the list.

The source said Trandahl frequently cautioned both congressmen that "adults should hang out with adults, pages should hang out with pages," a message Trandahl also conveyed to pages during their orientation.

DOJ_NMG_0087177

Yesterday in Tucson, in his first meeting with reporters since returning from a European vacation, when asked by ABC News about Trandahl's reported allegations, Kolbe responded, "I would love to comment on a lot of these things, but I think it's just appropriate to say we're cooperating fully with all the inquiries."

Kolbe was also asked by reporters to respond to reports that the U.S. Attorney in Phoenix has opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 camping trip Kolbe took with two high school boys, both former pages, following a report by MSNBC that one adult member of the trip was "creeped out" by "fawning, petting and touching" on the arms, shoulders and back of one of the teenagers by Kolbe.

"I know there are a number of inquiries underway, and we're cooperating fully with all those inquiries, and I'm sure at the end of the time it will show that we acted appropriately and did exactly the right thing," Kolbe said.

U.S. Indicts Fugitive Sought As Witness To City Corruption (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Matt O'connor And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 27, 2006

In a fresh attempt to bring a corrupt City Hall contractor back from Mexico to testify against Chicago officials, federal prosecutors announced Thursday that they are again charging the fugitive with a 12-year-old drug crime.

Marco Morales had pleaded guilty to bribery and mail fraud in the Operation Silver Shovel corruption case and had agreed to testify about bribing a high-ranking official in Mayor Richard Daley's administration. But Morales fled to Mexico in 1997 and his lawyers defeated an attempt to have him shipped back to Chicago last year to testify for prosecutors and serve his prison term.

Thursday's superseding indictment against Morales marked yet another front in U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald's efforts to target corruption in the Daley administration.

Morales is believed to be living on Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula, and his lawyer in Mexico City said Thursday that Morales would continue to fight extradition.

If convicted on the drug count, Morales could get up to 40 years in prison and a $1 million fine, authorities said.

"The government intends to ask Mexican authorities to extradite him to face today's cocaine distribution charge," the U.S. attorney's office announced in a prepared statement.

A spokeswoman for the Daley administration declined to comment Thursday.

Morales pleaded guilty to the same drug charge in 1996, but prosecutors agreed to drop the charge as part of a plea bargain. Under that deal, Morales was to serve a 59-month sentence on mail fraud and bribery charges and testify against two city officials, including former Transportation Department deputy commissioner Anthony Pucillo.

Ran pro-Daley group

Pucillo, who has denied wrongdoing, ran a pro-Daley political group of city workers, according to testimony in the recent hiring fraud trial of the mayor's patronage chief.

Morales disappeared before reporting to serve his sentence. He later said he fled after being threatened at gunpoint by two men who warned him to stop helping prosecutors.

Acting on an American extradition request, Mexican authorities arrested Morales in Merida in May 2004. A Mexican appeals court ordered him released a year and a half ago, ruling that the statute of limitations on his bribery and mail fraud crimes had expired.

Federal prosecutors in Chicago had promised at the time to explore their options for seeking Morales' extradition.

A retired federal prosecutor who unsuccessfully sought Morales' extradition in 2005 said the resurrected narcotics charge against the fugitive could yield his return to Chicago.

Joan Safford was the legal attache at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City in 2005 when a Mexican appellate court rejected a U.S. bid to have Morales extradited to Chicago to face the charges. Under Mexican law, Morales had to be arrested within 6¼ years after he was supposed to surrender to federal prison. His arrest came about 2½ months late, Safford said.

The statute of limitations in Mexico for narcotics offenses, however, is 17½ years, Safford said. The FBI videotaped Morales delivering two pounds of cocaine to a government mole in August 1994.

"His charge for narcotics is still within the statute of limitations for Mexico," Safford said.

But Jaime Tacher, the Mexico City lawyer who repelled the first effort to extradite Morales, said the U.S. government's new effort "is even weaker than the case it had two years ago."

Tacher said Mexican courts were unlikely to extradite Morales because the allegations are so old and because the U.S. government is trying to bring Morales back to face new charges rather than serve a sentence.

"Marco can be declared a political defendant," Tacher said in a telephone interview. "When the Mexican judges see that we won the first time, they will view this new extradition attempt as a vendetta by the U.S. prosecutors."

DOJ_NMG_0087178

Tacher said he first learned about the re-indictment from a reporter and he was unable to contact Morales on Thursday. Morales' cousin, Norma Hoyos, who lives in Merida, said Thursday that Morales was traveling in Mexico to sell his paintings..

First in Silver Shovel

Morales, 61, was the first person charged in the Operation Silver Shovel probe. The investigation resulted in the conviction of six Chicago aldermen and a dozen other people as a result of 3½ years of undercover work by John Christopher, a lifelong mob-connected crook whose hundreds of secretly recorded tapes were the underpinnings of the investigation.

Morales originally pleaded guilty to the drug charge in February 1996, a month after the undercover probe went public. Prosecutors eventually restructured the deal so Morales might avoid deportation once he completed his prison term.

Morales pleaded guilty to bribing a Chicago official for lucrative construction contracts and cheating a Laborers Union local out of $160,000 in pension and welfare contributions.

The evidence against Morales on the narcotics charge appears to be rock-solid. As a hidden FBI videocamera captured the scene in Christopher's office, Morales delivered a sample of cocaine to Christopher on Aug. 11, 1994.

Eight days later, Christopher, wearing a body recorder, handed Morales $25,000 in cash as they sat in Christopher's car outside Morales' business.

Morales counted the money aloud, according to Morales' first plea agreement.

Later that afternoon, Morales was videotaped as he delivered two pounds of cocaine to Christopher in Christopher's office.

Since Morales went on the lam, his son's construction company has received tens of millions of dollars in city contracts. Morales has denied that the contracts to his son were given in exchange for his silence.

In a 2005 interview with the Tribune, soon after his release from a Mexican jail, Morales attributed much of his success as a city contractor to cash-stuffed envelopes that he passed to officials who handled contracts for the Daley administration.

Morales said he did not think he was doing anything wrong when he bribed city officials: "Everybody was doing the same thing."

Masilotti Plans To Step Down From Commission (PALMBEACHP)

By Tom Dubocq, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 27, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Under pressure from federal investigators, County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti has informed the county administrator that he will resign Friday — even though his term expires in a matter of weeks.

"I have been advised by an attorney for the commissioner that I will receive a letter of resignation from the commissioner in the morning," Administrator Bob Weisman said late Thursday. "I am to fax it to the governor's office."

Masilotti could not be reached Thursday evening. But in an interview earlier in the day, the beleaguered commissioner said he was on the brink.

"You get to a point of wondering, how are you going to keep fighting this?" Masilotti told The Palm Beach Post. "It's difficult to eat, to sleep, to do anything. It's difficult to get anything done in a storm."

Masilotti's successor will be elected Nov. 7 and sworn in Nov. 21. Weisman said he alerted commissioners Thursday night of Masilotti's impending departure so they could prepared for a transition. Vice Chairwoman Addie Greene is in line to ascend.

"Frankly, I am kind of shocked to have received the call," Weisman said.

Masilotti said Thursday that federal prosecutors are threatening to charge him with "honest services" fraud, a crime that upon conviction carries a prison term of five to 20 years.

"I thought I was doing right," he said of his involvement in land deals under scrutiny by a federal grand jury. "It wasn't public corruption or kickbacks. ... The U.S. Attorney told me that these things weren't illegal — except that I didn't disclose them."

The "honest services" law is a 28-word federal statute that allows prosecutors to charge public officials with corruption even if there was no direct bribe to secure an official act. In general, it makes it a federal crime for officials to deprive their constituents of their honest efforts to represent them.

"It's more than a cozy relationship, it's a corrupt relationship," explained former U.S. Attorney Kendall Coffey. "Prosecutors are looking for financial inducements that corrupt the motives of a public official. It's not enough to be a lobbyist or a campaign contributor. It's like having someone who is on the take who can give you an inside track. It's a corrupt relationship even if a specific vote is not involved."

Convictions under the law have been overturned in the appellate courts because the law is arguably vague — prompting Masilotti to ponder an aggressive defense.

"I am really not sure. I don't know what to do," he said. "I need the advice of my attorney. I may have to just stand and fight."

Masilotti, 50, a former Royal Palm Beach mayor, first was elected to the county commission in 1998 and was reelected in 2002. Term-limited, he was preparing for a third and final run when he abruptly scrapped his reelection campaign in May and declared he wanted to spend more time with his children.

Before withdrawing from the race, Masilotti had been defending his connection to a multimillion-dollar land acquisition in Martin County reported weeks earlier in The Post — disclosures that eroded his support in the ranks of his Republican Party.

Masilotti at the time maintained that he did nothing wrong, that the stories were an attempt to oust him from office.

"There is nothing inappropriate about buying or selling land," he said from the commission dais. "And in fact I would put out a challenge to the publisher of The Post: If I or any of my family members did anything illegal, I will resign from this post, if in fact the editor of The Post will resign when they admit I did nothing wrong."

A federal grand jury soon was investigating the deal and another in Royal Palm Beach in a probe that has since mushroomed.

The Post reported in April that Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with a $40 million land purchase in Martin County by the South Florida Water Management District in 2003. The family's interest was hidden through a secret land trust and a tangled series of real estate transactions. Although Masilotti insisted he had no direct involvement, interviews and documents obtained by The Post showed he pushed for the water district purchase, without revealing his family's interest.

The grand jury also has subpoenaed records concerning Masilotti's promotion of a second real estate deal in 2003 and 2004 involving two investors who profited from the water district purchase. The investors bankrolled a bid to acquire 49 acres in Royal Palm Beach owned by the Diocese of Palm Beach.

Masilotti met twice with the bishop and wrote letters on Palm Beach County stationery urging the sale, records show. Once the investors had a contract on the property, Masilotti arranged a meeting with the county engineer to resolve a dispute over the proposed development's impact on traffic. Masilotti defended his actions, saying he was merely helping constituents.

Last month, the grand jury subpoenaed Masilotti's older brother, Paul, a building inspector for the village of Wellington, in connection with a land purchase in Brevard County. The 300 acres had been acquired in 2005 for $7.7 million in cash by a limited liability company whose manager was an attorney who also works for Palm Beach Aggregates, a major landowner in Tony Masilotti's commission district.

After the land purchase, Paul Masilotti paid the taxes on the property. Tony Masilotti said Thursday that his brother owned the Brevard County parcel, that he had acquired it from Palm Beach Aggregates in exchange for a property purchase option in Palm Beach County.

"Paul had a purchase option on a piece of property that (Palm Beach Aggregates President) Enrique Tomeu needed," the commissioner said. "Paul was planning to build a horse manure processing facility, but instead he swapped it."

Paul Masilotti's attorney could not be reached Thursday and Palm Beach Aggregates has declined comment on the grand jury matter.

Tony Masilotti said the company's dealings with his brother had nothing to do with his pivotal role in the county's approval of 2,000 homes and up to 50,000 square feet of commercial space on Palm Beach Aggregates' land. Until then, development had been limited to 120 homes.

"I honestly didn't know about it," the commissioner said. "If I had known, I would have told my brother not to buy land in Palm Beach County. I'm sure he didn't intend to hurt me."

Palm Beach County Commissioner Masilotti Resigns As Feds Investigate (FLSUNSEN)

By Josh Hafenbrack, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 27, 2006

Palm Beach County Chairman Tony Masilotti is resigning from office amid ongoing federal investigations into his potential misuse of power in several secret land deals, the top county administrator said Thursday.

Masilotti will fax a letter of resignation to County Administrator Bob Weisman Friday morning, Masilotti's attorney told Weisman, bringing his eight-year commission career to an end just three weeks before his term expires.

Weisman said he would forward the resignation to Gov. Jeb Bush, who has the power to appoint a replacement. But with only three weeks left in Masilotti's term, Bush may not do anything, Weisman said.

"The (commission) can function with six people," he said. "The election is close."

Masilotti could not be reached for comment Thursday evening, despite messages left on his cell phone. Earlier Thursday, standing in his Royal Palm Beach insurance office, Masilotti declined to talk about whether he was considering resignation, saying he was advised by his attorneys to stay silent.

"At this time, I'd rather not say anything about that," said an uncharacteristically subdued Masilotti, 50, a politician known to jump to his own defense.

The mercurial Masilotti's almost 20-year rise to political power, which began as Royal Palm Beach mayor, ends in scandal. The FBI probe into Masilotti focuses on a government land deal in southern Martin County, in which Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, pocketed roughly $1.3 million. The profit was shielded through a secret trust, but it came to light in the Masilottis' divorce papers in January.

FEDS AIM TO 'BOX' IN UNION BIG (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell And Neil Graves

The New York Post, October 27, 2006

October 27, 2006 -- The feds have more than 100 boxes of evidence in their racketeering case against Queens Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin, officials said yesterday.

Assistant federal prosecutor Daniel Braun said he gathered "over 100 boxes of documents and other materials" that he'll use as evidence that the fallen labor leader stole $2.2 million from taxpayers and the electricians union.

McLaughlin, 54, who made his first appearance in federal court in Manhattan yesterday, had no comment before Judge Kenneth Karas.

Because of the stacks of evidence, Karas set the next court date for Dec. 14.

McLaughlin, who was booted as president of the New York City Central Labor Council, faces charges for allegedly stealing from the state, his union, his political campaign, contractors and even a Queens Little League, federal prosecutors charged last week.

New York Daily News, October 27, 2006

Indicted labor leader Brian McLaughlin is accused of showering gifts on lady friends, but yesterday he had a peck on the cheek for his wife, Eva, when she dropped into a Manhattan courtroom.

During a brief court appearance yesterday, McLaughlin's attorneys got Manhattan Federal Judge Kenneth Karas to agree to loosen the Queens assemblyman's travel restrictions, letting him go to New Jersey and Connecticut, where he has family.

Previously, he was allowed to travel only within New York.

Next week, McLaughlin's attorneys will get a peek at some 100 boxes of evidence that federal and city investigators compiled during their lengthy probe of the former head of the New York City Central Labor Council.

McLaughlin, dressed in a dark suit and blue tie, declined comment after leaving the courtroom with his wife and attorney Michael Armstrong.

Armstrong is a former federal and Queens prosecutor who was appointed last year by Mayor Bloomberg to serve as chairman of the Commission to Combat Police Corruption.

McLaughlin, 54, is accused of stealing $2.2 million in taxpayer funds to pay for fancy cars, country clubs and a Long Island mansion. He's also accused of looting nearly $100,000 from the bank account of a Queens Little League.

And the feds say he took $61,000 from a contractor to pay for a Mercedes-Benz for his wife. He also allegedly gave gifts - including money - to unnamed lady friends.

Ruleville Chief Pleads Guilty To Extortion, Protecting Drug Dealer (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 27, 2006

OXFORD, Miss. - Federal prosecutors said Ruleville Police Chief Ronald Durelle Robinson pleaded guilty Thursday to an extortion charge, admitting that he took cash for not pursuing drug and gambling charges against a person he thought to be a crack cocaine distributor.

As part of the plea agreement, other federal charges against Robinson will be dropped when he is sentenced within the next 45 to 60 days, said James D. Maxwell II, assistant U.S. attorney for north Mississippi.

Robinson faces up to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and up to three years' supervised release, prosecutors said. He remains free on a $20,000 bond.

Robinson, 46, and Ruleville Assistant Chief Larry Mitchell, 33, were indicted by a federal grand jury on July 25, but the indictments were sealed until the men were arrested Aug. 4 in the Delta town of 2,935.

Robinson and Mitchell were suspended without pay and police Lt. Amos Mitchner was appointed to serve as acting chief.

The indictment says that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack dealers and other people Robinson and Mitchell believed to be distributing crack.

The FBI said Robinson was charged with one additional extortion count and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute. The indictment named Mitchell on one additional extortion count and two counts of attempting to aid in the possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine.

Mitchell is set for trial Jan. 29 in U.S. District Court in Oxford before Judge Glen H. Davidson. Maxwell said he could not disclose whether Robinson is cooperating with prosecutors in the case against Mitchell.

Robinson entered his guilty plea before Davidson.

If convicted, Mitchell faces a maximum 40 years in a federal prison and a $2 million fine on the most serious charge. Before entering his plea, Robinson faced the same possible penalties.

Robinson in 2004 told The Associated Press that his yearlong campaign against drug dealers had led to threats against his life and bribery attempts. At the time, his department was responding to protests by some residents who claimed serious injuries suffered by a drug suspect were the result of police brutality.

Robinson had said the suspect injured himself but "a small group of people" wanted to use the incident to force him out of office and end efforts to rid the town of a serious drug problem.

Texas Murder-For-Hire Convict Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 27, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A man was executed Wednesday for initiating a murder-for-hire plot that authorities said led to the fatal stabbings of his parents and an uncle.

The lethal injection of Gregory Summers, 48, came more than seven years after the execution of Andrew Cantu, convicted of taking the $10,000 offer and fatally stabbing Gene and Helen Summers, both 64, and Billy Mack Summers, 60. Their home in Abilene was set on fire after they were attacked and their bodies were found in the rubble.

Asked by Warden Thomas Prasifka if he had a final statement, Summers replied "no." Eight minutes later, at 10:16 p.m. EDT, he was pronounced dead.

Attorneys for Summers tried Wednesday to block the punishment by challenging the constitutionality of the injection method, accusing prosecutors of hiding evidence and raising questions about testimony from a trial witness who implicated Summers.

The U.S. Supreme Court three weeks ago refused to review his case. Three appeals went to the high court late Wednesday, and all were rejected.

"These were real people that we all loved very, very much," Arbie McAliley, the victims' niece, said after witnessing the execution. "Justice was served, we believe in our hearts."

Authorities said the 1990 slayings were the result of Summers' parents' frustration with bailing their son out of his financial problems and Greg Summers' attempt to get $24,000 in life insurance.

"His father had come to the end of his rope with Greg and was starting to cut him off financially," said Kent Sutton, who prosecuted Summers. "Greg was going to inherit everything and that was one of the reasons he wanted the house burned."

Prosecutors also showed how Summers previously collected insurance payoffs from fires at his grandmother's house and a vehicle.

"Greg was pure evil. He'd been bleeding them dry for money over the years, and when he realized he couldn't get any more out of them, he figured he could get their insurance," said Miles LeBlanc, Sutton's prosecutor partner.

"He was so cruel in what he did to them and he needs to pay," said Brenda Steele, who lost her aunt and two uncles. "They loved Greg and they overlooked a lot of things they probably shouldn't have."

Cantu, 31, had denied involvement and blamed the killings on two companions who testified against him.

"We were able to find enough circumstantial evidence to piece together a strong case," LeBlanc said. "Greg Summers earned his conviction."

Summers was the 22nd inmate executed this year in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state. At least three other inmates have execution dates over the next four weeks.

Charges Possible In Skid-row Patient Drop-offs In Los Angeles (USAT)

By William M. Welch
USA Today, October 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES — A hospital here is under criminal investigation for possibly dumping of homeless patients on skid row — a practice that the Bush administration says is widespread in the USA and "inhumane."

Los Angeles Police Capt. Andrew Smith says "there's a strong likelihood criminal charges could be filed" against Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center after five patients were brought by ambulance Sunday to the city's drug and crime-infested skid row section.

Philip Mangano, executive director of the U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness, called the alleged dumping "abhorrent ... inhumane and horrific."

He says such actions by hospitals and other institutions have contributed to homelessness problems across the country. Stopping the practice and getting people into stable living situations, he said, are goals of agreements that the council has entered into with 281 cities.

Cities with such 10-year-plans to combat homelessness and find permanent solutions include New York, Chicago, Denver, Miami, San Francisco and San Diego.

Los Angeles does not have such a plan, Mangano said. "Inappropriate discharge" by hospitals puts people on the street, he says, fills up temporary shelters and sends its victims into cycles of hospitalization and arrest that are costly to the public.

"Unfortunately, it's all too common a practice around the country," Mangano says. "It's wrong for the person. It's certainly wrong for our society. ... It's wrong for the taxpayer because the taxpayer is the one who is saddled with that person's recycling over and over through the system."

Examples include workers at a mental hospital in Colorado who were accused in 2003 of dumping a discharged patient out of a wheelchair and onto a sidewalk at a Denver homeless shelter. Hospitals around Riviera Beach, Fla., were accused in 2000 of discharging patients into squalid, filthy motel rooms with little food or assistance.

In Los Angeles, police videotaped the ambulance's arrival and interviewed the patients who said they didn't want to be taken there, Smith said. At least two of the patients had homes, one with family and the other at a convalescent home in Pasadena, he said.

The hospital's president and chief executive officer, John Fenton, issued a statement saying "the allegations ... are unfounded" and asking for a meeting with the city attorney to discuss its discharge practices. Fenton did not return numerous calls from a reporter seeking comment.

City Attorney Rocky Delgadillo says he opened an investigation into the dumping of indigent people on skid row a year ago and that the events Sunday are a significant break in the case.

In March, police released videotapes they said showed a 63-year-old woman dropped off on a skid row street still wearing a hospital gown and slippers. The woman had been a patient at Kaiser Permanente's Bellflower Medical Center. Kaiser officials apologized and promised it would not happen again.

Delgadillo said a range of civil and criminal violations could be brought for discharging patients without adequate planning. He said false imprisonment and dependent-care abuse were among violations that would be considered.

Fenton, in his statement, said the hospital does not have an emergency room and is not covered by a federal law that requires appropriate discharge of patients from emergency care.

Delgadillo called Sunday's incidents "very serious" and said skid row — a 50-square-block area — is a dangerous place to leave anyone.

"I can't think of a more perilous situation than the heart of skid row," he said.

D.C. Jury Acquits Jemal Of Bribery (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Dana Hedgpeth
The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

Douglas Jemal, one of Washington's most prominent developers, was acquitted yesterday of charges that he bribed a city official to get sweetheart contracts and inflated profits at taxpayers' expense.

DOJ_NMG_0087183

The jury in U.S. District Court convicted Jemal of one lesser count of wire fraud. But the panel resoundingly rejected the crux of the government's case, acquitting Jemal and two top lieutenants of his company, Douglas Development Corp., of the more serious charges of conspiracy and bribery.

"God bless you all," a tearful Jemal told jurors when he saw them leaving the courthouse. Giving them hugs, he declared: "Thank you, sweetheart. Thank you, dear."

From the start, Jemal, 63, denied wrongdoing in his dealings with the city. When he was indicted along with son Norman Jemal and leasing agent Blake Esherick in September 2005, Jemal said he was looking forward to the chance to clear his name and theirs after nearly two years of overlapping city and federal investigations.

Just before 3 p.m. yesterday, Jemal stood ramrod-straight in the courtroom as the jury foreman began to read the group's decision. When the foreman said, "Not guilty," on the chief counts, Jemal bent forward, his eyes beginning to water and rimmed with red. All told, he was acquitted of six of seven charges.

Prosecutors said Jemal could face up to 20 years in prison on the wire fraud charge. But under federal sentencing guidelines, his sentence could be much lighter, and he could wind up with just probation.

Known as a maverick developer who helped turn the city's East End near the Verizon Center from run-down storefronts into a vibrant area of housing, restaurants and shops, Jemal has an array of ambitious projects ahead, stretching from downtown to the banks of the Anacostia River in Southeast to Richmond. Now he will return to his daily routine -- and his trademark cowboy boots and jeans, which he had ditched for business attire for court.

He, his son and Esherick had recruited a veritable who's who of preeminent Washington defense lawyers to represent them in the trial that began Sept. 11. The jury acquitted Norman Jemal, the company's vice president, of all charges but found Esherick guilty on the wire fraud count as well as two counts of tax evasion relating to underreporting his income from Jemal. The bribery charges were always considered the most toxic in the case, but Esherick's conviction on the three felony counts is a serious blow, carrying the possibility of significant jail time.

Defense attorneys said they hoped to get the convictions overturned.

"We're relieved, of course," said Reid H. Weingarten, the lead defense attorney for Douglas Jemal. "He was charged with horrible crimes, of ripping off the District -- charges that never should have been brought."

U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said the guilty verdicts against Douglas Jemal and Esherick were a "vindication of a majority of our case." He defended the prosecution, saying, "This was a tough case, but given the serious allegations, we had to bring it."

The wire fraud charge stemmed from a document that Jemal and Esherick falsified and then used as a justification to get a mortgage company to release $430,000 in loan proceeds. The money went to a different business deal than the one specified in the mortgage. The defense contended that Jemal had a right to the money and that no one was hurt.

The prosecution's case focused most heavily on the angle of public corruption -- citing exorbitantly priced leases and invoices that a D.C. government property official arranged for the city to pay Douglas Development from 2001 to 2003. The government said Jemal and his team needed those deals to keep the company's overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices and used phony documents and bribes to get them.

The government's star witness, former deputy director of property management Michael Lorusso, testified that he arranged overpriced deals, costing the city millions, for an impoundment lot in Prince George's County and office space at 77 P St. NE. Lorusso said he also authorized payments for nonexistent work.

Lorusso said that his goal was to enrich Jemal and that as payback Jemal's team gave him $10,000 cash in a humidor, a Rolex, trips to Las Vegas and other gifts. Lorusso pleaded guilty to taking bribes in 2004; he could get a lesser sentence in return for his cooperation.

Defense attorneys said Jemal was fiercely loyal to friends and generous with gifts. But prosecutors Mark H. Dubester and Tim Lynch argued that the gifts came with expectations and said that no reasonable person could believe Jemal would give another man a Rolex -- just to be friends -- a few months after meeting him.

Jurors said they saw no proof that Jemal meant to bribe anyone.

"We went strictly on the evidence, and there was none," said juror Stephanie Vasquez, 20.

Defense attorneys argued that Jemal profited on city deals because he was a good businessman.

In some of the trial's most dramatic moments, Weingarten tried to shred Lorusso's credibility. In one withering exchange, Weingarten got Lorusso to admit that nearly every line of the rÃ©sumÃ© he wrote to get his city job was falsified.

Some jurors said they considered Lorusso a "colossal liar."

"Oh, God -- Lorusso, " said juror Rosanne Goodie, 43. "What could you believe with him?"

A female juror who spoke on condition of anonymity said Jemal seemed to be the victim. "A man in high places will probably have people tend to gravitate toward him who want to use him," she said.

Friends and competitors in the close-knit circles of D.C. real estate welcomed the news that Jemal was cleared of the bribery charges.

"I'm happy for him," said Jim Abdo, a major housing developer. "I think what was driving him crazy was that anybody in the development business doesn't like uncertainty. He had this cloud of uncertainty over him. To have that removed is going to give him a significant peace of mind."

Ernie Jarvis, a managing director in the D.C. office of CB Richard Ellis, said: "I am relieved that Douglas was cleared, and I'm hopeful that he will continue to be a presence in our city as well as the local real estate market."

Jemal will be sentenced April 16 and Esherick on March 15.

During his trial, Jemal went into his office on H Street NW at 8 a.m. and worked for two hours before court. He returned to the office in the evenings, returning phone calls and e-mails to brokers, partners and potential buyers and sellers. A longtime supporter of Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), Jemal is a builder and a manager of 10 million square feet of office, retail, commercial and residential properties in 185 buildings in the region.

"I'm very ecstatic to be judged by a jury of my peers, and I'm happy with the outcome. . . . In the end, I don't even know what it was about," Jemal said.

Before leaving the courthouse grounds, Jemal told jurors that he was glad they got his case, then got big laughs and slaps on the back with his parting joke:

"Let's get together every year around this time."

Intelligence Chairman Urges Leak Inquiry (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has proposed a sweeping inquiry into the possible leak of a classified National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq by a staff member, including an audit of staff telephone records and e-mail to identify unauthorized contacts with news media or messages related to the leaked document.

Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), in a paper outlining procedures for the inquiry, said a committee counsel could pursue "any additional information beyond that involving the NIE if it related to improper conduct with regard to classified information by any member of the committee staff."

At issue is the leak of selected contents, harmful to the Bush administration, of a classified National Intelligence Estimate from April titled "Trends of Global Terrorism." The New York Times first published a story about the NIE, with the headline "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat," on Sept. 23 on its Web site and again in its Sept. 24 print edition.

The intelligence committee did not receive a copy of the NIE until Sept. 21, a day after Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), a member of the panel, called the Democratic staff about it. A staff member, Larry Hanauer, arranged for the document's author -- the Office of the Director of National Intelligence -- to deliver a copy to Tierney after it was posted on the panel's classified site.

A Republican member of the intelligence committee, Rep. Ray LaHood (Ill.), wrote Hoekstra to demand an investigation because the story was published two days after a Democratic staff member obtained the NIE.

Hanauer, who has been suspended from the committee by the chairman, signed an sworn affidavit this week saying he had nothing to do with the disclosure.

Murder Trial Juror Booted For Invoking Numerology (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The jury was trying to decide a high-profile murder case when the trouble began. One of the jurors brought numerology into the debate -- a mystical system said to divine truths from a person's birth date and from the sum of the letters in a person's name.

But numerology is nowhere in the jury instructions at D.C. Superior Court. And yesterday, after hearing from the woman's frustrated fellow jurors, Judge Wendell P. Gardner Jr. kicked her off the panel.

An alternate juror was summoned back to the courthouse and is expected to join the jury to begin deliberations anew today in the trial of two men accused of killing 14-year-old Jahkema "Princess" Hansen.

It was the strangest twist yet in a trial that has had more than its share since it began almost a month ago -- almost three years after Hansen was fatally shot in the Sursum Corda housing complex, allegedly because she was a witness to a killing. In addition to talking about numbers, the juror had declared that she was the savior, there to force a mistrial.

From a prosecution witness's apparently testifying while high on marijuana to a juror finding herself followed home by a key figure in the case, the trial has not lacked the unexpected.

DOJ_NMG_0087185

Leaving the courtroom after she was dismissed, the juror said she could not say anything because of "the judge's order."

Judges rarely take such steps but can do so when jurors refuse to deliberate or, as in this case, insist on introducing information that wasn't part of the evidence.

A couple of years ago, the judge in a drug-gang murder case in U.S. District Court ousted a juror who refused to deliberate.

But what happened in the trial of Franklin Thompson and Marquette Ward was more bizarre.

From the outset, it appeared that the jury's discussions took an acrimonious turn. "How do you have a juror changed," the foreman said in a note to the judge on Monday, a couple of hours into the deliberations.

And then late Wednesday, after the jury had twice reported that it could not reach an agreement, the judge got a note explaining the reason: "One of the jurors refuses to comply with your instructions. Being insulting and argumentative. Will not base statement on fact pertaining to evidence. Making statements of their hidden agenda."

The note led to yesterday's unusual inquiry.

Interviewed by the judge one by one in open court, the jurors said the woman spoke of the significance of everything from dates of birth to the pronunciation of names and the color of people's clothing.

"She was always straying from whatever we were talking about," one juror told the judge.

"It was all made up. It was all a fabrication," another juror said.

When the judge called the juror in question, identified only as Juror No. 15, she spoke so softly that the court stenographer a few feet away had trouble hearing her.

She was not asked what she had said, and she did not volunteer having said much of anything. Asked whether numerology had come up, she said some jurors had been reading the horoscopes that morning. And asked whether birthdates had been discussed, she suggested that they were part of a bona fide discussion of the evidence, contradicting the accounts of almost all of the other jurors.

After questioning the jurors, Gardner scoffed at the woman's statements. "I don't believe one whit of what she's telling me," he said.

With that juror gone, the jury is supposed to start deliberations from scratch, looking anew at the testimony and other evidence laid out over three weeks by the prosecutors, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Deborah Sines and Michelle Jackson.

Hansen was killed after seeing Ward kill a drug dealer, prosecutors alleged. Ward feared that Hansen -- his sometime sex interest -- would tell police what she had seen, so he hired his friend Thompson to kill Hansen for $8,000, prosecutors said.

Just after 11 p.m. on Jan. 23, 2004, Thompson allegedly burst into a rowhouse in the 1100 block of First Terrace NW and shot Hansen in the back of head.

Ward's and Thompson's were familiar faces in the insular environs of Sursum Corda, where Ward was known as Corleone and Thompson was known as Frank Nitti, after the feared accomplice to Al Capone.

Prosecutors played up the nicknames to the jury, while Ward's attorney, Steven D. Kupferberg, and Thompson's attorney, Rudolph Acree, dismissed the labels as hype.

What was undisputed was that a 14-year-old, living a very adult life, died in harrowing fashion that night.

Malvo Talks With Tucson Detectives (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning

The Washington Times, October 27, 2006

Lee Boyd Malvo met yesterday with police from Tucson, Ariz., who are investigating whether Malvo and fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad were responsible for a golf course shooting there in March 2002, Malvo's attorney said.

Malvo spent about two hours speaking with Tucson detectives at the Montgomery County Correctional Facility in Boyds, attorney William Brennan said. Malvo, already serving a life term in Virginia for one of the October 2002 sniper shootings, is in Maryland awaiting sentencing for six sniper killings in Montgomery County.

Mr. Brennan would not discuss the substance of the meeting.

Tucson police have long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, killing of Jerry Taylor, 60, who died from a single shot fired from long range as he practiced on the Fred Enke Golf Course. The case has never been conclusively tied to Muhammad or Malvo.

Capt. Bill Richards, commander of the violent crimes division with Tucson police, declined to comment yesterday, except to say that "we do feel that in the very near future, we'll be able to discuss things ... in a broader sense."

After his arrest Oct. 24, 2002, at a Frederick County, Md., highway rest stop, Malvo told authorities that he had shot a senator on a golf course in Arizona. Mr. Taylor was not a senator. Muhammad and Malvo were visiting Muhammad's older sister at the time, but police didn't have enough evidence to prove they were responsible for Mr. Taylor's death.

DOJ_NMG_0087186

In addition to the 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington area, the two men are suspects in earlier shootings that year in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and Washington state and are reportedly linked to shootings in Florida, Texas and California.

Both were convicted of separate Virginia killings in 2003. Muhammad was sentenced to death while Malvo was given a life prison term.

They were sent to Montgomery County last year to stand trial in six killings. Muhammad was convicted in May, a case that included testimony against him by Malvo. Earlier this month, Malvo formally pleaded guilty and is scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 9.

Mr. Brennan said he planned to contact authorities in other jurisdictions where Muhammad and Malvo are accused of sniper shootings to discuss a larger plea deal that would allow Malvo to serve his life sentence in federal prison.

Virginia prosecutors, however, oppose such a deal.

A County Of Bad Ol' Boys (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

HOW bad is Cocke County's lawless reputation?

So bad that its tourism and economic development chief, Donald Hurst, likes to kick off out-of-town business meetings with a self-deprecating joke. All of the visiting Cocke County officials, he tells his audience, are right here in the building — so "rest assured, your home is safe."

To many Tennesseans, Cocke County is the place their parents warned them about, the butt of hillbilly jokes, the last redoubt of an old, untamed Appalachia. For decades this poor and dramatically beautiful area, north of Great Smoky Mountains National Park, was a haven for moonshiners and bootleggers who evaded federal tax agents by hiding in its rugged hills and hollows.

It was also known for its brothels and chop shops, its illegal bars and gambling, its shakedowns and drugs and stadium-sized cockfight pits — and its rampant public corruption. There was a time when people called it "Little Chicago."

And though other mountain communities have seen their wild days lapse into the innocuous category of "colorful past," Cocke County seems doomed to repeat the sins that have long defined it.

In recent months, a state and federal corruption probe has been making familiar headlines here, flushing out the latest round of dirty cops, brothel owners and incorrigible outlaws whom locals call "tush hogs" — a name they also use for wild boar.

County Mayor Iliff McMahan Jr., first elected in 2002 on a promise to attract tourists and new business, hopes this investigation is the final chapter of a long, troubled history.

After all, the Little Chicago nickname has long faded, and moonshining, a victim of increasingly lax Southern liquor laws, has been reduced to the status of a hobby.

And yet the trouble continues, competing with the good news McMahan and Hurst are spreading about their inexpensive, underdeveloped and untrammeled county — the place their tourism campaign extols as the "real" Smoky Mountains.

"People think we're all barefooted and have three teeth and are playing banjo music," McMahan said. "We do have a tarnished reputation when it comes to public service …

[but] there are a lot of good, Christian people who live here. We are a law-abiding, God-

fearing community."

Jeramy Hux, the owner of a local mountaineering shop, said he hoped the probe would finally break what he called the "good-old-boy web" that had given the county such a bad name.

"It's about time," he said.

But there is also a notable lack of enthusiasm for the investigation, even among some law-abiding residents. Once again, they say, it seems like the federal government is picking on little Cocke County.

Robert Dameron, 64, a retired truck driver, said the FBI should find better things to do. "I don't think [the corruption] is as bad as they think," he said. "They've got that everywhere."

The mayor — who counts a few illicit whiskey makers among his forebears — said a wariness of federal power was deeply ingrained here. In the old days, McMahan said, moonshiners were rarely considered criminals — just people trying to feed their families. When they were busted by federal "revenuers," those families often went hungry.

In the 1920s and '30s, state bureaucrats assembling land for the national park created more bad blood when they pressured hundreds of families to leave their mountain homes. During World War II, the Tennessee Valley Authority moved others off some of the county's best farmland to create Douglas Lake, part of the authority's vast hydropower system.

"We here in Cocke County have always felt the federal government has taken every effort to kick our butt that they possibly could," McMahan said.

ON a pretty day, the Cocke County countryside feels more like heaven than a notorious den of iniquity. Mountains roll to the horizon, clad in green swaths of hemlock and pine. Three rivers — the Pigeon, the French Broad and the Nolichucky — rush through lush, oak-strewn bottomlands. Small farmers grow tomatoes, grass for hay, and a little tobacco.

According to the 2000 census, 22.5% of Cocke County's 34,000 residents live in poverty. The county seat, Newport, is home to 7,000, with a quaint if dowdy downtown and a few suburban amenities: a Ruby Tuesday restaurant, a Lowe's home improvement store.

This is, supporters say, a typical rural county, no better or worse than any other. To some extent, statistics bear them out: In 2005, Cocke County logged about 77 crimes per 1,000 residents. The rate was higher than those reported by nearby Jefferson and Grainger counties, but lower than that of adjacent Sevier County, where tourists flock to miniature golf courses in Gatlinburg, and Dolly Parton's Dollywood theme park in Pigeon Forge.

The federal government launched its investigation in 2001, naming it Operation Rose Thorn. Since then, seven officers from the Newport police and county sheriff's departments have been convicted of crimes that include conspiracy to distribute cocaine, attempted money laundering, perjury, witness tampering, and stealing money from illegal immigrants.

At least 10 other Cocke County residents have been prosecuted on charges including cocaine sales and interstate theft. Brothels and suspected chop shops have been raided without much input from local authorities — presumably because state and federal agencies didn't trust them.

Former Chief Sheriff's Deputy Patrick Taylor, second-in-command at the department, pleaded guilty to conspiring to traffic in stolen goods. He bought what he thought was $9,000 in stolen NASCAR-themed tank tops, hats and other clothing from undercover agents, and planned to sell the merchandise at country fairs out of a deep-fried-onion stand, according to federal prosecutors. He is expected to be sentenced in November.

In court documents, prosecutors accused Taylor of other crimes for which he was not charged. They said he had extorted money from bars, coercing them to buy liquor from the package store he ran with his wife. And they said he had protected a business that supplied bar owners with illegal video poker machines.

Sheriff D.C. Ramsey — Taylor's uncle — resigned in January after 2005 court filings showed he was under investigation on suspicion of receiving payoffs from gambling interests. He has not been charged.

Then there was the Del Rio Cockfight Pit, with enough bleachers to accommodate 500 fans.

Cockfighting had been a felony in Tennessee until 1990, when it was downgraded to a misdemeanor by Cocke County's state representative at the time, Ronnie Davis. (Davis was imprisoned for taking part in a fake-passport scheme in 2004.)

Around the same time, Dist. Atty. Gen. Al Schmutzer raided the pit, but it soon resumed business. Last year, Schmutzer returned with a contingent of heavily armed state and federal agents and issued citations to more than 140 spectators and participants.

Witnesses cooperating with the FBI said as much as $30,000 in wagers would change hands over a single fight — and pits like the Del Rio held dozens of fights in one day. Breeders and fans came from surrounding states and filled up hotels and restaurants, generating thousands of dollars for a historically depressed economy.

They were also upholding what many here see as a proud symbol of their Appalachian heritage. But Schmutzer said the raid was about more than stamping out an old country pastime. "You can't have something going on that's illegal and notorious in your community and expect people to respect the law," he said.

After the raid, Schmutzer was surprised when some locals complained that the young people wouldn't have much to do now.

"You'd a thought we'd raided the Boys & Girls Club," he said.

HURST, the head of an economic development group called the Cocke County Partnership, smiled wearily when discussing the investigation. At one point, he compared the county's recurring issues to the movie "Groundhog Day."

Jimmie Frank Hill, 76, a regular at Newport's downtown barbershop, remembers the 1930s: riding as a child in a van, sitting on a blanket covering his father's cases of illegal whiskey. He talks about the brothel his father built and ran, and the gangsters from Chicago and Detroit who would sometimes hide out there.

In the mountain community of Del Rio, a man who asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation recalled his experiences in the 1960s, when truckers passing through town were considered easy bait. While the truckers were occupied at the brothels, a few men would offer boys $5 to puncture their tires — a boon for the tire distributor.

Schmutzer, who recently retired, said that when he was first elected in 1974, "Cocke County was pretty well wide-open."

It was easy to find a drink of hard liquor in bars despite the fact that it was banned. Prostitution was out of control. Back then, the women were supplied by an organized crime gang from St. Louis. Many of the brothels billed themselves as truck stops, and the prostitutes cooed over CB radios in code, enticing men with $50 "cups of coffee." A few of the places did not bother to install diesel pumps.

Schmutzer eventually drummed the more organized criminal elements out of Cocke County's prostitution business. The brothels crept back into service, although some of them have been shuttered again in the recent probe.

The most extensive chronicle of the county's troubles, focusing largely on the last four decades, was compiled last year by J.J. Stambaugh, a reporter at the Knoxville News Sentinel. Titled Cocke County Confidential, published online at http://www.knoxnews.comunder the header news, it runs to more than 50 pages when printed out.

Stambaugh offers a few plausible explanations for Cocke County's troubles. First came Prohibition, which showed moonshiners there was serious money to be made outside the law. Later, World War II brought an influx of GIs to east Tennessee — and entrepreneurs willing to slake their thirst for booze and sex.

The timeline shows that two Cocke County sheriffs have faced felony indictments since 1970. It describes dumped bodies, moonshiners-turned-pot growers, and mysterious and questionable shootings involving police. And it limns a tangled, multi-generational web of local characters — some of whom are the focus of the current probe.

MAYOR McMahan may understand why some residents are annoyed by the federal investigation. But he doesn't agree with them. Public corruption, he said, is a very real problem in Cocke County.

"It's a culture," he said. "And how do you change it? It's like eating an elephant. You do it one bite at a time."

McMahan, 55, was born in Cocke County — a place, he will remind you, that was named after an Independence-era politician, not a fighting rooster. But he spent much of his life in Washington, D.C., where he worked as a professional stage actor and business executive. He returned home to care for his ailing father in 1995, his accent half-citified, his Cocke County alliances few.

During his first bid for election, McMahan said, he received death threats. These days, he keeps a pistol strapped to his ankle — "because you never know," he said.

After taking office, McMahan saw controversy visit even the most ordinary totems of small-town life. In 2004, the local United Way was kicked out of the national organization, the United Way of America, over questionable bookkeeping. Last year, the county's Fraternal Order of Eagles chapter was decertified by its international parent organization because it had never given any money to charity. Its membership list included many of the targets of Rose Thorn.

Yet in his successful reelection campaign this year, McMahan did not make corruption an issue. Realistically, he said, there was little he could do about it, because the sheriff is an independently elected office.

It also seemed like bad politics: Too many voters, he figured, were kin to someone caught up in it all.

James R. "Russ" Dedrick, the U.S. attorney for Tennessee's Eastern District, declined to speak at length about Operation Rose Thorn. He said he would be more forthcoming when the case wrapped up, in about a month.

He did say, however, that new leadership — including a newly elected sheriff — seemed intent on putting the old ways behind them.

Sgt. Jonathan Morgan said the culture of his department was changing under Sheriff Claude Strange, a former state trooper.

In the last few years, Morgan, 29, has given the FBI evidence about three of the deputies prosecuted in Rose Thorn. His reward under then-Sheriff Ramsey was a transfer from drug investigations to night patrol — in effect, a trip to the doghouse.

Morgan never heard anyone in the department call it retaliation. And he can't say that he blames the ex-sheriff for all of the trouble.

"I don't know if 'blame' is the word," Morgan said. "It's just tradition."

Woman Says She Didn't Kill Social Worker (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, October 27, 2006, 6:04 Am Edt

Long Island Newsday, October 27, 2006

In a jailhouse news conference that she had requested, Renee Terrell said Christopher Luttrell alone was responsible for the death of Boni Frederick, 67, of Morganfield.

"I didn't do anything to her, and I am sorry for her," Terrell, 33, told the Henderson Gleaner. "I guess I hang out with the wrong people.

"I didn't want her hurt. I even said I didn't want her hurt. It wasn't my intention for anybody to get hurt."

Luttrell, 23, told reporters gathered at the Henderson police station on Wednesday that he killed Frederick. An autopsy revealed she died of blunt and sharp force trauma.

DOJ_NMG_0087189

Terrell said she was in the house when Frederick was killed but that she didn't see or hear the attack. The couple is accused of taking Terrell's 10-month-old son, Saige, after Frederick had brought the infant for a visit with the mother.

The baby is now in custody of foster parents.

Terrell has four children, and none are in her custody, according to a court document. The other children are ages 14, 9 and 7.

The couple face felony murder, kidnapping, robbery and theft charges.

Terrell said she and Luttrell had developed a plan to take her son, but that the plan didn't include hurting anyone.

"It wasn't until my son got there that I chickened out," she said. "I started thinking better of it and didn't want to do anything to get in trouble with my son," she said.

But a criminal complaint filed with Henderson court officials says that on the night Terrell was arrested, she told police that she had "hit Boni three or four times with the frying pan."

Luttrell has also claimed in statements to detectives that the woman participated in the killing. He told police that on the day of the killing, he hid in a bedroom closet but kept the door cracked, the court documents said.

Luttrell told police that he, too, used the iron frying pan to beat Frederick and that both he and Terrell hit her with their fists, the court documents said.

FBI agents arrested Terrell and Luttrell on Oct. 19 in a trailer where they sought shelter near Godfrey, Ill., about 30 miles north of St. Louis.

The baby had been removed from Terrell's custody when he was 13 days old because of neglect, police said. Police also said the courts were in the process of permanently removing Terrell's parental rights before Frederick was slain on Oct. 16.

Legal Eagles On Lookout For Fraudulent Contractors (KATC)

KATC-TV, October 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Fraudulent contractors, unlicensed contractors and the bilking of homeowners are reaching epidemic proportions, prompting federal and state agencies to beef up regulatory and criminal enforcement against unscrupulous businesses.

The problems may have not hit their peak, with Road Home money still to be handed out, state and federal agencies said.

The law and license enforcement agencies are coordinating efforts to fine or jail bad contractors.

"The FBI and the U.S. attorney are fundamentally committed to ensure (the use of) recovery (money) is free of fraud, and we are cooperating to include contractors who engage in fraudulent activity," said James Bernazzani, FBI special agent in charge of Louisiana.

Bernazzani said that the disbursement of Road Home loans _ federal money _ gives the FBI jurisdiction, and any contractor stealing or fraudulently taking the money will be high on the FBI's radar.

"If you are a contractor fraudulently (taking) recovery money from homeowners, the FBI will take a very, very hard look at it," he said.

As Road Home money through the Louisiana Recovery Authority begins to be disbursed, the FBI and the Louisiana attorney general's office doubt complaints against contractors have approached the peak.

"I think eventually our active complaints will exceed 1,000 any given month," said Charles Marceaux, executive director of the Louisiana State Licensing Board for Contractors.

Marceaux said he expects that by the end of the year, his board will have held more than 800 administrative hearings since hurricanes Katrina and Rita. In past years, citation hearings have been about 300 to 400 a year, he added.

The citations are for being unlicensed, failing to perform as contracted or performing shoddy work. If egregious enough, the contractor's actions are forwarded to the attorney general's enforcement division, which will decided whether criminal action should be taken.

Isabel Wingerter, director of the general consumer protection section for the attorney general, said she would have expected a handful of consumer complaints in years past.

"We've never seen anything like this," Wingerter said.

Most of the criminal cases involve misappropriations of funds and theft by fraud, she said.

As of Oct. 16, 194 cases had been referred to the attorney general's criminal division for investigation, 65 arrest warrants for theft or fraud had been issued and there were 140 ongoing criminal investigations against contractors. Additionally, 10 civil unfair trade practice investigations involving 140 contractors were pending, Jennifer Cluck, a spokeswoman for the attorney general, said.

Between contractors seeking licenses and consumers making complaints or seeking information, the contractor's board is fielding 80,000 calls a month.

Before Katrina, there had been about 15,000 licensed residential or commercial contractors or registered home-improvement contractors. Now, there are more than 20,000. Marceaux said that since Katrina, 5,397 new applications have been received.

Commercial licenses are the largest category at 2,648. Before last year's storms, there were 47 licensed mold remediating contractors. There have been 256 applications and licenses issued for mold contracts since the storms.

Marceaux said he's seeking support for legislation to stiffen the fines the board can levy and make it more difficult for a contractor to abandon a project.

Cluck urged consumers to use the attorney general's hotline, 1-800-351-4889, to make complaints. The phone bank is staffed from Monday through Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., but messages can be left anytime for a staffer to return a consumers call.

The FBI's top agent said reports of potential criminal activity can also be reported by calling 1-800-CALLFBI. He was adamant, however, that the hotline is not for generic consumer complaints.

"Please don't call because you're peeved at your contractor," he said, but rather when there is obvious criminal activity. Marceaux asked that consumers file complaints through the licensing board's Web site.

New Orleans May Hire A Public Watchdog (NSDY/AP)

By Becky Bohrer, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 27, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- City leaders are pressing for the hiring of a corruption watchdog to send a message that New Orleans -- with its long and colorful reputation for graft and thievery -- can be trusted with the billions of dollars in federal aid pouring in to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

"We have a moral obligation to lead with integrity," said City Councilwoman Shelley Midura, who is among those pushing for the creation of the office of inspector general. "This is something the people are crying for."

At least five of the council's seven members have signed on to the idea, set for a vote Nov. 2.

Some have argued that under the current plan, the inspector general would be too weak, because the watchdog would have no subpoena power. Others are debating whether the inspector general should be a New Orleans insider or an outsider.

Also, Mayor Ray Nagin has come out against a proposal to make city contractors help pay for the office. And decision makers in this cash-strapped city have not yet settled on a budget for the inspector general.

Councilman Arnie Fielkow argued that money shouldn't matter: "I don't think the community can afford NOT to do this right now."

New Orleans has been dogged for years by cronyism, self-dealing, one-hand-washes-the-other politics and wink-and-a-grin thievery. At least two people have pleaded guilty as part of a federal investigation of corruption at the city transit authority under Nagin's predecessor, Mayor Marc Morial, and three Morial associates are awaiting trial on charges they orchestrated a plan to rake money from a lucrative contract. Morial has not been accused of wrongdoing.

Nagin's administration has been largely scandal-free. But stories of wasteful spending, plodding bureaucracy and fraud have dogged the recovery at all levels: Federal officials have been criticized for awarding no-bid contracts and paying more than $1 billion in aid to the undeserving; a state legislator has been under scrutiny because his relatives got a lucrative deal to sell trailers to FEMA; and a parish councilman in a New Orleans suburb resigned in October under indictment on charges he extorted money from the owners of a hurricane debris disposal site.

New Orleans pollster Silas Lee said he believes the Big Easy's reputation as politically corrupt is overblown, suggesting other major cities such as Chicago and New York are just as bad or worse. Still, he said an inspector general is not a bad idea, if the appointee is given the authority and the resources to do the job.

Since 1998, the inspector general's office for Miami-Dade County has led inquiries resulting in over 160 arrests and uncovered more than $50 million in questionable spending, Inspector General Chris Mazzella said.

In Baltimore, Andrew Clemmons' office received 73 complaints in his first year as inspector general, a figure he expects to at least triple this year.

"If you get the right person, they're going to be active," said Roland Malan, executive director of the Association of Inspectors General. "And there will be times the city is embarrassed and times the city is really glad that person is there."

In New Orleans, the idea is to have a politically independent office. Anyone employed by the city within the past five years would be excluded from consideration.

That is a sore point with the leader of the local chapter of the NAACP, Danatus King, who warned that that would disqualify people with knowledge of the city's inner workings.

But Malan said hiring an outsider would remove any suspicion that the watchdog is beholden politically to someone.

DOJ_NMG_0087191

"You need someone who's on a white horse with an impeccable reputation and who's willing to stand up to anybody when it comes to the organization," he said.

Reprimand For A Justice Who Met With Inmates (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

A special panel of the Washington Supreme Court made up of nine substitute judges reprimanded one of the court's justices yesterday for visiting a facility that holds sexually violent predators.

The panel ruled that the justice, Richard B. Sanders, had "created an appearance of partiality" by questioning inmates and accepting documents from them at the McNeil Island Special Commitment Center on a visit there in January 2003. The center holds sex offenders who have completed their criminal sentences but who the courts have found are likely to engage in predatory acts of sexual violence.

A case concerning the constitutionality of the state law under which the inmates were committed was before the court at the time.

In an interview, Justice Sanders said his visit had been useful and appropriate. Judges in Washington are encouraged to visit prisons and similar facilities, he said, and he received continuing judicial education credit for his 2003 visit.

"The whole objective of this facility is supposed to be to treat the prisoners," he said, "and I thought it was a valuable opportunity to ask the prisoners how they were doing. I thought I gained from the experience, and now I'm being punished for it."

The sanction was admonishment, the mildest available punishment.

Justice Sanders, who ultimately disqualified himself from the pending case, said nothing he had learned could have affected the decision.

He added that the prosecutors who complained about his visit had been eager to have him off the case. "They probably think I am too inclined to uphold the rights of the accused," Justice Sanders said.

Washington law requires lower-court judges to sit in when complaints concerning Supreme Court justices reach that high court. In other states and in the federal system, judges sometimes hear disciplinary cases concerning colleagues on their own courts.

Neither choice is appealing, said Stephen M. Gillers, an expert in legal ethics at New York University's law school. Lower-court judges substituting on the state's highest court may fear retaliation from high court judges, Professor Gillers said, and other justices may be disinclined to offend a colleague.

Justice Sanders's visit was prompted by an invitation from several inmates. Other justices considered attending but decided against it. One of them, Justice Faith Ireland, later testified before the state's Commission on Judicial Conduct that she had warned Justice Sanders not to go. "I said, 'Richard, don't do this,' " Justice Ireland testified.

During the visit, Justice Sanders spoke with some 20 inmates, one of them involved in the pending case.

Last year, the commission ruled against Justice Sanders, saying he had failed to promote public confidence in the judiciary.

"The commission strongly encourages judges to visit correctional institutions," the ruling said. But "if a tour is sponsored or originated by prisoners, prison rights advocates or other nonjudicial groups," it continued, judges need to be alert to possible conflicts of interest.

The special panel unanimously affirmed the commission's ruling.

"It was clear," Judge C. Kenneth Grosse of the Washington State Court of Appeals wrote for the panel, "that there was a substantial basis and expectation that Justice Sanders would be in contact with possible litigants who had pending litigation before the court and that this contact would be viewed as improper."

Professor Gillers said the court had ruled correctly.

"What Justice Sanders is charged with doing is not even debatably acceptable," he said. "Talking to a litigant about a matter within the scope of litigation is wholly out of bounds, and it's the job of the judge to police that."

A lawyer for Justice Sanders, Kurt M. Bulmer, said the ruling left judges with no clear guidance and would discourage them from worthwhile visits.

"You make them afraid to become involved in the process," Mr. Bulmer said. "In these sorts of visits, it's commonplace for judges at all levels to talk to the residents or prisoners. Otherwise, all you get is a walk-through."

Getty Tightens Acquisitions Policy (LAT)

By Christopher Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, October 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087192

Under growing international global pressure after decades of buying artifacts that might have been looted, the Getty Museum dramatically has tightened its acquisition standards.

The move is not retroactive -- if it were, the museum would have to relinquish scores of treasured ancient items from its galleries and storerooms -- but some authorities say it's a turning point in a global confrontation between curators and archeologists over the way museums do business.

With this move, two experts said, the Getty is essentially taking responsibility for making sure an item's recent history is clean, instead of challenging critics to prove it's dirty.

"It's a rethinking of the whole issue of the burden of proof," said Malcolm Bell, a University of Virginia archeology professor and co-director of U.S. excavations at Morgantina, Italy.

The Getty chose 1970 as its threshold date because that's when the United Nations gave its blessing to a convention aimed at preventing illicit movement of cultural property. Although the measure had little immediate effect on the habits of major American museums, several major institutions in Britain adopted standards along the same lines in the past decade. The University of Pennsylvania's art museum has won plaudits from archeologists for taking a similarly conservative stance, but until now none of this nation's foremost museums had signed on.

"We're trying to do what we believe is right," said Getty Museum Director Michael Brand, who added that the move had no direct connection with the ongoing trial of former Getty curator Marion True -- whom Italian prosecutors accuse of knowingly receiving looted items -- or Italian cultural officials' pending demand for the return of 52 items in the Getty collection.

"I suspect that they'll be happy to hear about this, but it's not something we've discussed with them at all," Brand said.

The Getty's trustees, who approved the policy change Monday, "are really taking a very principled stand," said Patty Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePauw University and president of the Lawyers Committee for Cultural Heritage Preservation, based in Washington, D.C.

She predicted that the move would set an example for other institutions. Although New York's influential Metropolitan Museum of Art made headlines worldwide in February when it agreed to return 21 items demanded by Italy, including a prized vase known as the Euphronios Krater, the museum has resisted calls to change its acquisition standards, which match those of the Association of Art Museum Directors.

Both endorse antiquities acquisitions so long as there's no proof of impropriety and the works have been documented for at least 10 years.

Gerstenblith dismissed the 10-year standard as "inadequate," and Bell put it this way: "The reformers are at the gates, and the Met is pouring boiling oil on them. . . . The Getty is recognizing the moral problem, and the Met will have to come to that too."

Met spokesman Harold Holzer sees the issue differently.

"We're not contemplating any change in our policy," he said Thursday. "If you choose one date as your watershed date, it doesn't mean you're any more vigilant than you were before, and the Met considers itself extremely diligent."

Furthermore, Holzer said, the Getty's move "doesn't address the idea of what you do in the case of a fugitive masterpiece that's separated from its original site and may not be traceable back . . . . Does that mean you relegate it to oblivion forever?"

Throughout the 20th century and into the 21st, as major museums scrambled to build collections from the ancient world, curators and directors argued that an antiquity was fair game so long as nobody could prove it had been looted.

Since such evidence is extremely rare, this left museums to enjoy the benefit of the doubt. In the 1980s and '90s, the Getty spent tens of millions of dollars to build an antiquities collection of more than 44,000 items. Although the Getty tightened its standards in 1995 to bar acquisitions that were undocumented before that year, many critics continued to count it among the Met, Boston's Museum of Fine Arts and other institutions with long histories of buying antiquities with misty histories from shadowy dealers.

Under the new policy, the Getty will require at least one of these three conditions:

-- "Documentation or substantial evidence" that the piece entered the U.S. by Nov. 17, 1970, and "that there is no reason to suspect it was illegally exported from its country of origin."

-- Documentation or substantial evidence that the item was out of its original country by 1970 and that it has been or will be legally imported to the U.S.

InterMune Will Pay $37 Million To Resolve U.S. Probe (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Margaret Cronin Fisk

Bloomberg, October 27, 2006

Oct. 26 (Bloomberg) -- InterMune Inc., maker of a treatment for rare bone and immune system disorders, will pay $36.9 million to settle U.S. claims it illegally marketed the drug for unapproved uses and caused false claims for reimbursement from government health programs.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's office said InterMune sold the drug, called Actimmune, mostly for prescriptions to treat pulmonary fibrosis, a fatal lung disorder with no cure that affects 83,000 Americans. InterMune distributed misleading information to doctors and patients claiming the drug could prolong survival knowing the company's studies failed to show significant benefits, prosecutors said in a statement.

``This settlement sends a clear message to the pharmaceutical industry that the Justice Department will not tolerate these deceptive and illegal marketing practices," said Assistant U.S. Attorney General Peter Keisler in a statement.

While doctors are free to prescribe any drug to treat illnesses regardless of FDA approvals, drugmakers are prohibited from promoting medicines for unapproved uses. In the past few years, prosecutors have been cracking down on the practice. Pfizer Inc. agreed to pay more than $430 million in 2004 to settle charges that a Warner-Lambert unit promoted the epilepsy drug Neurontin for other uses.

False Claims Act

InterMune will pay $30.2 million to resolve charges it violated the False Claims Act by causing fraudulent claims to be filed to federal health insurance programs for Actimmune. The claims weren't eligible for reimbursement because the drug was used for purposes not approved by the U.S. Food & Drug Administration. InterMune will pay an additional $6.7 million to state health insurance programs.

InterMune Chief Executive Officer Dan Welch said during a conference call today that the improper marketing practices were actions of former employees.

``We are very happy to put this matter behind us," he said.

The Brisbane, California-based company recorded a $6.9 million charge in addition to the $30 million charge it announced in July in connection with the settlement, he said.

InterMune will pay the $36.9 million plus five percent interest over five years, with the first annual installment of $5 million to be paid this year, Welch said.

Two Years

The U.S. agreed to defer for two years criminal prosecution against InterMune for one count of violating the Food, Drug and Cosmetics Act. The deferment is contingent upon InterMune strengthening compliance policies and cooperating with investigators, the government statement said.

Actimmune is approved for infections associated with an immune disorder called chronic granulomatous disease, an inherited childhood affliction, and for treating severe osteopetrosis, a rare congenital childhood disorder in which the bones become overly dense.

Allegations of improper marketing of drugs for unapproved uses have sparked civil product liability and racketeering suits against some drug companies.

``These companies pay doctors $100,000 a year to go around and tell other doctors how great this drug is to prescribe for people it hasn't been approved," said Patrick Burns, of Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington group that tracks fraud lawsuits.

In December, Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to pay $36 million to settle an off-label marketing case involving its osteoporosis drug Evista. The government said Eli Lilly was promoting the drug for breast cancer prevention and reduction in cardiovascular risks.

Philadelphia Inquiry

The Indianapolis-based company has said the U.S. Attorney in Philadelphia is investigating marketing and promotion of its antipsychotic medication Zyprexa. Johnson & Johnson announced in March that the same prosecutor was investigating its marketing practices involving a similar drug called Risperdal.

Eli Lilly and New Brunswick, New Jersey-based Johnson & Johnson have denied allegations of improper marketing.

InterMune shares fell 3 cents to $22.93 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading

The case is U.S. v InterMune Inc., 06-00707, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Biotech Company Settles Off-label Marketing Claim (MERCN)

By Steve Johnson

The San Jose Mercury News, October 27, 2006

A Bay Area biotech company, InterMune, agreed Thursday to pay $36.9 million to settle a federal investigation into claims it promoted one of its drugs for an unapproved purpose despite evidence the drug was ineffective for that use.

Under the settlement announced by the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco., InterMune of Brisbane was charged with promoting its drug Actimmune ``with intent to defraud or mislead," a felony under the federal Food Drug and Cosmetic Act.

But the U.S. Attorney's office will dismiss the charge in two years if InterMune complies with laws against so-called off-label marketing, which means promoting drugs for uses beyond what was approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

``This settlement sends a clear message to the pharmaceutical industry that the Justice Department will not tolerate these deceptive and illegal marketing practices," according to statement issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In its settlement agreement, InterMune said it did not contest the claim that ``one or more former InterMune employees violated federal criminal law."

InterMune spokeswoman Pam Lord added that the allegations don't involve any current employees and that the company has been working to reform its drug-marketing practices.

As part of the settlement, InterMune will have five years to pay the money. The company in July announced it was creating a $30 million reserve to settle the case.

Actimmune has been approved by the FDA for treating a bone disorder and a condition that makes people prone to infections. But prosecutors accused InterMune of also promoting it in 2002 and early 2003 as useful for patients with idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis, or IPF, a potentially fatal lung disease for which there is no federally approved treatment.

Despite a study showing Actimmune failed to help keep IPF patients alive, prosecutors accused InterMune of putting out a news release in 2002 claiming the drug had improved the patients' chances of survival.

In addition, ``InterMune sales force personnel were encouraged to inform physicians that Actimmune demonstrated a survival benefit in mild to moderate IPF patient populations," according to the U.S. Attorney's statement.

Keystone Mercy Settles U.S. Lawsuit (PHI)

By Linda Loyd

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 27, 2006

Keystone Mercy Health Plan, the region's largest Medicaid managed-care insurer, has reached a settlement with the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia to pay $5 million to resolve a benefits-claims dispute.

The Justice Department alleged that Keystone Mercy in 1997 and 1998 failed to return to the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare overpayments for some Medicaid services. Keystone Mercy denied any wrongdoing.

In a statement, the Philadelphia insurer said the agreement ended a dispute "over interpretation of our contract with DPW almost 10 years ago." Keystone Mercy said it agreed to pay $5 million over the next six months to end the "inconvenience and expense of protracted litigation."

The allegations were brought in 2001 by a former Keystone Mercy claims-recovery examiner, who filed a "whistle-blower" complaint. Lorraine Pittelli, the claims examiner, will receive $780,000 from the proceeds of the settlement.

Keystone Mercy manages Medicaid services for more than 273,000 residents in Philadelphia and surrounding Pennsylvania counties.

Mobster Sues, Says He Was Framed (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 27, 2006

Three years ago, a federal judge apologized to Pasquale Barone Jr., saying that his 1993 trial on charges that he killed a man for the New England Mafia was ‘‘fraudulent’’ because prosecutors withheld evidence from the defense.

Now Barone, 45, who spent 15 years in prison before he was freed in 2003 amid allegations of government misconduct, is looking for more than an apology.

The North End man has filed a federal lawsuit accusing the government of negligence and alleging that a federal prosecutor, two retired FBI agents, and other unnamed officials plotted to deprive him of a fair trial and orchestrated a malicious prosecution.

The suit is seeking unspecified damages for Barone and his daughter, Consiglia, who was 4 years old when he was sent to prison and, according to the suit, suffered ‘‘severe shock, fear, horror, emotional distress’’ and the loss of his companionship.

Barone’s suit alleges that the prosecutor and agents conspired to ‘‘intentionally frame’’ him.

The suit names Assistant US Attorney Jeffrey Auerhahn and retired FBI agents Michael Buckley and Edward Quinn. The three men could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Three years ago, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said the Justice Department had launched an internal investigation into Auerhahn’s handling of the case. Thursday, Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for Sullivan, said Justice Department regulations prohibited the government from commenting on the outcome of the investigation or on whether any action had been taken against Auerhahn. She also declined to comment on Barone's lawsuit.

Barone was convicted in federal court in 1993 of murder in aid of racketeering in the 1985 death of his friend, Vincent "Jimmy" Limoli, allegedly at the behest of New England mob captain Vincent Ferrara. Barone, who was serving 10 years after pleading guilty to state manslaughter charges in Limoli's slaying, was sentenced to life in prison in the racketeering case.

However, three years ago, US District Judge Mark L. Wolf found that Auerhahn had failed to tell Barone's lawyers that a key witness had recanted before the federal trial and insisted Ferrara had not ordered the slaying.

At the time, Wolf said the evidence "had the potential to blow the government's case up completely."

Last year, Wolf also reduced Ferrara's sentence as a result of the government's conduct in the case, setting him free.

While Wolf was weighing a defense request to overturn Barone's conviction, Barone reached a plea agreement with the government. Barone pleaded guilty to racketeering and admitted that he shot Limoli on Oct. 28, 1985, in the North End after Limoli stole drugs from a mobster. Barone also admitted that he helped kill another man, Anthony "Dapper" Corlito, on July 21, 1979, and shot a guard in the neck during the robbery of a credit union on Nov. 5, 1982.

In exchange for Barone's plea, the government agreed he should be sentenced to the time he had served, and he was released.

$79.5M In Punitive Damages At Core Of Supreme Court Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Jesse Williams, a Portland, Ore., janitor who smoked three packs of Marlboros a day, died of lung cancer in 1997. His widow, Mayola, sued Philip Morris for fraud and negligence, alleging that any fears her husband had about becoming ill from smoking were eased by the cigarette-maker's publicity campaign that suggested it was safe.

Mayola Williams recalled in court filings that when her husband learned he had inoperable cancer, he said, "Those darn cigarette people finally did it. They were lying all the time."

The lawsuit that Mayola Williams filed was among many claims filed against tobacco companies in recent years, but one of the few to lead to a multimillion-dollar judgment. An Oregon jury awarded Williams $79.5 million in punitive damages. Such damages are intended to punish defendants beyond the actual damages they caused and deter future bad conduct.

Williams' award was 97 times greater than the actual — or compensatory — damages awarded by the jury, and according to court records it was based partly on the jury's consideration of Philip Morris' harm to other smokers in Oregon.

Now, Williams' case is before the U.S. Supreme Court and has become one of the most significant tests ever of how far a jury can go in punishing a civil defendant. The question in the Williams case is whether the punitive damages award is so disproportionate to the injury to Jesse Williams that it violates the 14th Amendment's guarantee of due process of law.

In its appeal, Philip Morris says the Oregon verdict violated due process because it was so much higher than the actual damages caused to Jesse Williams and because jurors were punishing the company for injuries to smokers who were not part of the Williams case.

Mayola Williams' attorney, Robert Peck, says in court papers that the cigarette-maker's efforts to hide the dangers of smoking were "monstrous" and says that if ever a big award were justified, this is the case.

The dispute, to be argued before the high court on Tuesday, is a new round in the court's struggle to draw the line between permissible and unconstitutional punitive damages awards.

Business groups, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, say juries improperly use punitive damage awards to "send a message" to corporate defendants. Consumer advocates and trial lawyers counter that punitive damages help bring accountability to businesses that have a history of abuse.

"The tobacco industry has evaded liability for decades … and the result has been a public health catastrophe," Trial Lawyers for Public Justice says in a court brief filed in the Williams case.

For decades, the Supreme Court considered such jury awards the domain of the states and gave wide latitude to state judges and juries. In recent years, however, the court has begun to rein in awards by setting criteria for punitive damages. The addition of two new justices last term — Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, who replaced the late William Rehnquist and the retired Sandra Day O'Connor — could add a wrinkle to the court's approach.

In the justices' most recent ruling on the issue, in 2003, the majority said any punitive damages that are more than 10 times the actual damages for the injury could be presumed to be excessive. Voting 6-3, the court invalidated a $145 million award levied by a jury that had found that the State Farm insurance company acted in bad faith by not settling claims against a policyholder who was involved in a fatal accident.

In the current case, a key question will be whether Philip Morris' conduct was bad enough to justify a punitive damages award beyond the 2003 guideline.

Rehnquist and O'Connor voted with the majority in the State Farm case. Washington lawyer Mark Levy, who follows decisions concerning punitive damages, says that suggests that their replacements, Roberts and Alito, could tip the court's vote either way in assessing whether the award in the Williams case was excessive.

"The court is on the knife edge," Levy says. If Roberts and Alito join the justices who dissented in the State Farm case and want to leave the matter to the states, Levy says, there would be "a sudden and radical change in this area of the law."

In her case, Mayola Williams claimed that Philip Morris mounted a fraudulent publicity campaign aimed at minimizing the dangers of smoking. After a month-long trial in 1999, the jury awarded $821,485 in compensatory damages and the $79.5 million in punitive damages.

The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the award. "There can be no dispute that Philip Morris's conduct was extraordinarily reprehensible. (It) knew that smoking caused serious and sometimes fatal disease, but it nevertheless spread false or misleading information to suggest … that doubts remained about that issue. … The scheme was damaging the health of a very large group of Oregonians — the smoking public — and was killing a number of that group."

In his appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, Philip Morris' lawyer, Andrew Frey tells the justices that the Oregon court misinterpreted recent decisions by the high court, particularly the 2003 ruling. He says the State Farm decision does not allow a company to be punished for harm to people who were not involved in the case. Frey says calculating such damages for injuries to outside parties creates an unfair risk of duplicative and excessive punishment.

Peck, Williams' attorney, says the cigarette-maker is seeking to turn "review of punitive damage awards (into) a simple arithmetic exercise," based on the ratio between actual and punitive. He says the Oregon jury's verdict followed proper criteria "to achieve deterrence" and reverse some of Philip Morris' "ill-gotten profit."

Philly Officials, Hispanic Leaders Object To Election Monitors (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — City officials and Hispanic community leaders objected today to the federal government's plans to put monitors at city polling places on Election Day, saying those efforts could discourage people from voting.

The Department of Justice earlier this month asked a federal judge to authorize appointment of monitors beginning with the upcoming Nov. 7 election and ending in 2009. The government accused the city of failing to provide sufficient election materials in Spanish and not recruiting enough bilingual poll workers.

But City Solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. said at a news conference Thursday that the federal government could not guarantee him that federal monitors wouldn't follow voters into polling booths. It would be better to appoint local monitors, he said.

A spokesman for the Justice Department said he would look into the solicitor's claims but could not immediately comment.

"We're very, very concerned about having Big Brother taking care of us," said local attorney Luis P. Diaz, who also attended Thursday's news conference with other community leaders.

The federal lawsuit contends the city violated the federal Voting Rights Act by allowing only poll workers – some of whom did not speak Spanish – to help Hispanic voters cast ballots. The law permits voters who require assistance to request help from someone they know.

Diaz, the city solicitor, said Philadelphia has been helping to accommodate non-English speakers at the polls for more than three decades. The city plans to recruit about 200 translators to help at the more than 150 polling places expected to need translation services this year, he said.

About 10 percent of Philadelphia's 1.4 million residents are Hispanic, according to 2004 Census figures cited in the suit. But the government estimates that about 36 percent of voting-age Hispanics in the city have limited English skills.

Phila. Opposes U.S. Observers At Polls (PHILINQ)

By Marcia Gelbart

Philadelphia Inquirer, October 27, 2006

Two weeks before Election Day, the city is fighting an attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to appoint federal observers for Philadelphia elections beginning Nov. 7 and lasting past next year's presidential race, until the end of 2009.

The effort to appoint the observers stems from a lawsuit filed by the federal government 14 days ago alleging that the city has violated the rights of its Hispanic voters.

DOJ_NMG_0087197

Specifically, it charges that the city hasn't adequately recruited and trained bilingual poll workers, failed to provide sufficient election-related materials in Spanish, and prohibited Hispanic voters with limited English from choosing someone to help them inside the voting booth, which law permits.

"The record in this case clearly demonstrates that the city does not exercise sufficient control over its voting places to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act," the lawsuit states. It alludes to 50 Hispanic city residents who encountered problems in elections here, most since 2003. One, Myrna Cruz, testified that a poll worker forced her to vote for John Street for mayor in 2003, when she wanted to vote for Sam Katz. Others said they were ridiculed by poll workers who asked why they hadn't learned English.

The suit also says the city has no program to identify "the need for or the placement of Spanish-speaking poll workers and interpreters on election day" and that the city has paid people to be interpreters who don't speak Spanish.

City officials have called the allegations unfounded. A hearing has been scheduled for next Friday in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District.

With the election fast approaching, the city has been struggling to implement new federal rules on handicapped access, as well as a new state law requiring dozens of city polling places to be moved (they can no longer be inside bars or elected officials' homes, for instance).

Combined with troubles encountered in May's primary, when hundreds of voting machines malfunctioned, and now the federal lawsuit, the resulting challenges for the Nov. 7 election are perhaps unprecedented, election officials say.

"Everything is culminating at the same time," City Commissioner Edgar Howard said. "Just be glad this year isn't a presidential year," he said, when voter turnout is typically at its highest.

In the case of the federal lawsuit, U.S. Rep. Bob Brady, the Democratic Party chairman, and other local Democrats see partisan politics at work.

He said the suit was filed so close to Nov. 7 "probably to suppress the [Democratic] vote" and help GOP candidates such as U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum.

Michael P. Meehan, general counsel for the city Republican Party, dismissed Brady's explanation. "That's part of the spin machine to generate turnout," he said. "We didn't generate this. We didn't make any complaints."

But both party leaders agree that the proposed federal intervention goes too far.

"That's a disgrace. The Hispanics have no problem with the interpreters," Brady said.

"We do think they are going beyond," Meehan said.

According to the lawsuit, about 6.6 percent of the city's voting-age population is Hispanic, and more than a third of those people - 25,660 - speak only limited English.

Since 1974, the city has provided translators at polling places where census data indicates Hispanics live. The Justice Department wants Spanish language assistance citywide.

"This is one of those issues where the remedy far exceeds any potential need," city Solicitor Romulo Diaz said, adding that in the Nov. 7 election, the city also will provide translations via telephone in 200 languages, including Spanish.

Stressing that federal observers could use their authority to enter polling booths while people are voting, Diaz said: "We think that is not only something that could be misunderstood - it could even have a chilling effect and intimidate the very voters the Justice Department says it is trying to support."

Yesterday, department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said: "No federal observers would ever enter a voting booth unless specifically requested by and with the expressed permission of a voter, and to suggest otherwise is just untrue."

She said there are currently federal observers in 169 municipalities throughout the country, including, most recently, Boston and Springfield, Mass.

In the last two elections, Diaz, at the Justice Department's request, said he had given its officials credentials to access city voting places to observe what bilingual assistance and signage were provided.

Those officials were not granted permission to enter individual polling booths.

"There are still some issues that we need to improve upon," said City Councilman Juan Ramos, Council's only Hispanic member. "But the Latino people don't need federal agents on Election Day to see how they vote or get behind the curtain with them."

A nonpartisan voters' right advocacy group, the Delaware Valley Voter Registration Education Project, held a news conference yesterday opposing the government effort.

The city's nonprofit election watchdog, the Committee of Seventy, also has had concerns about a lack of Hispanic voter participation. During the May primary, the committee recruited local volunteers to survey what assistance Spanish-speaking voters received at polling places in Latino neighborhoods, mainly in the 7th, 18th, 19th and 33d Wards. The committee later shared those results with the Justice Department, which was already conducting its own review.

DOJ_NMG_0087198

"I wouldn't call the information we provided them definitive," committee president Zach Stalberg said. But the findings - too few translators, and some with questionable language skills, and not enough bilingual polling-place officials - "suggested there might be problems."

Said Stalberg: "We think there are enough indications of problems here to merit federal observers... . In our view, it won't do any harm."

Problems With Machines, Ballots Trouble Officials (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Eleven days before voters go to the polls, problems from delayed absentee ballots to names being chopped off on voting machines are hampering elections officials.

The problems are not unusual, officials say. But coming after a primary election season in which new electronic machines and state laws confounded poll workers, they are making officials nervous.

The Chicago Board of Election Commissioners has withheld payments to equipment vendor Sequoia Voting Systems until the results are in. In Los Angeles County, officials will conduct a random audit of 5% of the machines used in early voting following questions about their security and accuracy.

"It points to the increased agony being felt around the country by election administrators," says Kimball Brace of Election Data Systems.

Among the problems:

·In parts of Virginia and Texas, some candidates' names have been cut off on summary pages that confirm voters' selections. Democratic Senate challenger Jim Webb in Virginia is affected. In Austin, Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison appears as "Kay Bailey Hutch."

·Absentee and provisional ballots have been slow to arrive in Maryland, California, Ohio and Arkansas, among other states. The delays could threaten officials' ability to get absentee ballots out on time or to have enough provisional ballots at polling places for voters whose registrations are contested.

·Missouri has been shaken by the arrival of thousands of questionable voter registration cards. Many include bogus address changes that could cause some voters to be misinformed; others might have to cast provisional ballots rather than regular ones.

The problems should not cause Americans to lose faith in the electoral process, says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

"Our nation's voting equipment, election results and election officials can and should be trusted," he said this week. "The integrity of the system is not in the hands of hackers, professors, interest groups or politicians in Washington — it is managed by local election officials."

Elections Pushed, Pressed, Pulled Into 21st Century (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 27, 2006

Haunted by breakdowns at the polls during this year's primaries, elections officials across the USA are using technology and other means to make voting on Nov. 7 more reliable and convenient.

From alerts delivered by text message to polling sites at grocery stores, states and counties hope to increase turnout and decrease the number of problems in states such as Ohio and Illinois earlier this year.

In Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where it took nearly a week to count votes in May, poll workers must pass a four-hour training course and practice on new electronic voting machines. The nearly 30% who fail must repeat the class. "You're imposing a technology on them that they don't understand," elections project manager Tom Hayes says.

Cook County, Ill., which suffered similar delays in March, is paying $500 to equipment technicians willing to train for three days. "The job of these poll workers immediately got about five or six times harder," County Clerk David Orr says.

Among the innovations:

·Electronic updates. Johnson County, Kan., offers election alerts by e-mail, text message or podcast. Only about 500 residents have signed up this year, but the publicity could boost turnout. "It gave us something new to talk about to drive people to our website," Election Commissioner Brian Newby says.

·Voting by phone. Vermont pioneered phone voting for the visually impaired and has now been joined by Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Oklahoma and Oregon. "They're very comfortable with a telephone, and many of them aren't very comfortable with a computer," says Vermont Secretary of State Deborah Markowitz.

·New polling venues. Clark County, Nev., has increased its early voting sites to 18 by including malls, grocery stores and a mobile trailer. Eight are permanent, and 10 move throughout the county. "We're right in the community locations where people go," Registrar of Voters Larry Lomax says.

·Centralized sites. Following the example of Larimer County, 20 Colorado counties will use centralized "vote centers" this year rather than smaller precincts. Voters, who can go to any center, find the system more convenient, says Dana Williams of the Colorado secretary of state's office.

·Election night webcams. Orange County, Calif., lets election junkies watch on the Web as ballot boxes and supplies are returned to a county warehouse. "We're showing them as much of the process as we can," says Brett Rowley of the registrar's office.

Free, Fair Elections? Doubts Still Linger (USAT)

By Julianne Malveaux

USA Today, October 27, 2006

One of the reasons, it is said, that we invaded Iraq was to introduce democracy to a totalitarian nation. But while we are shopping democracy abroad, we have yet to perfect our democracy at home. When people go to the polls Nov. 7, the manifestations of our imperfect democracy will be rife. The non-partisan Election Reform Information Project predicts problems at the polls, and the NAACP says it will monitor elections in 10 states in which irregularities are a possibility.

It is ironic that U.S. monitors travel the globe to ensure "free and fair" elections when we have so many problems here. Maryland's primary election, for example, was botched in large part when some polling places opened late because an election worker forgot to distribute the activator cards to unlock voting machines. Many still wonder about the accuracy of voting machines, especially those that don't provide a paper receipt to ensure votes are tallied correctly.

NAACP President Bruce Gordon singles out Diebold machines as "unreliable," yet there are more than 130,000 of these touch-screen machines in use nationwide. The problem really isn't just one company. Instead, the issue is that six years since a presidential election's outcome hinged on hanging chads, reforms have not been implemented in a way to inspire confidence in the ease, accuracy or fairness of elections.

Electionline.org, a non-partisan website on election analysis and reform, just issued a report that says Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Indiana, Maryland, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Washington are states especially likely to have problems because of legal challenges, procedural changes, close races, new equipment — or a combination of factors.

Even when machines count votes accurately, some people's voting experiences are marred by human error. In some precincts, lines are long enough to test Job's patience because there aren't enough machines or volunteers. Federal election law requires that most polls be open from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. on the first Tuesday in November. But long lines might shorten if we implemented reforms such as 24-hour voting, or considered the possibility of weekend voting.

Voters with flexible schedules are in the minority; most are stuck in long lines before or after work. These are the folks who will leave lines when polling places don't open on time or are too long. The rise in absentee ballots might be a reflection of this inconvenience.

Control of the House and the Senate is at stake in the 2006 elections, and many races are so tight they could be decided on just a few thousand votes. Our democracy depends on free, fair and accurate elections. On Nov. 8, we shouldn't have doubts about whether our votes have been counted.

G.O.P. Moves Fast To Reignite Issue Of Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26 — The divisive debate over gay marriage, which played a prominent role in 2004 campaigns but this year largely faded from view, erupted anew on Thursday as President Bush and Republicans across the country tried to use a court ruling in New Jersey to rally dispirited conservatives to the polls.

Wednesday's ruling, in which the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples, had immediate ripple effects, especially in Senate races in some of the eight states where voters are considering constitutional amendments to ban gay marriage.

President Bush put a spotlight on the issue while campaigning in Iowa, which does not have a proposal on the ballot. With the Republican House candidate, Jeff Lamberti, by his side, Mr. Bush — who has not been talking about gay marriage in recent weeks — took pains to insert a reference into his stump speech warning that Democrats would raise taxes and make America less safe.

"Yesterday in New Jersey, we had another activist court issue a ruling that raises doubts about the institution of marriage," Mr. Bush said at a luncheon at the Iowa State Fairgrounds that raised $400,000 for Mr. Lamberti.

The president drew applause when he reiterated his long-held stance that marriage was "a union between a man and a woman," adding, "I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended."

The ruling in New Jersey left it to the Legislature to decide whether to legalize gay marriage. Even so, the threat that gay marriage could become legal energized conservatives at a time when Republican strategists say that turning out the base could make the difference between winning and losing on Nov. 7. With many independent analysts predicting Republicans will lose the House and possibly the Senate, President Bush's political team is counting on the party's sophisticated voter turnout machinery to hold Democratic advances enough that Republicans can at least maintain control.

"It's a game of margins," said Charles Black, a Republican strategist who consults frequently with Karl Rove, the chief White House political strategist. "You've got about 20 House races and probably half a dozen Senate races that are either dead even or very, very close. So if it motivates voters in one or two to go vote, it could make a difference."

Democrats predicted Thursday that the debate would not dramatically alter the national conversation in an election that has been dominated by the war in Iraq and corruption and scandal in Washington. But across the country, Republicans quickly embraced the New Jersey ruling as a reason for voters to send them to Capitol Hill.

In Virginia, the court decision could not have come at a better time for Senator George Allen, a Republican whose campaign for re-election had been thrown off course by allegations that he had used racially insensitive remarks. The Virginia ballot includes a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. Mr. Allen supports it; his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, argues that the ban is unnecessary.

On Thursday, Mr. Allen could be found in Roanoke at a rally held by backers of a ballot initiative to ban gay marriage. Victoria Cobb, an organizer of the events, said the New Jersey ruling was giving the cause "a new momentum."

"It's an issue that's going to play a big role in the next 12 days," Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said in an interview.

In Tennessee, another state with a proposal to ban gay marriage, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat running for the Senate, was sparring with Republicans over an advertisement in which the Republican National Committee asserts that Mr. Ford supports gay marriage — an assertion Mr. Ford says is wrong. On Thursday, he responded with his own advertisement, calling the Republican ad "despicable, rotten lies."

Mr. Ford says he will vote for the Tennessee gay marriage ban. With early voting under way, the Republican candidate, Bob Corker, is telling voters that he has already cast his ballot in favor of the gay marriage ban.

And in Pennsylvania, where Senator Rick Santorum, the Senate's leading Republican backer of a gay marriage ban, is fighting for his political survival, conservative advocacy groups were working furiously to revive the gay marriage debate. Pennsylvania does not have a ballot initiative.

"It's an important wedge issue to talk about between candidates where there are two distinct viewpoints on the issue," said Joseph Cella, president of Fidelis, a national Catholic advocacy group that has embraced Mr. Santorum for his views on abortion and gay marriage. Mr. Cella said his organization, which was also working to pass a gay marriage ban in Colorado, was contemplating an advertising campaign.

As of January 2006, 45 states had enacted some form of law — from a simple statute to a constitutional amendment — banning same-sex marriage. In addition to Virginia, Tennessee and Colorado, the states that have proposed constitutional amendments on the November ballot include Arizona, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

For conservatives, the debate brings back memories of 2004, when they rallied in opposition to a Massachusetts court ruling that same sex couples had a right to marry. The issue proved central in places like South Dakota, where Senator John Thune, a Republican, railed against activist judges in his successful campaign to oust Tom Daschle, then the Senate Democratic leader.

This year, by contrast, conservatives have felt frustrated that the debate over gay marriage and the judiciary is no longer front and center.

"I think they've been a little sedate," Mr. Cella said. But in the wake of the New Jersey ruling, he said, conservatives "are really getting motivated, and this is a shot in the arm to propel that."

Democrats, though, insist they are not concerned.

"It's not going to be close to the issue it was in 2004," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "In 2004 they scared people that the court ruling in Massachusetts would just change America and families dramatically. By 2006, it's clear that hasn't happened, and so the scare tactic, what motivated people to go to the polls, just isn't there."

DOJ_NMG_0087201

One place the New Jersey court ruling is not likely to have much of a political impact is, paradoxically, New Jersey, a largely Democratic state that does not have a proposed gay marriage ban on the ballot.

The Republican Senate candidate, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., has been distancing himself from his party throughout the campaign, in which he has focused largely on economic issues, domestic security and alleged ethical improprieties on the part of his Democratic opponent, Senator Robert Menendez. A Kean spokeswoman said Thursday that theme is unlikely to change.

"We're going to stick with the issues that we've been winning on this entire campaign," the spokeswoman, Jill Hazelbaker, said. Gay marriage, she said, "is not an issue that he's not talking about, or that he's trying to avoid. But in terms of our marquee issues that we're winning on, I don't think it rises to an issue that's going to define the campaign."

Religious Conservatives Cheer Ruling On Gays As Wake-Up Call (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 27, 2006

The New Jersey court decision that gay couples are entitled to the same rights as heterosexual couples was bad news for social conservatives -- the bad news they were hoping for.

"Pro-traditional-marriage organizations ought to give a distinguished service award to the New Jersey Supreme Court," said the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention.

Land and other conservative religious leaders predicted that the court's 4 to 3 ruling, which was handed down Wednesday, would boost turnout of social conservatives in the midterm elections, particularly in the eight states that have constitutional amendments against same-sex marriage on the Nov. 7 ballot.

"I have to think there are Democratic strategists out there thinking the words of the old Japanese admiral: 'I fear all we've done is wake a sleeping giant,' " said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a Washington-based advocacy group. "They were coasting into an election with a Republican base with dampened enthusiasm. This brings it all back home to the base, what this election is about."

President Bush, at fundraising events in Iowa and Michigan, denounced the New Jersey ruling and called heterosexual marriage "a sacred institution."

Before the New Jersey decision, conservative religious groups tried to rally their supporters around the issue of same-sex marriage, but with far less success than they had in the 2004 elections.

Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, for example, held "Stand for the Family" rallies in three cities in September and October, drawing considerably smaller crowds than anticipated. The first rally, in Pittsburgh on Sept. 20, attracted 3,000 people to a 17,000-seat arena that Focus on the Family had predicted would be full.

The next two rallies, in St. Paul, Minn., on Oct. 3 and Nashville on Oct. 16, were moved from stadium-size venues to smaller auditoriums, and the tickets, which had been on sale for $7, were given away. Each event also drew about 3,000 people, according to Focus on the Family spokesman Paul Hetrick.

"We don't gauge the success by the number of people," Hetrick said, adding: "I don't think it's the rallies [that flopped]. I just think it's more of a challenge to enthuse people about midterm elections."

Evan Wolfson, executive director of Freedom to Marry, a group that supports same-sex marriage, said religious conservatives "have gone to this well too many times, and people are not buying it."

"They attack gay people when the sun rises, and they attack gay people when the sun sets, so no matter what the court had done in New Jersey, they would have said Americans need to shift their attention from the real threats to our country to the alleged threat from gay couples seeking to settle down," Wolfson said.

New Jersey's Supreme Court stopped short of requiring the state to allow same-sex marriage. It said that under the state's constitution, same-sex couples can no longer be denied the rights and benefits that opposite-sex couples receive. It gave the state legislature 180 days to craft a solution, which apparently could include allowing civil unions.

Land said conservative voters were more energized about same-sex marriage in the 2004 elections because Massachusetts had just become the first -- and so far only -- state to legalize it as a result of a state court ruling in 2003.

Since then, opponents of same-sex marriage have been on a roll. Twenty states have passed constitutional amendments banning it. Several courts, most recently in the states of Washington and New York, have ruled against it. Those victories, Land said, may have made some conservatives complacent.

"But whatever wind was pumped out of their sails has now been pumped back in," he said. "I frankly was amazed that the New Jersey judges issued their decision before the election."

Perkins agreed, saying that he "had long anticipated a bad ruling from New Jersey" and was glad that it occurred in time for voters to see the "very real and present danger" that same-sex marriage could spread. He spoke by telephone shortly before holding a news conference to denounce the New Jersey decision in South Dakota, one of the eight states with marriage amendments on the ballot. The others are Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin.

Bush Defines Marriage As Man And Woman (AP-Y)

AP, October 27, 2006

President Bush said the "sacred institution" of marriage between a man and a woman must be defended against what he called activist court rulings.

Bush briefly brought up the topic, unprompted, while raising money here for a Republican congressional candidate, a day after the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that same-sex couples must be given the same rights as married people.

The court left it up to the state's Legislature to decide whether to extend those rights under the structure of marriage, civil unions or something else.

The president said the ruling "raises doubts about the institution of marriage."

"I believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman," he said. "I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended."

Bush did not say how it must be defended. But he has advocated a federal ban on gay marriage. Earlier this year, a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage failed to win the needed two-thirds support in both the Senate and House.

Gay marriage is legal only in Massachusetts. Other states, including Vermont and California, have laws permitting civil unions or domestic partnerships that offer virtually all the benefits of gay marriage, except the name. New Jersey and some other states have domestic partnership laws that offer fewer marriage benefits.

Twenty states have passed constitutional amendments aimed at blocking gay marriage, mostly by large margins. Eight more states — Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin — will be voting Nov. 7 on constitutional amendments that would ban same-sex marriages and, in most cases, civil unions as well.

Bush Campaigns Against Same-sex Marriage Ruling (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 27, 2006

US President George W. Bush seized on a New Jersey court ruling that may pave the way for same-sex marriage there as a political weapon ahead of November 7 elections.

Campaigning for a struggling Republican congressional candidate here, Bush declared: "We believe in family values, we believe values are important, and we believe marriage is a fundamental institution of civilization."

"Yesterday, in New Jersey, we had another activist court issue a ruling that raises doubts about the institution of marriage," he said at the first of two fundraisers he was to attend.

"I believe that marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and I believe it's a sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society and the well-being of families, and it must be defended," he said.

New Jersey's Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that gay couples have the same rights as their heterosexual counterparts, in a decision that could pave the way for same-sex marriages in the state.

The ruling stated that preventing such unions is unconstitutional and gave the state legislature six months to decide whether to amend the current marriage laws or create a new framework for same-sex unions.

"Denying rights and benefits to committed same-sex couples that are statutorily given to their heterosexual counterparts violates the equal protection guarantee" of the constitution, the court said in its ruling.

It said that while it did not find that a fundamental right to same-sex marriage existed in the state, same-sex couples did not enjoy the same rights as their heterosexual counterparts.

"The unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our state constitution," it added.

"The legislature must either amend the marriage statutes to include same-sex couples or create a parallel statutory structure," it said.

N.J. Boost For Gay Couples Buoys GOP (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, October 27, 2006

NEW YORK

The political fallout from Wednesday's New Jersey Supreme Court ruling in favor of full rights for gay couples could ripple far beyond the borders of the Garden State.

DOJ_NMG_0087203

With control of the House and Senate at stake in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Republican leaders are hoping the ruling will give their wavering conservative base - who would see the court's move as another attack on traditional marriage - a reason to go to the polls.

The New Jersey outcome could suddenly give impetus to voters in eight states where the ballot includes measures to ban gay marriage. In some of these states - Tennessee and Virginia, especially - the races for Senate seats are too close to call. Others, namely Arizona and Colorado, have hotly contested House races that may give a boost to Republican candidates.

The ruling, which found that gay couples in New Jersey are entitled to the same legal and financial protections as heterosexual couples, could tip the national balance, many political analysts say.

"The Republicans are thrilled and the Democrats are furious with those judges, and that tells me all I need to know," says Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia. "Both sides understand this is a boost for Republican turnout among social conservatives, many of whom were very discouraged and probably were not going to vote because of the [Mark] Foley scandal and Iraq."

Some analysts, though, disagree. Gay marriage has lost some of its salience as a galvanizing issue, they say, in part because Americans are so focused on the war in Iraq.

"The country seems very, very centered on Iraq, and ... it's very unlikely that something that happened in New Jersey is going to energize social conservatives," says Cliff Zukin, a professor of public policy at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "Every poll I've looked at suggests that Iraq remains the defining issue."

In backing full rights for gay couples, New Jersey's high court gave the state Legislature 180 days to expand existing laws or to adopt new ones that will guarantee gay couples equal rights. But it stopped short of requiring use of the word "marriage" to define gay-couple unions, leaving that decision to the Legislature. Some analysts suggest that makes the issue less compelling for conservatives, for now.

"I'm sure the extreme right would very much have preferred the court have said we get marriage," says David Buckel, senior counsel for Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, who argued the case for gay marriage before the New Jersey court. "That is one of the ironies of where we are now politically. The court did not take the constitutional promise the entire way. And since we're in abeyance now and have to wait for the Legislature to act, it's hard to see what kind of impact it will have outside of New Jersey, at least on elections."

Eight thousand gay couples have been married in Massachusetts, and civil unions are commonplace in Vermont and Connecticut - developments that Mr. Buckel says may have made some Americans feel less threatened by the issue. "Not one volcano popped its lid, the weather patterns did not dramatically alter," says Buckel. "I think America sees that in the end, whatever anxieties there were, a few families were helped immensely by getting things like medical coverage and no families were hurt."

Opponents of gay marriage say the ruling will put the issue back on the front pages - and energize the most conservative voters. "New Jersey is a key state, and the papers are covering this, word is spreading," says the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition in Washington. "This raises a level of awareness. It takes away the negatives from the Foley scandal and the war, and reminds people that the family is an important issue."

Mr. Sheldon, whose public-policy think tank is supported by 43,000 churches, is urging voters to find out where their candidate stands on the gay-marriage issue and to vote. "This underscores the urgency for Congress to act on a constitutional amendment that truly defines marriage as between one man and one woman and doesn't give away the rights and privileges through civil unions and domestic partners," he says.

To date, polls show Democratic voters have been more energized than Republicans this election cycle - a reversal from the past few elections when Republicans were gung-ho and Democrats lackluster.

"Republicans haven't dropped off the map, but their interest in voting is lower than it usually is," says Thomas Patterson, a political analyst at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "This is the kind of issue that can give them a reason to vote, and they haven't had many. This might be enough to get them to think, 'Ah, I'll get out of my chair,' at least for those on the margins."

In New Jersey, where Republicans see their best hope of taking a Democratic Senate seat, the ruling is not expected to affect the close race between incumbent Sen. Robert Menendez (D) and Tom Kean Jr. (R) - in part because a majority of voters there favor gay marriage.

'We Have Decided' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 27, 2006

This week's New Jersey Supreme Court's judicial diktat on same-sex-somethings (name to be determined later) is a remarkable arrogation of power by the judiciary. The court's belief that it is empowered to embark on social experimentation in the field of marriage is embodied in the words -- "We have decided that our State Constitution guarantees that every statutory right and benefit conferred to heterosexual couples through civil marriage must be made available to committed same-sex couples . . ." (our emphasis).

Along its merry way, the decision does strive for a semblance of humility and rigor, perhaps out of a troubled conscience about judicial overreach. "The great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process," the court avers. The justices also quote a lower-court ruling to the effect that "a constitution is not simply an empty receptacle into which judges may pour their own conceptions of evolving social mores."

That this is disingenuous, however, is made plain by the fact that the justices are willing to trust "the democratic process" only with the semantic question of what to call these unions: "The name to be given to the statutory scheme that provides full rights and benefits to same-sex couples, whether marriage or some other term, is a matter left to the democratic process." Apparently New Jersey voters are supposed to be grateful that their judicial overlords have delegated this policy ornamentation.

Ironically, however, the court held that the decision of the state legislature to pass a law in 2004 recognizing "domestic partnerships," and specifically distinguishing them from marriages, weighs in favor of same-sex-somethings. It seems that a political compromise arrived at democratically does not satisfy the justices' desire for the legislature to act as a "great engine of social change." So the justices gave the engine orders from their headquarters.

And while declining to identify a "fundamental right" to same-sex marriage, the court simultaneously declared that "the unequal dispensation of rights and benefits to committed same-sex partners can no longer be tolerated under our State Constitution." All in all, the ruling reveals judges writing law entirely on their own but trying to cover their political tracks.

If many on the judicial and political left get their way, those tracks will soon extend to the rest of the country as well. We've opposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution banning same-sex marriage on grounds that this is an issue best settled by state legislators. However, most liberals would be only too happy to impose the New Jersey standard on every other state through the Constitution's "full faith and credit" clause.

The Defense of Marriage Act, signed by Bill Clinton in 1996, is supposed to protect against this sort of cross-state social imperialism. But watch as activists and many Democrats now seek to use the New Jersey ruling to coax the U.S. Supreme Court to overrule that legislation. When cultural revolutions are in the liberal saddle, democratic formalities always seem to get stomped by "We have decided."

Clinton Wouldn't Block Law If Albany Backs Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton told a group of gay elected officials Wednesday night that she would support a gay marriage law in New York if a future governor and Legislature chose to enact one, according to three participants at the meeting.

Mrs. Clinton has long opposed same-sex marriage and instead favors civil unions for gay couples, a position that has drawn sharp criticism from some gay advocacy groups. But she has also said that each state should decide the issue for itself.

The Democratic candidate for governor of New York, Eliot Spitzer, who is well ahead in the polls, has pledged to fight to legalize gay marriage, and Mrs. Clinton made it clear on Wednesday that she would go along with a gay marriage law.

“If our governor and our Legislature support marriage in New York, I’m not going to be against that,” Mrs. Clinton said, according to an article about her remarks yesterday in Gay City News. “I feel very comfortable with being able to refute anybody who tries to pit us or pit me against Eliot.”

Participants at the meeting, which was closed to reporters other than those at gay media outlets, confirmed the account of Mrs. Clinton’s remarks, which were made to the gathering at a private apartment in Manhattan.

Mrs. Clinton also appeared to back off her past remarks that characterized marriage’s history as an exclusively heterosexual institution, according to the Gay City News article.

“Obviously my friends and people who spoke to me — we’ve had many long conversations and I think — and which I believe — that the way that I have spoken and I have advocated has certainly evolved and I am happy to be educated and to learn as much as I can,” Mrs. Clinton said.

The senator listened and spoke for more than an hour with the three-dozen officials from New York, as they sat down — by coincidence — two hours after the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that gay couples were entitled to the same legal rights and financial benefits as heterosexual couples.

Participants said it was a warm, constructive meeting, and that some in the group had cried as they told stories of frustrations about not being able to marry or have the same benefits of other long-term couples who are heterosexual.

They said Mrs. Clinton described supporting the federal Defense of Marriage Act as a strategic decision to help derail a constitutional amendment that would have banned gay marriage. She also said that it was not fair that the gay partner of a late congressman from Massachusetts, Gerry Studds, was not receiving his benefits, participants said.

Corzine Tells Legislators He Backs Civil Unions Over Same-Sex Marriage (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, October 27, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 26 — Gov. Jon S. Corzine told legislative leaders on Thursday that he would prefer that New Jersey enact a civil unions law for gay couples rather than allow them to marry.

That prompted attacks from the state's leading gay-rights advocate, who said Mr. Corzine expressed support for same-sex marriage to a gay audience two weeks ago and had repeatedly done so during his 2000 primary campaign for the United States Senate.

Steven Goldstein, who was co-manager of Mr. Corzine's Senate campaign and now heads the gay-rights group Garden State Equality, said on Thursday that Mr. Corzine had clearly expressed a preference for gay marriage, over gay unions, in "numerous conversations." Mr. Goldstein said the governor "expressed his full support for marriage equality" in a conference call with 100 advocates for gays earlier this month.

But Mr. Corzine said on Thursday afternoon in an interview that he had "advocated on a consistent basis for civil unions." He said that he would sign a bill allowing gay marriage, but "it's not my preference."

Assistants to the governor said he had outlined his preferences to Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts Jr. and Senate President Richard J. Codey on Thursday morning, a day after New Jersey's highest court ruled that gay and lesbian couples are entitled to all the legal rights and financial benefits of their heterosexual counterparts.

The court gave the Legislature 180 days to decide whether to accomplish that by allowing gay men and lesbians to marry or by expanding New Jersey's domestic partnership laws. Lawmakers, though, said they had made no plans to take up the issue.

"It's much too early," Mr. Codey said, pointing out that lawmakers already had a heavy schedule this fall dealing with the issue of property taxes.

Still, they seemed to have settled on the middle road that the majority of the court prescribed. They said they would not allow a vote to overturn the ruling with a constitutional amendment, but also discounted prospects for a law extending the term "marriage" to same-sex couples.

"I don't see, at this point in time, a majority of both houses being in favor of marriage as opposed to civil unions," Mr. Codey said. "It's more likely to be civil unions."

He added, "I couldn't at this point guarantee civil unions."

Mr. Goldstein said on Thursday that gay-marriage advocates were pressing legislators to support a bill that would extend the word "marriage" to same-sex unions, in part through a public-relations campaign. He said that his group had spent about $10,000 on advertising time on News 12 New Jersey, a cable station, to run commercials supporting gay marriage and arguing that civil unions are inadequate.

Opponents of gay marriage said they had no immediate plans to run commercials countering that theme.

"We don't need to persuade the public," said John Tomicki, chairman of the New Jersey Coalition to Preserve and Protect Marriage. "They share our views about marriage being for a man and a woman."
